We are asked why we do not ship corn, why we wish to ship wheat. No corn can be shipped across the Atlantic for two months after the first of April, because that is the germinating season for corn and it will not stand shipment.

Wheat is a durable grain. From the point of view of interallied feeding, wheat is absolutely vital. It is the one grain that we have that will stand shipment. It is the one grain that will serve. Up to this time the Allies have used some 30 to 40 per cent of corn in their bread. Their bread has been as nothing compared to the bread that we have had in this country, neither in palatability nor luxuriousness. After this, if they are to be fed, they must be fed on wheat bread, or none at all.

Now, in this period of extreme difficulty in Europe, the time when the morale of the civil populations of our Allies is at its lowest ebb, it does not stand for us to say, "You can wait two months and then you can eat corn". It is for us to say, "You shall receive every solitary grain of wheat that our ports can handle".

Our population has lived before this on corn. For three years the Southern States lived and put up a good fight with no wheat. For periods of four and five years at a stretch no wheat was known to the people of New England. There is no reason why we should insist on having the most luxurious grain at this time, when it is our only transportable grain.

Now, we have founded the Food Administration on voluntary effort. We have no desire to depart from this idea, but if we are to accomplish this problem it must be accomplished by the voluntary effort of the intelligent people, the influential people of the community. If this democracy has not reached such a stage of development that it has in its people the self denial, voluntary self-denial, willingness to sacrifice, to protect its own institutions and those of Europe from which our own were bred, then it deserves to go down under the German hand and take another form of civilization.

I, therefore, cannot give you orders. I am going to make an appeal. That appeal is this,—that you should abolish the use of wheat and wheat products in every first-class hotel and restaurant until the next harvest.

(Mr. Hoover was here interrupted by applause, his auditors rising for a prolonged demonstration.)

I had felt that I should receive that response from you.

We must always bear in mind that our population is a population of great variety of life. A large number of our people are dependent on the baker. Those who are dependent upon the baker can only eat bread, the substratum of which is wheat. You know as well as I that the baker cannot bake cereal products without a predominant portion of wheat. That section of our population, our working population, must receive wheat bread to some degree, but that other section of our population, to which you gentlemen belong and to which your clientele belongs, and to whom I belong, can quite well and without any self-denial worth the mention, make that small sacrifice. Therefore, if we are to get the distribution of such wheat supplies as we must have for some sections of our population, it can only be if you and I and our kind are prepared to do without.

Now, in these times of social unrest, there is one antidote. That antidote was never applied in Russia, and the result has been massacre. That antidote is a willingness for us to sacrifice more than we ask of those who have less to give. We must ask sacrifice from those who give from plenty, not from those who would have to give from their necessities.

Therefore, my message is small and concrete—the service that we ask of you, that we ask of every well-to-do, every independent person in the United States today is, that he shall abstain from the use of wheat in any form until the next harvest. Every message that we receive every hour of the day from this country—and it is a great country—shows us that we shall have a larger acreage planted in wheat this year than ever before. The arrival of the next harvest will solve our difficulties. If the Lord is good to us in the weather, our problem will be over by the first of September. That is not a long period of sacrifice. . .

Now, most of us can play but a small part in the winning of this war, and you and I do not wish to look into the eyes of our children ten years hence and say that we failed in our duty. This is a sacrifice that is small in figure, but I can assure you there is no message that I can send the Food Controllers of Europe today that will carry such weight and such encouragement to their people as to be able to say that every first-class hotel in the United States has, for their sake, abolished the use of wheat.

SMILEAGE BOOKS MEANS SMILES FOR SOLDIERS.

The United States Government feels keenly the obligation to provide its soldiers with all the needs and comforts which they so justly deserve.

With a deep sense of this obligation the Military Entertainment Council is now presenting to the folks at home the opportunity—rather the privilege—of aiding in this phase of war work. A compaign to sell Smileage Books has therefore been undertaken. Every Smileage Book that is purchased means that a bundle of smiles is stored up for some patriotic boy.

A Smileage Book is a book containing coupons entitling the holder to admission to any Liberty Theater erected under the management of the Commission on Training Camp Activities. One of these theaters has been built at every National Army and National Guard Camp.

These books are now being sold in various places throughout the city, so that they are within reach of all. A nominal investment of one dollar in one of these books will go a long way towards keeping up the spirits of our boys in camp.

THE DANGER SIGNAL.

How insecure the statues of Jewry is in the opinion of certain members of our people has been brought home to us within recent times. One would suppose that after a century or so of emancipation, when in the Western world we have given ample and signal proof of our allegiance to whatever country we may be citizens of, of our staunch support of the national cause, of sacrifices of life and wealth in critical times, we should not be fearful for any disturbance in our position among our countrymen. But somehow things are not so. We are always sensitive to the least aspersion upon our devotion to country, be it unjustified and wholly uncalled for. Witness the spirit with which in every belligerent country the Jews have gone in for what the hour demanded of them. Witness the heroes rewarded with honors. Witness those soon forgotten who have fallen on the blood drenched battlefields in every corner of the world. The obvious reason for the misgivings is the circumstance that Jewry is with rare exceptions not homogeneous. Everywhere we have the natives, aye, sons and grandsons of natives, completely identified with the culture of their country, alive to the sense of honor, in which also the honor of Israel among the nations is involved. But we have also those of recent arrival. Not only are they strange to our mode of life and thinking, but also politically they are strangers. In times of peace all nations migrate. It is to the honor of the Anglo-Saxon world that the door has always been open to the stranger, particularly if he belongs to the persecuted class. But the war is on, and they are found, even if they do not find themselves, within a certain nation, yet wholly without it. Take the case of the unnaturalized Jewish population in England. The country needed men badly. It was fair that so long as England and Russia were allied that the Russian nationals in England should fight for the common cause. But what was to be their status? England might have offered citizenship to those who submitted to the draft. Perhaps it could not without creating some complication. Now that Russia is an uncertain member of the alliance nobody really knows where she stands the problem is muchly aggravated. That there are sinister minds who are blind to the part taken by Jewry in the war goes without saying. We have always had our cavaliers whom nothing will satisfy. And when, in a crisis, the national mind is darkened, the scapegoat is always at hand. Such is the simple explanation of the causal bitter remarks and innuendoes, let us say, of the Daily Mail class, to the effect that the Jews are willing enough to make uniforms but not to wear them. A gross lie, of course. Yet certain leaders in Jewry are taking alarm, and they wave the danger signal. They believe that recent declarations and movements have made the status of Jewry insecure. Here again the old remedy is prescribed. Deeds will show forth the truth, and deeds have shown how much the Jew is willing to do and to suffer to make the country of his birth safe and secure and glorious. Had it been possible or feasible for the Jew to be recognized as a Jew and nothing else, at least in the case of those who by reason of their wandering belong for the time being practically to no definite nationality, the trouble would have been avoided. But such is of course out of the question. The Jew must be labeled Russian, English, and so forth. We are certainly right in our contention that the Jew must not sever himself from the body politic of which he is an integral member. Nor can he. The draft is compulsory on all citizens. Still there are right here Jews of the class described, semi-detached. If they enlist as Jews for service in Palestine, let us say, it may not accord with our formula, but then formulas do not work in exceptional times. The times are exceptional. It is far better that they do service somewhere than none at all. The cavillers, notwithstanding, uniform make are as necessary as uniform wearers. The industries that are necessary to the prosecution of the war must be carried on, nor is it always less dangerous to work in a munition factory than to stand sentinel in a trench. Some are decidedly unfit to bear arms, but eminently fit to do one thing or another to help win the war. Let us not take alarm so readily. We have a clear conscience. The cravens are to be found in all ranks and in all faiths. We have all of us our desirables. We must not be too sensitive. Our status cannot be impaired by the few exceptions, or else our status has never been secure, and there is something wrong with our position. Which we have neither cause nor will to assume. And there the matter may rest.

PATRIOTISM NOT TO BE MADE INTO A FAD.

What the citizen owes to his country should not require much elucidation. It is not something that needs persuasion. It is elemental. The best augury is the defense of one's fatherland. In democratic countries like ours the government is endowed with great power, but it is of our giving. We willingly submit to its dictates, because we know that it represents our will. The officers of the government are in responsible positions because we sent them there. The government needs ways and means. In times of peace we pay our taxes. In times of war we readily part with a portion of our surplus wealth, we deliver over the surtax. We yield our sons to the army and navy. We make use of our brain and brawn to perfect the fighting machine. All that is so natural, exactly as it ought to be. For the price we pay will insure the gain—to whom? to none but ourselves, to the security of our firesides, to the end that those that come after us shall have a better and safer place to live in. It is true, like all duties, the duty of patriotism may be shirked by some, and the offenders may be found in high and low station alike. Be it, however, remembered that the sacrifices of the poor are greater than those of the rich. The millionaires of various grades have still a stupendous income left, after all sorts of extraordinary taxes have been paid, wherewith to fend off want, if at all they know the meaning of want. They subscribe to the Liberty loans, but there is just a touch of suspicion that thereby they escape paying so much of the surtax, and government bonds are an excellent investment. Manufacturers, small and great, are making untold profits, and it is but fair that they turn over to the common use a part of them. It is not they who feel the pinch. The burden is much greater upon the middle classes who make up the backbone of the nation. The laborers are well taken care of. There has never been a time within their memory when labor was so amply repaid. Wages are high. Hooverizing does not appeal to them. They earn and spend, and they spend their money on food. Meat is being consumed in large quantities by those who used to indulge in it but rarely. Not that any one would begrudge them their good fortune, which is the nation's misfortune. The sufferers are to be found in the middle classes, the vast masses of salaried people, the clerks and salesmen and teachers, the last class always underpaid and underfed. Theirs of course is a dignified poverty. But whether dignified or not, it is poverty. Our rich have nothing to occupy them, particularly the women. And so rich society women have taken up patriotism as a fad. They mean to come to the succor of the government in any way they can. That is laudable, so far as they themselves are concerned. When a man has made money enough, to be counted by the millions, by operating a mine and then selling it at an enormous profit, he offers his services to some department of the government for a dollar a year. Their high sense of patriotic duty is not to be questioned for a moment. But nevertheless it becomes easy for them to do so. But the middle class man who finds it increasingly hard to maintain his standards of life is sought out, if needs be by a house to house canvass, to make contributions to this or that branch of welfare work, to many a relief fund, and to subscribe to loans. Whatever is in reason possible, he has done without solicitation. But he is loath to bare his circumstances to any society woman of the neighborhood who drives up in her machine, and if through any sentiment of false pride he succumbs to the suave solicitation he is conscious that he is making inroads upon his meager income which is all too small for the needs of his household. He is importuned by all sorts of canvassers who unload some scheme or who for a commission sell a new book really useless. But now we are beset with the society canvasser who turns patriotism into a fad. Patriotism shall be no fad. The middle classes need no exhortation. They scrutinize their table conscientiously and scrupulously. Let us all give, and give abundantly, but let us give of our own volition. Sacrifices we all must make. The machinery of the government may not be adequate. For after all patriotism is a personal duty. Let each one of us heed the appeal that comes from his innermost soul. But we all know what we can and what we cannot do. We need no intermeddlers. And least of all are we prone to accept the fad for the real article. We are patriotic from innermost love of our country, but not because it comes home to us through the visit of the society leader.

CONTROVERSY CONCERNING SOLDIER WELFARE WORK ENDED.

During the month of January, Colonel Cutler and President Kraus met in Chicago and after fully discussing Soldier and Sailor Welfare Work agreed upon a plan for co-operation. Colonel Cutler asked Mr. Kraus to dictate the plan as he understood it and mail it to him so that he could submit it to the Jewish Board for Welfare Work. Mr. Kraus mailed the following:

We were willing to merge our activities in Soldiers' Welfare Work with those of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work, but were at no time nor are we now willing to merge the organizations. Ours has long ago ceased to be an insurance society, and is now organized to do service to others. It must do such service in order to be entitled to "Extenberechtigung".

We recognize, however, that the collection of funds by several agencies will sooner or later injuriously affect collections for relief of war sufferers. Such result we would like to avoid.

Regardless of who is to blame for the failure of previous efforts for co-operation, the fact remains that considerable ill-feeling has been aroused in certain quarters, that it seems spreading and if not checked may result in a conflict which will seriously affect the best interest of American Jewry. An earnest effort should be made to avoid future friction.

It is somewhat difficult to understand why there should be any conflict between the two organizations working separately. The work of your organization is inside of camps, ours is outside. The work we have undertaken we are in a position to carry on to the end and finance it. We ask for no concessions nor do we need any. That the work we are doing is helpful is proven by the fact that the War Department has approved it and has asked us to extend it and that in localities where our clubs have been established, citizens, regardless of creed, approve of our work.

Having fully considered the situation, we are ready, subject to the approval of the American Districts of the I. O. B. B. in order to avoid friction and possible animosities to accept the following as an agreement.

FIRST: We will not undertake separate collections, but join the Jewish Board for Welfare Work in its effort to obtain funds to carry on the work.

SECOND: We will turn over the Soldiers' Welfare Clubs established by us to the Jewish Board for Welfare Work.

THIRD: We will turn over whatever money we may have on hand from collections and whatever we may yet collect on subscriptions already made for Soldiers' Welfare Work to the Jewish Board for Welfare Work.

FOURTH: Districts which have as yet not established clubs, but have made arrangements to do so and have raised money for that purpose, shall have the right, out of the money so raised, to establish such clubs.

FIFTH: As all of the money collected, excepting so much as is referred to in paragraph 4, will be sent to the Jewish Board for Welfare Work, that board is to assume and discharge all the obligations entered into by the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the I. O. B. B., it being understood, however, that those obligations are small and consist principally of short time leases, excepting in District No. 4, where we are told, about $10,000.00 has been expended in fitting up a club of which a sum of about $4,000.00 is unpaid.

SIXTH: All of said clubs shall be known and designated as the B'nai B'rith Branch of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work and shall be under the control and management of the B'nai B'rith and shall not be abandoned during the war and as long as there are sufficient soldiers in the camps or cantonments nearby to justify the maintenance of such clubs; the Jewish Board for Welfare Work is to defray all expenses of maintaining such clubs, including the payment of rent and manager, it being understood, however, that all of such expenditures shall not exceed $5,000.00 per annum for each club unless the Jewish Board for Welfare Work shall authorize it.

SEVENTH: The Jewish Board for Welfare Work may deputize any of our workers in our clubs as its workers in the camps, but shall assign to them only such duties inside of the camps as will not hinder their usefulness outside of the camp.

EIGHTH: It is to be understood that each organization shall do its best to make the work inside as well as outside of the camps a success."

In a letter under date of February 7, 1918, the attention of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work was called to the fact that the clubs established by the B'nai B'rith were in the cities of Battle Creek, Fort Worth, Alexandria, Hattiesburg, Houston, Des Moines, Rockford, Baltimore, Washington and Tacoma, and that District No. 2 had made plans and had the money to establish two clubs within its District; that the clubs in Washington and Baltimore were being managed as local community institutions regardless of our organization or the Welfare Board, but that the Order was allowing them a monthly subvention.

The agreement was unanimously ratified by the Executive Committee of the Jewish Welfare Board and all the American District Grand Lodges of the I. O. B. B. and went into effect on April 1, 1918.

A RECEPTION AND DINNER TO PRESIDENT DAVIDSON.

The Metropolitan Lodges of New York City, under the auspices of the Intellectual Advancement Committee, tendered a dinner and reception to President Maurice P. Davidson on Monday, April 22, 1918. The reception resembled a family gathering as the feeling towards President Davidson is of the warmest cordiality. President Davidson is very much beloved by the entire district.

DR. CYRUS ADLER HONORED.

A painting of Dr. Cyrus Adler, president of the Dropsie College and acting president of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, was presented to the Publication Society by his colleagues on the board of trustees.

Dr. Adler has been a member of the board of trustees and the publication committee ever since the organization of the society. He was chairman of the board of editors of the New Bible Translation and is chairman of the Jewish classics committee and of the committee on Bible commentaries, as well as a member of many other committees having to do with important projects of the society.

JULIUS I. PEYSER.

Julius I. Peyser, a prominent attorney of Washington, D. C., and Past President of District Grand Lodge, No. 5, I. O. B. B., has been commissioned a captain in the National Army and is attached to the quartermaster's department in the secretary of war's office.

ULYSSES S. SCHWARTZ.

Alderman Ulysses S. Schwartz, of Chicago, a Ben B'rith and active worker in Jewish communal affairs, was re-elected alderman as a tribute to the notable record he made as one of the most able, clean and progressive members of the city council.

HONOR FOR A HUNGARIAN JEW.

Dr. Heinrich Gondo, chief of the Hungarian Press Bureau, has been appointed a ministerial councillor by the Emperor. Dr. Gondo is a devout orthodox Jew.

ACADEMIE FRANCAISE HAS JEWISH MEMBER.

Professor Henri Bergson has been officially received into the Academie Francaise. He is the first Jewish member of that famous body.

THE THIRD LIBERTY LOAN.

The general committees of District Grand Lodge, No. 1 and District Grand Lodge, No. 6, issued the following proclamation to the lodges of their respective districts and their members:

Whereas the first anniversary of the declaration of war by the United States against the Prussian Autocracy will occur on Saturday, April 6, 1918, and

Whereas on this day will be inaugurated the Third Liberty Loan Campaign to finance the struggle entered into by our great country for the sake of humanity and civilization and the preservation of those institutions under which our liberties are made secure, and

Whereas patriotism and loyalty to our country are cardinal principles of our Order,

Now, therefore, we, the officers and members of the general committee of the Grand Lodge, do hereby urge that during the week beginning with the night of Saturday, April 6, 1918, patriotic gatherings and mass meetings be held under the auspices of local lodges in every city, county, town and community throughout District No. 6, wheresoever a lodge or lodges of our Order may exist to which meetings all loyal citizens of whatever religious faith shall be cordially invited, to the end,

First: That the patriotism and morale of our citizenry may be fittingly demonstrated, and

Second: That a united, determined and enthusiastic response may be assured to the appeal of our country for an overwhelming subscription to the Third Liberty Loan.

Thus will conclusive evidence be given that all the sons of America, whether by birth or by adoption, stand in perfect unity to support the government of the United States and the principles of liberty and justice represented in her free institutions, and that for the final victory of democracy over autocracy we do pledge our lives and our fortunes.

COUNT CZERNIN AND THE ROUMANIAN JEWS.

According to reports from the Hague, Count Czernin, the Austrian Minister of Foreign Affairs, will in the course of time begin negotiations with Roumania to bring up the question of granting full rights to the Jews in that country.

FRENCH JEW MADE GENERAL.

Colonel Gideon Geismar, of the French Artillery, was promoted to be brigadier-general. He was brought up in orthodox Jewish surroundings and faithfully observes Jewish traditions. As a diversion from his absorbing labors as chief of staff of an army corps before the war, Brigadier-General Geismar devoted much of his leisure to making translations from Hebrew classic works.

INDEPENDENT ORDER B'NAI B'RITH.

District No. 3.

To the Officers and the Members of the Lodges I. O. B. B. of District No. 3:

In assuming the responsibilities of the office of President, I do so fully realizing the duties and the burdens connected therewith; I feel that in carrying into execution the commands of our beloved fraternity I must have the support and loyalty of every member in the District whose heart beats in unison with the principles set forth in the preamble of our Order.

As members of this altruistic Jewish Order it is expected of us to render SERVICE in behalf of the oppressed whenever and wherever the opportunity offers itself, and with this point in view I direct these lines to you calling for volunteers in an undertaking whose only reward will be the satisfaction of having done something towards the upliftment of the Jew. My predecessors in office all endeavored to arouse the enthusiasm of the District, and partly succeeded, nevertheless many members and lodges lost their standing because they forgot the principles of our Order, and so under my presidency I ask each member to give the best which is in him to help establish the largest membership District No. 3 has ever known and to which it is entitled. Our Order has never stood as high and as noble in the esteem of the public, Jew or non-Jew, as it does today; it is gaining recognition as the leading Jewish organization in the world.

Today the great World War has added another duty to the many duties imposed upon us as Jews and loyal Americans—that of looking after our Jewish youth at the cantonments and outside of camp life—which makes for the morale of our boys who are fighting for our country and for us. We can help them materially by giving them the spiritual, social and material want so necessary. Therefore, we, the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, organized the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League, which organization has now merged its activities with the Jewish Board for Welfare Work, thus uniting all WAR WORK under one head; our Order retains its identity by being designated as the B'nai B'rith Branch of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work. It is incumbent upon each of you to give this undertaking your patriotic and loyal support, both personally and financially.

I heartily commend the members of our Order for their unselfish support given to our worthy institution at Erie, Pa., which cares for the orphaned and friendless children of our District, and I ask you to continue to maintain this noble work.

As regards the membership of our Order, I wish to reiterate the injunction given at many lodge institutions that we stand for "Quality" in the character of the candidate and "Quantity" in membership; because members beget strength and induce action, that is why I plead with you to get more members. There are many Jews in this District, men of unblemished character, who are not members of our fraternity; such men you should enroll in our beloved Order and thereby increase your membership numerically. We want the strength and force from those who have it to give, to use as sacrifices for the Cause and for Judaism.

We, therefore, require every son of Israel to uphold the "Banner of Israel," the "Banner of the B'nai B'rith." Be Americans and be Jews, be Americans in the truest sense of the word—living up to the laws of our country, and be Jews—not only by fortune of birth, but Jews by conviction, Jews through love, and Jews by choice.

I sincerely trust that this message will be an incentive and an inspiration to all the members of this District to continue their efforts with increased zeal along the lines of the highest ideals of our fraternity.

Yours in Benevolence, Brotherly Love and Harmony,

MARCUS FEUCHTWANGER,
President.

RUSSIAN JEWS CONSCRIPTED IN ENGLAND.

The high court of appeals in London declared recently that all Russian subjects now in the service of England should remain in the service, since the treaty between Russia and England under which these were drafted is still in force. This decision was rendered in a test case made by a Russian Jew who refused to continue his service in the British army, on the ground that Russia has concluded a peace with the enemy and is therefore no more under any obligation to the Allies. The court, however, decided that since the treaty between the two countries has not as yet been recalled, Russians in England are obliged to serve in the British army.

SOCIAL SERVICE BUREAU.

Now, more than ever, has the need for volunteer service asserted itself, particularly in the lines of social endeavor relating to the welfare of boys and girls. Since the outbreak of the war, juvenile delinquency has increased over 35 per cent in many of our larger cities. Whether this is due to the absence of the older brothers or the parents of the children, or to the general excitement resulting from present conditions, cannot be said. Certain it is that there is not a sufficient number of trained and experienced social workers to direct this highly important phase of social work.

The demand is especially great for boys' workers. In many cities more than half of the Boy Scout troops are without leaders, due to the fact that the scoutmasters have either been drafted or enlisted. Boys' clubs are without leaders. As a result, the recreation and play time of the boys are undirected. Unless this condition is remedied we shall have a still greater increase in juvenile crime. The opportunity is afforded to every member of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith to do his duty in this national crisis. Every city, no matter how large or small, has need for men volunteers to direct this boys' welfare work. It should be the duty of every Social Service Committee to provide in adequate numbers, social workers from among the members of the lodges to supply the demand of the times. It is not essential that men give their entire time to this work and yet they can very easily set aside an evening or two for this very highly important work. Social workers in France and in England have warned us to look after the welfare of our boys so that we may not duplicate the experiences of those countries where the larger cities show an increase in juvenile delinquency of from 60 per cent to 80 per cent.

Some time ago the members of the Order, through their Social Service Committees, were called upon to take active part in the Big Brother Movement. This work has now become even more important than ever. The boys of today must be protected or the United States of the future will suffer from a lack of properly equipped citizens.

MENORAH LODGE OF BALTIMORE.

Compulsory Reading of Bible in Public Schools of Baltimore.

Menorah Lodge, as ever, is always on the alert to see that nothing is done in Baltimore or in the state of Maryland that would in any way be detrimental to Jews or Jewry.

It became known that a bill was reported favorable in the Senate, which bill had already been passed in the House of Delegates, and if passed by the Senate would become a law, providing for compulsory reading of the Bible in public schools in Maryland. This bill penalized the teachers refusing to read the Bible by dismissal and by imposition of a fine.

Telegram was immediately sent to the Senate Committee having charge of this bill asking for a hearing and Brother Joseph M. Zamoiski, president of Menorah Lodge, together with Brother Louis Hollander, immediately requesting influential members of the lodge to be present at Annapolis at this hearing. Those present besides Bros. Joseph M. Zamoiski and Louis Hollander were Rabbis William Rosenau and Charles A. Rubinstein and Brothers Joseph S. Goldsmith, Solomon Mendels and Philip L. Sykes, who is also president of the Local United Hebrew Charities.

As a result of the arguments presented by Menorah Lodge representatives, the Senate Committee decided to submit an unfavorable report which action prevented the passage of this objectionable bill. At its regular meeting Menorah Lodge adopted resolutions thanking the individual members of the committee for their action.

A WORTHY ENTERPRISE.

Ninety per cent of the Jewish soldiers who visit the B'nai B'rith Club established at Chillicothe for the benefit of soldiers of Camp Sherman, hail from Cleveland.

Rabbi Joseph Leiser is superintendent of B'nai B'rith headquarters and in direct charge of B'nai B'rith welfare activities at Camp Sherman. The home-like atmosphere of the club, at Second and Paint streets, Chillicothe, and the welcome accorded there to boys from the camp, have been eloquently depicted in many enthusiastic letters from the boys to the folks at home.

An enterprise of this character merits the enthusiastic backing of the Jewish community of Cleveland.—The Jewish Independent.

An honest man is one of the few great works that can be seen for nothing.—Dickens.

ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE.

The administrative committee of the Anti-Defamation League has met regularly each Tuesday at the Covenant Club. The committee has had to act upon newspapers which publish cartoons casting reflections upon the Jewish people, upon articles of a defamatory nature, upon scurrilous jokes, insinuating poems and various others matters indicating an effort on the part of certain people to arouse prejudice against members of our faith. In nearly each instance it has been possible to secure an apology from the offenders, and in the case of certain instances where such apologies were not offered, steps are being taken to prevent a recurrence of the act of defamation.

In one of the St. Paul papers appeared an advertisement offering furniture for sale to any but Jews. The editors of the paper explained that this advertisement occurred because of an oversight on the part of one of its employees and promised that such ads would not appear again in their paper.

A cartoon appeared in the New York Evening World, casting reflections upon the soldiers of the Jewish faith. The editors of the paper disclaimed any intention on their part to cast any reflections upon the members of our faith.

Through the Anti-Defamation committoo of Denver Lodge, No. 171, Denver, Colo., an instructor was censured for his attempt to teach as facts to students in a normal school, statements which were derogatory to the Jewish people. While it is the wish of the administrative committee that all matters of this kind be handled through the central office, the Anti-Defamation committee of Denver Lodge handled the entire situation so ably that the administrative committee commended the members for their work and left it to them to adjust the matter finally with the instructor and the state authorities.

Articles of an offensive character appeared in the "Roller Monthly", published in Canton, O., and in the "Overland Monthly", published in San Francisco, Cal. The administrative committee is now in communication with the editors of these papers. It is hoped that these papers will not offend again in the future.

A new edition of "The Fairy Tales of the Brothers Grimm" has been issued by Doubleday Page & Co. Among the fables cited is one entitled, "The Jew Among the Thorns". Feeling that this fable will tend to engender among the minds of young people, false ideas of the Jewish people, the administrative committee is negotiating with the publishers of the book with the view of eliminating the fable from all future editions of the work.

GERMAN JEWS AND THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

A conference of delegates of all important Jewish bodies in Germany has been held at Berlin. The Hilfsverein, the Central Union of German Jews, the Union of Liberal Jews, the German Jewish Communal Union, the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order B'nai Brith, the Committee for Eastern Questions, the Zionist Organization, and other bodies were represented. Herr James Simon, Drs. Paul Nathan, Hantke, Klee, and Oppenheimer, Consul-General Landau and Judicial Privy Councillor Cassel took a leading part in the proceedings, which were devoted to arriving at an understanding on united action with reference to the Jewish demands to be presented to the Peace Congress. The gathering took the view that Congress would undoubtedly discuss the Palestinian problem and the status of the Jews in Eastern Europe, and it elected an executive to prepare a plan for united representation on behalf of Jewry. In spite of all difficulties in the matter of obtaining a formula capable of uniting all parties, the prospects of an understanding are regarded as bright in view of the general desire that the Jews should present a common front.

THE JEWS IN THE RUSSIAN CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY.

The Jewish Press Bureau in Stockholm received the following telegraphic communication from Petrograd:

The exact data concerning the elections of Jews in the Constituent Assembly reached us now. As purely Jewish candidates, the following six, representing the national block, were elected: Dr. Brutzkuh, Province of Minsk; A. Goldstein, Province of Podholia; O. Grusenberg and Tiomkin, Province of Kherson; Maase, Province of Mohilew; Syrkin, Province of Kieff. Of all the other Jewish parties the United Socialist (Socialist-Territorialists and the Seimists) only succeeded in electing through an agreement with the S. R. their representative Mr. Davidovitsch, Lvovitsh.

THE AMERICAN SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' WELFARE LEAGUE OF THE INDEPENDENT ORDER OF B'NAI B'RITH

The outstanding feature of the B'nai B'rith welfare work for the past month was the community Seders conducted in the towns adjacent to the cantonments. By a ruling of the War Department and also of the Navy Department, soldiers and sailors of the Jewish faith were granted a forty-two hour furlough so that they might be enabled to spend Seder evening at home with their relatives. In many of the cases, however, the boys lived at too great distances from their camps to take advantage of the furlough and so they appreciated the opportunities to attend services at the B'nai B'rith headquarters. In some instances as many as three hundred men in khaki were present at these Seder services. Wherever possible, arrangements were made to accommodate boys in private homes. This was done to considerable extent, particularly in the city of Houston, Texas.

Camp Dodge, Des Moines, Iowa.

The regular activities of the B'nai B'rith Club were particularly well attended during the past month. An average of one hundred boys per week have been in attendance in the club rooms. Soldier entertainments during the past month included weekly lectures, Saturday night dances, suppers at the various temples, Friday evening services at the Y. M. C. A. Building, dancing parties at the club rooms and musical entertainments.

Camp Grant, Rockford, Ill.

The Jewish boys at Camp Grant were especially favored during the past month by having with them for a splendid musical treat, Cantor Joseph Rosenblatt, of New York City, and his accompanist, Miss S. Weinstock, a youthful protege of Chicago. This latter privilege was afforded through the courtesy of Mr. J. H. Krause, a member of the Rockford committee. A large number of soldiers attended the entertainment. Cantor Rosenblatt's singing was a treat, not only to the soldiers, but to the large number of civilians, both Jewish and non-Jewish who had assembled for the occasion. Miss Weinstock received considerable applause for the solos she rendered on that occasion. At the close of the concert the audience was addressed by Judge Harry Fisher and Max Schulman, of Chicago. The evening closed with the serving of refreshments by the local ladies' committee.

Two Seders were held at the headquarters. At the first Seder 120 soldiers were present and at the second Seder there were present 160 soldiers, besides a number of civilians. The first Seder was conducted by Dr. Felix Levy, of Chicago, who delivered a very stirring address to the men in uniform. Lieut. Col. Kopetsky, of the 311th Sanitary Train, headed a group of commissioned officers who were present for the services. This Seder was given under the auspices of the Ladies' Benevolent Society of Rockford. The second Seder was held under the joint auspices of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith and the Jewish Welfare Board. The services were conducted by Lieut. Harry Okin, Company F, 344th Infantry, a member of David Fish Lodge, No. 130, I. O. B. B., An elaborate printed menu was given to each soldier as a souvenir of this occasion.

Naval Training Station, Great Lakes, Ill.

Elaborate preparations were made to entertain the Jewish boys at the Great Lakes Naval Training Station during the Passover holidays. At the last moment, however, a five-day furlough was granted to all Jewish boys at the training station and so only thirty-five men in uniform were present at the community Seder held at Waukegan under the auspices of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith. Rabbi Lee J. Levinger, of the Jewish Welfare Board, conducted the services. The members of the Order at Chicago are planning to co-operate very extensively with Rabbi Levinger in the welfare work to be conducted at Great Lakes. A series of entertainments has already been planned for the boys, the first of these to take place at Waukegan.

Camp Beauregard, Alexandria, La.

The ban against public dancing and public entertainments is still in force in Alexandria. Several entertainments, however, have been held under the auspices of the local members of the B'nai B'rith Soldiers' Welfare Committee. An entertainment in which the soldiers themselves participated, was held at the B'nai B'rith Hall on March 10. One hundred and fifty soldiers and seventy-five civilians were present. An average of forty-five boys have visited the B'nai B'rith headquarters during the past month.

Camp Logan, Houston, Texas.

The attendance continues to be very large at the B'nai B'rith headquarters. As many as a thousand soldiers have visited the headquarters during one single week.

A series of entertainments given both at the headquarters and at the various other clubs in the city were held during the past month. One of the most interesting entertainments given for the soldiers was a musical entertainment held at the Concordia Club. Francis Johlie, known as the "Al H. Wilson of Camp Logan", the well known cartoonist M. Newman and Ernest Largimaccino, the Camp Logan Caruso, were among the numbers on the program. The following Saturday night an entertainment was given at the B'nai B'rith club house, in which all of the numbers were rendered by men in uniform. The program included piano and violin solos, ukalele and mandolin duets and sleight of hand performances.

Too much praise cannot be given to the members of the local committee for their successful efforts in placing so many of the Jewish men in private homes for the Passover holidays. Temple Beth Israel had over 200 men present at the services. Adath Yeshurun Synagogue had over 100 men present. Temple Adath Israel and Adath Emmeth also reported large numbers of men in uniform. All but 29 of the more than one thousand Jewish men at Camp Logan were provided for in the homes of their co-religionists. The 29 participated in a community Seder prepared especially for their benefit.

Camp Bowie, Fort Worth, Texas.

The work of the month of March was exceptionally trying and difficult, due to the preparations of accommodating the Jewish soldiers in private homes for the first two days of Passover. All the suitable families in the city were solicited and tabulated as to the number and class of soldiers they would desire to entertain for the holidays. Then the soldiers were interviewed personally in the camps to see whether they would accept an invitation to a private home. Then the soldiers were assigned to the families, and personal invitations sent them. The result was that one hundred and twenty-eight soldiers were placed in homes for the two days. Fifty-one, who live in nearby Texas and Oklahoma towns, went home, and ten refused invitations or were unable to accept them on account of duty. One soldier in the guardhouse of one of the infantry regiments was furnished with all the Pesach necessities and dainties and a few other commodities. Most of the men in the Royal Flying Corps, stationed at Taliaferro Fields, received furloughs for the entire eight days. The majority of them are spending the eight days in Jewish homes here in the city. Matzos were distributed to every regiment and company, and a special diet was offered to the Jewish boys, except in a few cases, where the petty officers either neglected their duty, or were mean enough to try to "put one over" on the Jewish boys.

In some cases where it was seen fit that a furlough be extended, our efforts were put to it and successfully carried out.

During the month of March, sixteen visits were made to Camp Bowie and the base hospital by Rabbi Blumenthal and Mr. Wolffson. At the present time, we are glad to say, there is not, to our knowledge, one Jewish soldier sick at the base hospital. There were a few soldiers sick the first of this month with pneumonia, but they all recovered. They were visited and looked after while at the hospital. A number of times, as for instance when the men had to be seen concerning accommodations for Pesach, and the whole camp had to be covered from end to end, we were forced to hire a car, as it was impossible to cover the ground on foot. Seven visits were made to the three wings of Taliaferro Fields during the month, some of them with the purpose of interviewing the men concerning Passover, and some of them for extension of furloughs, etc. It is absolutely necessary to hire a car to go to any of the wings of Taliaferro Field, as they are at a distance from the city.

Affairs at the Hebrew Institute.

During the month of March, ten large affairs were given at the Institute. These were all well attended, the attendance averaging from one hundred to one hundred and twenty-five soldiers at an affair. Refreshments were served at some of the affairs, as we still had some punch on hand that we purchased a while before. There are also soldiers at the Institute every evening, some writing letters, others reading books, playing pool, listening to the music of the grafanola or the pianos, or using the gymnasium floor. We can say that there were approximately 1,400 visits made to the Institute during the month.

During the holidays, the attendance of soldiers at the services of both reform and orthodox congregations was about 40 per cent of the boys who remained in town, that is, about forty-five soldiers attending. This morning, Sunday, March 31, a soldiers' religious service was started at Temple Beth El. There were fifteen men in uniform present, but this is encouraging considering the fact that it was Muster Sunday, and the men had to be mustered in for their pay. We expect to have an attendance of at least fifty men next Sunday. Our plan is this: There is a short religious service, beginning at 11 o'clock, including talks from the soldiers themselves, discussions on Jewish topics, etc. After the service, the men are all invited out for dinner by the townspeople, who come after them. On next Sunday morning, Lieut. Col. Lapowski will deliver an address. He is the highest ranking Jewish officer at Camp Bowie.

On Thursday evening, March 21, a Jewish flying cadet of the Royal Flying Corps, completing his course at Taliaferro Field No. 1, fell 4,000 feet to his death. His body was shipped to New York City, the residence of his parents, for burial. This is the second Jewish cadet to meet death at this field. So far, no Jewish soldiers have died from any sort of illness at Camp Bowie.

SEDER SERVICE BY SHOLEM LODGE, LEAVENWORTH, KAN.

Under the auspices of Sholem Lodge, No. 78, of Leavenworth, Kan., Seder Service was held in the Federal Prison of Leavenworth, Kan. Covers were laid for sixty, thirty-five of which were for the inmates and the remainder for officials of the institution and members of the lodge. The supper was daintily prepared by the Jewish ladies of the city and there was abundance for all, notwithstanding the high cost of living.

Bro. Morris Abeles, who looks after the spiritual welfare of the Jewish inmates called the assembly to order and presented Dr. H. H. Meyer, of Kansas City, who was selected to conduct the Seder. Following the conclusion of supper, various musical numbers interspersed with select readings were carried out. Rabbi Meyer delivered the principal address. He explained the meaning of the Seder, and when he concluded with "We shall be able to lift up the cup of salvation and call upon the name of the Lord" he was greeted with round after round of applause. One of the inmates made the closing remarks expressing deep appreciation for the kindness shown. The singing of "America" was the finale to the best Seder service ever given in a corrective institution.

ENTERTAINMENT BY B'NAI B'RITH FOR SOLDIERS.

One of the most entertaining programs yet attempted was given by the B'nai B'rith Soldiers' Welfare League at their headquarters on Saturday evening, March 30, 1918. Professionals from Camp Logan and Ellington Field rendered attractive numbers. Dancing concluded the evening's program, which was as follows:

Violin solo	Private Alfred Rusch, of 129th Machine Gun Company.
Piano Solo	E. W. Young. Ellington Field.
Ukalele and songs	Fred Schofield
The magical wizard	Fred Furman
Violin solo	Carl Schumacher
Piano Duet	Brigham and Lloyd of 124th Machine Gun Battery.
Numbers	124th Machine Gun Trio Privates Van Hesley, E. R. Ridgley and O. W. Cooke, accompanied by ukalele, piano, violin and mandolin.
The surprise	One of the 108th Engineers' real artists.

SOCIAL SERVICE.

A Suggestion for the Organized Community.

The following folder issued by the Social Service Committee of District No. 7, of which Rabbi Emil W. Leipsziger is chairman, is well worth the attention of every Ben B'rith. It is the hope of the director of the Social Service Bureau that the members of the Social Service committees of the various lodges throughout the country will make use of this folder in stimulating social service activities among the members of their respective lodges.

He was an ardent Ben B'rith, but he wanted to be just. So he said, "There is no need for B'nai B'rith social service in our community. We have a federation of charities whose trained forces do all the necessary work".

His companion was no more ardent in B'nai B'rith idealism, but he had a divine curiosity, "Let's see about it", he retorted.

He visited the county jail. He found a young man there of Jewish home and parentage. The authorities hadn't notified the federation worker. Our Ben B'rith took a personal interest in the delinquent young man, gained his confidence, found out his sordid story. He didn't do the foolish thing and use his energy and influence to "let the young man off", but he helped him re-establish his relations with his home, he got under the young man's skin the idea that a human being—not a cold organization—was interested in him, and when the unfortunate had served his term he found some one to help him re-adjust himself to society.

Again our loyal Ben B'rith with an inquiring turn of mind induced a brother of the same mold to visit the wards of a local hospital. The patients were well cared for, he found. They had the best of medical care. They were living on wholesome food, as much as their physical condition would warrant. Yet the visitor brought something they needed. The personal touch of friendship, the sympathy that leads to trust and confidence and therefore to little intimate services of friendship.

Encouraged by his discoveries in the field of human need our first Ben B'rith went to the office of the local federation and inquired thus of the superintendent: "Among the families which you are helping aren't there some growing boys who are doing their share in the family struggle for existence and who might be encouraged by a strong man's friendship"? Certinly there were and our curious brother got in touch with one or two of these young men, directed them into helpful associations, lifted them gradually to be worthy of better positions. He became a Big Brother to them, and the superintendent of relief acquired in him a sympathetic volunteer worker.

Our second brother of inquiring mind continued his explorations too. One of his little brothers developed tuberculosis. Of course the Federation Relief Agency took care of the case, sent the unfortunate to a local outdoor camp and finally sent him to a western sanitarium, but our brother's interest didn't end here. "How did this young fellow develop tuberculosis"? The question drove him to the family's record which showed that it had only a few months before been rescued from intolerable living and housing conditions. "We haven't a very good housing law in our state", the superintendent volunteered. "Why not"? he flashed back. "That's the citizen's problem—that's your problem", retorted the busy case worker. And from that time on our explorer in the social field became active in the local Housing Association and Anti-Tuberculosis League.

One day our interested brother and three or four others who had been more or less active in the same manner met by chance and swapped experiences. One was interested in anti-tuberculosis, because a family in which he was interested had become victim to the dread White Plague; another was visiting the Juvenile Court because he had discovered his first "Little Brother" there and he wanted to be helpful to others; a third was interested in plans to help the delinquent because a ward of his was soon to come out of the county jail, and had to be adjusted to his family and economic life. So they listened to one another's experiences and hopes and one of them said, "Let's organize this effort and divide the labor, and let's meet occasionally and counsel about our problems", and so out of the interest and the intelligent sympathy of a few loyal brethren who wished to translate B'nai B'rith ideals into action, there was formed a model Social Service Committee.

The drum makes a big noise, but the silent baton leads the orchestra.

The Jewish Press Bureau in Stockholm has received the following telegraphic communication from Petrograd:

The Jewish officers and soldiers of the Petrograd garrison have been formed into a special Jewish military unit under the command of Captain Trumpeldor. B'NAI B'RITH OF CHICAGO.

Ramah Lodge.

A well attended meeting of Ramah Lodge, No. 33, I. O. B. B. was held at the Covenant Club on Monday, April 8, 1918. A class of 18 candidates was initiated by the Degree Team of the lodge and a number of applications for membership were presented.

The entertainment committee submitted final report showing as a result of the minstrel show, $1400.00 was realized for the benefit of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare Fund.

A communication was presented from the District Grand Lodge calling attention to the Diamond Jubilee of the Order which is to be celebrated on October 1, 1918, and calling upon the lodges to secure 3,000 new members during the year as an anniversary gift to the Order. A special propaganda committee with Bro. O. G. Finkelstein as chairman was appointed to take charge of the campaign for members and judging from the enthusiasm with which the assignment of 750 of the quota of the lodge was received, there is no doubt that the lodge will more than secure the stipulated number.

A four-minute talk on behalf of the Third Liberty Loan was made by the secretary of the lodge and a number of subscriptions amounting to over $30,000 were secured and in addition thereto a committee of 15 was appointed to make a special effort among the members of the lodge to secure liberal subscriptions to the loan.

The lodge was also honored by the presence of Bro. H. D. Frankel, of St. Paul, First Vice-President of the District Grand Lodge, and Bro. Dr. Harry Kraus, Second Vice-President of the District Grand Lodge. Brother Frankel addressed the lodge on the work of the Order and his remarks were enthusiastically received. The lodge also resolved to invest $1,000 in the Third Liberty Loan Bonds.

Oriental-Hillel Lodge.

On Monday, April 1, 1918, Oriental-Hillel Lodge, No. 72, I. O. B. B., held a well attended meeting. A number of candidates were initiated and several applications for membership were presented. The lodge appointed several important committees, one on propaganda in response to the appeal of the District Grand Lodge to secure the quota of 500 members expected from the lodge in connection with the Diamond Jubilee of the Order; the other the Liberty Loan Committee to secure subscriptions from among the members and in addition thereto the lodge decided to invest $1,000 of its funds for the same purpose.

A special feature of the meeting was an address by Bro. Dr. Felix A. Levy, who spoke on the subject, "The Jew as an Aristocrat". His address met with much favor and at its conclusion a rising vote of thanks was extended to the speaker.

David Fish Lodge.

An unusually well attended meeting of David Fish Lodge, No. 130, was held at the Covenant Club on Monday, March 18, 1918. The officers of the lodge are making every effort to make the meetings well attended and successful. To that end prominent speakers are being invited to address the lodge from time to time. At this meeting Mr. Robert E. Cantwell, an eminent lawyer and orator, addressed the lodge on the subject, "The Jew as a Patriot". The regular order of business of the lodge was closed at 9 o'clock and the doors were opened to the public. A large number of ladies and friends availed themselves of the privilege to attend the lecture.

Covenant Club of Chicago.

An unusually large attendance was present at the noon day meeting of the Covenant Club on Saturday, April 6, 1918, the occasion being the celebration of the first anniversary of the opening of the club, as well as the ushering in of the campaign for the third Liberty Loan.

Mr. R. E. Paterson Kline of Chicago honored the occasion with his presence and delivered a most forceful address on the subject of "The War and the Necessity of Supporting the Goverment by Means of Purchase of Liberty Bonds".

A special committee of ladies with Mrs. A. B. Seelenfreund as chairman, was actively engaged in securing subscriptions and as a result of their efforts more than $40,000 was secured from among those present for the purchase of Liberty Bonds. Arrangements are being made whereby this committee meets daily at the club and it is expected that before the campaign is over at least $1,000,000 worth of Liberty Bonds will be purchased by members of the club.

I've never found by pickin' yet
That I could make a dry day wet;
But I can make a wet day fair
By putting on a smiling air.

B'NAI B'RITH OF SAN FRANCISCO.

The Junior B'nai B'rith of Golden Gate Lodge, No. 129, of San Francisco, has a membership of 125 sturdy youths who when their time comes will make worthy members of the Order. They meet twice a month, one meeting being for business and the other for intellectual and educational purposes. The gymnasium is largely attended and forms one of the chief attractions for the young men who receive aside from their intellectual training in the lodge which is conducted with all parliamentary laws, the requisite physical training to fit them for a hardy manhood.

At the meeting of Golden Gate Lodge, No. 129, held on Wednesday, April 17, 1918, Hon. A. T. Barnett addressed the lodge.

At the meeting of the lodge held on March 6, the delegates to the recent Grand Lodge convention submitted an exhaustive report of the convention's doings, of Fresno's hospitality and the hearty welcome extended to the delegates and their ladies.

The first two meetings of the committee of fifty representing the San Francisco lodges were the largest and most enthusiastic from the standpoint of attendance for sometime past. Various plans for the ensuing year were submitted and agreed upon.

On Monday, March 25, 1918, the San Francisco lodges had the honor of welcoming and listening to Bro. Adolf Kraus, of Chicago, President of the Order. Before a large audience Brother Kraus spoke in a sincere and convincing manner, which endeared him to his listeners. He told of the various activities of the Order and of the good results achieved therefrom.

Cremieux Lodge, No. 325, was favored with a lecture by Bro. Dr. Herman Rosenwasser at the conclusion of the regular meeting held on April 8, 1918, at the B'nai B'rith Building. Dr. Rosenwasser's subject was "The Return of Israel from Babylonian Exile, and Present Day Zionism, a Parallel Study".

A unified set of by-laws has been prepared by a joint committee representing the three local women's auxiliaries of the B'nai B'rith. Various conflicts are avoided thereby and the management of the three organizations is to be along similar lines.

Under the auspices of the Ladies' Auxiliaries of the B'nai B'rith, a patriotic dance was given in the Scottish Rite Hall on Sunday evening, April 14. The committee in charge spared neither time nor expense to make the affair one long to be remembered by those in attendance. Soldiers and sailors in uniform attended in large numbers as guests of the auxiliaries.

Elaborate arrangements were made by Columbia, Modin and Ophir Auxiliaries of the Daughters of the Covenant for a ball given by them on Sunday evening, April 14, 1918. The affair was arranged in honor of soldiers and sailors. Men in uniform were admitted free.

Mr. Adolf Kraus, of Chicago, President of the Order, and Mrs. Kraus enjoyed a brief stay in San Francisco before returning to their home in Chicago. During their stay they were the recipients of much attention from members of the Order. On Saturday afternoon, March 23, they were the guests of the general committee of the District Grand Lodge on a trip to Oakland, Alameda and Berkeley. On Sunday they were taken by the general committee on a trip to San Jose, stopping for short visits at Camp Freeman and Stanford University. On Monday evening the general membership of the Order in San Francisco tendered President Kraus a dinner at the hotel and Mrs. Kraus was the guest of members of the ladies' auxiliaries. President Kraus was the honored guest and speaker at a joint meeting of the San Francisco lodges, on which occasion he delivered an inspiring message on the work of the Order and its aims.

The ladies committee of the three local auxiliaries of the Daughters of the Covenant held its annual election and elected Mrs. Milton Meyer, the wife of the First Vice-President of the District Grand Lodge, as chairman. The committee is planing extensive work for the welfare of soldiers and sailors. A degree team is also being formed.

Captain S. Leonard Goord, of the British Army addressed the members of Montefiore Lodge, No. 51, at a well attended meeting held April 1, delivering a message from the European front.

The good soldier has learned that hardest lesson of all—the lesson of self-subordination to a higher and bigger personality. He has learned to sacrifice everything which belongs to him individually to a cause that is far greater than any personal ambitions of his own can ever be.

PATRIOTIC RALLIES IN DISTRICT NO. 1.

President Maurice P. Davidson, of District No. 1, has issued a patriotic call to all the lodges in the district urging them to hold patriotic mass meetings for the purpose of assisting the government in the sale of the Third Liberty Loan Bonds.

A patriotic rally was held at B'nai B'rith headquarters, New York City, on April 6, the anniversary of the entrance of the United States into the war. The meeting was presided over by President Davidson, who made the opening address. Hon. Abram I. Elkus, Ex-Ambassador to Turkey, followed President Davidson, with an interesting talk on conditions in Europe as contrasted with conditions here. Mr. Elkus referred very appreciatively to President Davidson's eloquent address and commended the patriotic efforts of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith which has always been a power for good in the country.

There was also a very interesting address by Mr. Owen Turtle, who represented the government on the occasion. There were some very fine musical numbers. An interesting feature of the evening was the music furnished by the Hebrew Orphan Asylum Band.

Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan, of New York, Grand Secretary of District No. 1, addressed a gathering of citizens under the auspices of the local B'nai B'rith Lodge in the Grand Army Hall. Dr. Kaplan spoke on "Loyalty and Our Duty to Our Country in the Present War". He said in part:

"Jewish loyalty is 100 per cent; it might be more, but certainly not less. No sacrifices we make are too great for our humane government, which, like the government of England, is protecting and respecting the Jewish citizens as an integral part of the United States without any discrimination whatsoever. The Jews are the martyrs of history. No people in the history of the world have made such sacrifices for ideals. Patriotism is part of our religion and therefore when we are making sacrifices on the altar of patriotism, it is like making sacrifices on the altar of religion in the purest sense of the term.

"The ideals of Americanism and Judaism are practically similar, American institutions are founded in the principles of liberty, equality and fraternity. Liberty was taught by our religion thousands of years ago, and 'Ye shall proclaim liberty throughout the world' was one of the first teachings in the Bible—words which found lodgment on the American Liberty Bell. The Jewish Bible, which is the Magna Charta of civilization, says that there shall be but one manner of law for all. Here you have the American principle of equality; and as to fraternity, it is expressed in the Old Testament, which says, 'Love thy neighbor as thyself'. We are not all of the draft age. It is not given to everyone to serve in the army, but we can all render service in other ways".

Others who spoke included Attorney Henry Lasker, Attorney Fred Cohn, Fred Rubinowitz and Paul Kramer, of Springfield; also M. Spies and M. Hirsch, of Holyoke.

BARNETT LODGE, NO. 754, FORREST CITY, ARK.

The celebration of B'nai B'rith Day at Wynne, Ark., on March 24, 1918, by Barnett Lodge, No. 754, of Forrest City, Ark., was an unqualified success in every detail.

The exercises were opened by the rendition of "America" by the orchestra of the Wynne High School, with the audience in chorus.

Prayer by Rev. Mr. Newell, pastor of the Wynne Methodist Church.

Hon. Benjamin Hirsch, of Memphis, the principal speaker, and guest of honor, was introduced by Prof. Willis, superintendent of the Wynne High School.

The brilliant oration delivered by the distinguished visitor from Memphis rang true to the spirit of patriotism, benevolence, brotherly love and harmony and contained many inspired references to the noble principles of the I. O. B. B.

At the conclusion of his remarks Mr. Hirsch made an impassioned appeal for a contribution in behalf of the war sufferers, the Red Cross Society and the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital, which resulted in subscriptions from the audience amounting to about $500, which will be prorated equally between the three worthy charities mentioned above.

The celebration closed with the spirited singing and playing of "The Star Spangled Banner" bv the audience and the Wynne High School orchestra.

The committee of Wynne citizens who had charge of the conduct and arrangement of this most enjoyable event was made up of S. Daltroff, J. Abramson and M. Drexler.

TESTIMONIAL MEETING.

Sunday afternoon, March 24, 1918, witnessed one of the most unique as well as praiseworthy events, ever staged in a B'nai B'rith lodge room.

Braddock Lodge, No. 516, was the scene of action, and the story of what happened and how it occurred, will be of interest to all readers of the B. B. News.

Braddock Lodge prides itself in having on its roster, Bro. Louis Sulzbacher, who for the past seventeen years has given his life to the advancement of the Order, sacrificing personal interest, so that the B'nai B'rith might grow and thrive; the unselfish devotion of this man, who, with no mercenary intent, nor hope for reward, gave his time, money, his pleasures, and a great deal of his home-life, that those less fortunate than himself, might be assisted along the thorny path of life; that the B'nai B'rith might prosper so as to be always a bulwark against the assaults of an unsympathetic world; appealed to the imagination of Bro. David Margoff, chairman of the propaganda committee of Braddock Lodge, and from his brain, emanated one of the grandest, noblest ideas that have ever been advanced by a Ben B'rith.

Knowing that Brother Sulzbacher represents the New York Life Insurance Co., he conceived the plan of organizing a campaign to secure from among his many friends, applications to the amount of $10,000 for insurance, and to turn this over to Brother Sulzbacher as a substantial evidence of the esteem in which he is held; for weeks, Brother Margoff with his committee, labored day and night to accomplish this end, and on the above date, in a tastefully decorated meeting hall, with a large attendance of its members, together with brothers from Pittsburgh, McKeesport and surrounding cities, occurred one meeting, the memory of which will linger long in the minds of those fortunate enough to be in attendance, had the pleasure of handing Brother Sulzbacher the pledges set out to secure.

The enthusiasm knew no bounds; a happier gathering would be hard to imagine; and Brother Sulzbacher (accustomed as he is to expressing himself in the lodge room), was so overcome by this beautiful and practical tribute, that his emotions completely overcame him, and he was unable to give expression to his feelings, but everyone knows him well enough to understand that in due time, this appreciative and grateful man will pay his dues.

The meeting was honored bv the presence of Past District Presidents, Brothers O. H. Rosenbaum and A. L. Solomon, who, together with every member present, expressed their sentiments in a very pleasing manner (much to the dislike of our diffident brother), and when the lodge closed (after four hours session) each carried home the consciousness of having witnessed a genuine exemplification of the principles of our Order: "Benevolence, Brotherly Love, Harmony".

HENRY S. SULZBACHER,
Secretary.

SEATTLE, WASH.

Rainier Lodge, No. 627, held a large meeting on Wednesday evening, March 6. There were speeches, a program and refreshments and they had the largest attendance for several months. After the business session the brethren adjourned across the hall where was spread a festive board. Miss Bertha Freyd favored the assemblage with piano recitals which were excellently played. The talk of the evening was delivered by Sol A. Herzog, debate coach at the university. His topic was "The Jew as a Fighter".

On the first evening of Pesach, Rabbi Louis I. Eggelson arranged a Seder and Passover celebration for the benefit of the Jewish soldiers stationed at Camp Lewis, Wash., at the B'nai B'rith club house which was particularly inspiring to the men and was thoroughly enjoyed by all.

B'NAI B'RITH OF CLEVELAND.

The Junior Circle, B'nai B'rith, held a campaign for membership and succeeded in securing one hundred new members.

In order to bring the members of the various organizations which meet at the B'nai B'rith Building in close contact, a congress of clubs has been formed in which each body is represented. This congress offers to assist the clubs represented to make any of their activities a success.

On Saturday evening, March 23, a most interesting debate took place between the the Atozee and Utopian Clubs of Junior B'nai B'rith in competition for the Bernard B. Given trophy. The subject of the debate was "Resolved that the Preferential Ballot be Abolished". The Atozee Club took the affirmative and the Utopians opposed. The debate proved most interesting and instructive to all present, and the affirmative won by the majority vote of three judges. The latter were Judge Morgan, Messrs. A. Lewenthal and P. J. Mercine. Miss Lily Spero renderd two vocal selections. Dancing in the B'nai B'rith ballroom followed the debate.

On Sunday evening, March 31, the Junior B'nai B'rith gave a dance which proved an enjoyable affair.

Cleveland Lodge, No. 16, gave its second annual Passover dance on Sunday evening, March 31, which proved the most enjoyable evening to all those who attended. Soldiers and sailors if accompanied by ladies were admitted free.

A community Seder was given in the B'nai B'rith Building on Thursday evening, March 28, under the auspices of the Cleveland Lodge and the Junior Auxiliary Council. The various congregations and Jewish societies of Cleveland were represented. College students and soldiers, who otherwise would have no opportunity of participating in the Passover celebration, attended in large numbers. In every sense, it was a "Community Seder".

A committee of rabbis carried out the religious services.

ABRAHAM LODGE, BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

By Harry J. Fox.

At a meeting held on Sunday afternoon, March 17, at the Young Men's Hebrew Association rooms, the officers of the new Jewish Welfare and Activities League were elected.

Abraham Lodge, No. 89, I. O. B. B., Bridgeport, Conn., District No. 1, was honored. Past president, Jacob B. Klein, was elected president; Bro. Dr. Simon L. Katzoff was elected financial secretary, and Bro. Joseph Quint was elected vice-president. They and Bro. President Henry Greenstein were appointed by Abraham Lodge as delegates. Other officers of the league are Mr. Joseph Zeigler, a prominent business man who, was elected treasurer; Mrs. Lawrence Finkelstone, who was elected vice-president, and Miss Ida Ruth Wainer, who was elected secretary.

The scope of the work of the league is to co-operate with all Jewish synagogues, the Temple, lodges, clubs, societies and fraternity organizations in general representing Jewish activities for the good and welfare of Jewish soldiers and sailors now in the service.

At the meeting special committees were appointed and the work assigned would necessitate the co-operation of every individual member. It was the consensus of opinion that by co-operating, the working of all concerned would be more easily accomplished. The thought of making us such a league was made last November in Abraham Lodge. It met with the approval of all Jewish activities organizations.

We will have an honor roll placed in a most appropriate place in our lodge rooms with the names of our members that are now in the service of Uncle Sam. The Degree Team will make an effort to win one of the prizes offered by the Grand Lodge. Arrangement committee have on its list a number of prominent speakers who are to address us at the educational meetings. Abraham Lodge is making rapid strides and will lead the district in making its meetings most pleasant and entertaining for its membership.

CONNELLSVILLE, PA.

Connellsville Lodge, No. 801, of Connellsville, Pa., held a reception and dance for the benefit of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League on Tuesday evening, March 12, 1918. The affair was one of the first held by the lodge and was pronounced the most successful event held within the past year. A generous sum was realized and the proceeds will be devoted entirely to the welfare of the Jewish soldiers and sailors. A number of visitors were present from Mt. Pleasant, Greensburg, Uniontown, and Morgantown, W. Va.

PATRIOTIC MEETING BY M'KEESPORT LODGE, M'KEESPORT, Pa.

In honor of over forty Jewish young men of McKeesport community who are serving in the United States Army in France and in camps in this country a Service Flag was dedicated with elaborate ceremonies at a patriotic meeting held on April 7, 1918, under the auspices of McKeesport Lodge No. 573 of McKeesport, Pa.

Eloquent addresses were made, the speakers paying high tribute to the boys and urging the people at home to buy Liberty bonds and thrift stamps and to aid the Red Cross.

A specially fine musical program was furnished by Prof. Frank Rybka. The meeting was opened with the singing of "America". This was followed by an address by Rabbi M. A. Alsted, master of ceremonies. In his remarks he said that 10,000 Jews were in the army in England, 60,000 American Jewish boys are in the American army and this number will be increased to 100,000 in all branches of service before long.

Following this address the Service Flag was dedicated. Bro. Morris Krow, secretary of McKeesport Lodge read the honor roll and those present heartily applauded as each name was called. Brother Marcus Feuchtwanger of New Castle, president of District Grand Lodge No. 3, gave an inspirational talk.

He referred to the B'nai Brith as the only international unselfish Jewish fraternity and said the order was different from others because the membership gets nothing from the assessments paid. He told of the workings of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare league and then recounted his experiences at many of the army cantonments which he had visited.

At the conclusion of the musical program the meeting was closed with the singing of "The Star-Spangled Banner". The hall was beautifully decorated for the occasion. American flags were used in profusion. The pictures of the boys in service occupied a conspicuous place on the stage. Members of Troop 3 of the Boy Scouts were the ushers. Neat programs were distributed containing the names of the members of the lodge in service and also the evening's program.

WINNIPEG LODGE, WINNIPEG, CANADA.

Winnipeg Lodge No. 650 held their regular meeting on Thursday, April 4, at which there was a large attendance. After the regular order of business was finished, a discussion on Zionism took place, which led to a resolution being introduced by Brother M. J. Finkelstein, and which was passed unanimously. The resolution was as follows:

IN VIEW OF the recent declaration of the British Government favoring the re-establishment in Palestine of a National Home for the Jewish people,

AND IN VIEW OF the arrival in Jerusalem on the first day of Passover of a Jewish administrative commission under the chairmanship of Professor Chaim Waitzman of England,

AND IN VIEW OF the imminent establishment of the said commission as a Provisional Jewish Government with the offical consent of Great Britain,

BE IT RESOLVED, THAT we, the members of Winnipeg Lodge No. 650, of the Independent Order of B'nai Brith, place on record our heartfelt wishes for the success of the commission in its great task of initiating the systematic restoration of Palestine and the return of Israel to the land of Israel's desire and destiny; and we heartily concur in and approve of the plans and endeavors directed towards the creation for the Jewish people of a publicly legally secured National Home in the land of Israel.

AND BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED, THAT a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the District Grand Lodge of our Order (and if necessary to the Constitutional Grand Lodge) respectfully, requesting it to similarly define its attitude and to instruct its subordinate lodges accordingly so that the voice of the Independent Order B'nai Brith may be heard throughout Jewry calling our people in the name of benevolence, brotherly love and harmony to the great task of Restoration.

Golland, Mr. Oscar Leonard and Dr. Samuel Sale. Judge Samuel Rosenfeld presided. The subject of the debate was "Resolved, That a Jewish Autonomous State in Palestine Should be Established". SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan of New York, Secretary of District Grand Lodge No. 1, addressed a gathering of citizens under the auspices of Springfield Lodge No. 684 of Springfield, Mass., on March 19, 1918. Dr. Kaplan spoke on "Loyalty and Our Duty to Our Country in the Present War".

"Jewish loyalty is 100 per cent; it might be more, but certainly not less. No sacrifices we make are too great for our humane government, which, like the government of England, is protecting and respecting the Jewish citizens as an integral part of the United States without any discrimination whatsoever. The Jews are the martyrs of history. No people in the history of the world have made such sacrifices for ideals. Others who spoke included Attorney Henry Lasker, Attorney Fred Cohn, Fred Rubinowitz and Paul Kramer of Springfield; also M. Spies and M. Hirsch of Holyoke.

GREAT PATRIOTIC MEETING OF THE CINCINNATI LODGE, NO. 4.

On the evening of March 25 there was held in the new and beautiful Rockdale Avenue Temple Annex a great patriotic meeting by the Cincinnati Lodge, No. 4, for the purpose of impressing upon the minds of the members and their friends the importance of grasping the very serious conditions at present existing and the necessity for putting forward every effort to help the government in this crisis. Bro. Dr. David Philipson, rabbi of the Temple, presided, and after a few powerful introductory remarks, presented the speakers of the evening, Mayor John Galvin and James G. Stewart, a noted local orator. Mayor Galvin, while complimenting the Jews on the splendid part they had played in local matters, reminded his hearers that the real test of their patriotism was just beginning and that they must prepare themselves for still greater sacrifices. Mr. Stewart devoted himself more to the matter of the Third Liberty Loan and in fervent words pictured the horrors of this war and the stern necessity for unified and self-sacrificing effort on the part of every man, woman and even child. All the speakers made a profound impression and were frequently interrupted by loud applause. There was in addition a fine musical program. President Sidney L. Rosin was in charge. Brother Rosin is one of the most earnest workers the lodge has ever had and is devoting a great deal of his time to the securing of new members and otherwise enhancing the welfare of the lodge and the Order.

MAHONING LODGE, NO. 339, YOUNGSTOWN. OHIO.

Members of Youngstown B'nai B'rith fought tears Sunday afternoon as one of their national brothers working for Uncle Sam—Sidney G. Kusworm—told them of their duties to the men who are giving their all to the cause of America and the world to win the big fight.

Mr. Kusworm came from Dayton. He is secretary of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare Association and a member of the Washington board of the American Defense Society. He spoke at 3 Sunday afternoon in Forester's Hall to the largest gathering of B'nai B'rith members which ever turned out to greet a patriotic speaker. He showed the duty of the Order to those who will come back crippled, maimed and incapacitated and made a deep and lasting impression. The welfare association is a branch of B'nai B'rith. Following the address, the local organization pledged its best and untiring efforts to help America in every way not only to prosecute the big fight but care for those who are damaged in the awful carnage.

Minzesheimer, the venerable treasurer of the Home for the Aged, in Yonkers, giving his reminiscences of the Civil War in which he served as captain in the cavalry. Bro. Minzesheimer's address was so illuminating and interesting that he has been asked by several patriotic organizations to repeat his address. He was also invited by the Henry Jones Lebanon Lodge to give a second talk on his interesting reminiscences of the Civil War. The president of the lodge is Bro. What Our Lodges Are Doing

B'NAI B'RITH OF DENVER.

On March 25, 1918, Denver Lodge gave a dance at the Progress Club, which was exclusively for its members and their ladies.

The Social Service Big Brother Committee of the lodge arranged a Seder for the boys in the Industrial School at Golden. The Jewish Women's Council prepared the meal.

A teacher in one of the state colleges of Colorado, in a recent lecture on "The Jewish Race", claimed that they were responsible for the introduction of the white slave traffic in this country; and that while statistics show that there were fewer Jewish criminals than in any other race, it is due to the fact that they are shrewder and on that account are able to escape the consequences of their crimes. The Anti-Defamation Committee of the lodge has entered a protest against the false and wrong impression this teacher must have created in the minds of his pupils. Some interesting letters have passed between the professor and the committee. It is evident that he is decidedly prejudiced in his attitude towards the Jew. He claims to have secured his data from a book by Professor Edward A. Ross, who, it is well known, attempted to arouse antagonism against Jewish immigration in this country and hardly a fair authority.

KANSAS CITY LODGE, KANSAS CITY, MO.

A "Worth While" meeting of Kansas City Lodge, No. 184, of Kansas City, Mo., was held on Feb. 25, 1918. This was an open cultural meeting and was held at the Temple. It was a new departure being open to the ladies who responded by a large attendance to the invitation extended them.

The principal speaker of the evening was Captain Jacob Frank, Camp Quartermaster of Camp Funston. His many years of army experience enabled him to present many interesting experiences, and the audience was deeply interested in his review of camp life appertaining to his branch, and especially in the Jewish phases of camp life. A generous volley of questions was sufficient proof of the keen interest manifested by his hearers.

Mr. Herman Passamaneck urged the lodge to take up actively and seriously the "Big Brother Movement", and steps will be forthwith taken. A musical program was rendered during the evening, and refreshments were served.

The success of this meeting insures the attendance for the future cultural meetings that are now being arranged for, and members are urged to watch for and attend all meetings.

EDAR LODGE, SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS.

The B'nai B'rith constituting Edar Lodge, No. 211 and Leo N. Levi Lodge, No. 675, are conspicuous in everything tending to promote the interests commercial, social and communal of San Antonio.

Edar Lodge has been in existence over four decades of years. Many of its charter members are still actively connected with the organization, and several of its members have been honored on occasion by the District Grand Lodge, and have occupied prominent positions in that body. In all its years of existence the members of Edar Lodge have been in harmony with the work of the district, and particularly here they have of late years entered with zest in the plans outlined in the interest of intellectual culture. Edar Lodge was among the first of the lodges in District No. 7 to take up the task.

On the introductions of intellectual and social features into the Order's plans, Edar Lodge promptly wheeled into line and has done splendidly. Edar Lodge is in a flourishing condition and is entitled to all the praises heaped upon it by the outer world. Its membership numbers 200.

LEO N. LEVI LODGE, SAN ANTONIO

It is a little over eight years ago that Leo N. Levi Lodge was organized and installed. Since its organization its progress has been most flattering and it has proven a successful venture in every particular. The officers are well known and prominent men identified with the best interests of the city, and take special pride in sustaining the lodge. It has over a hundred members.

B'NAI B'RITH OF PORTLAND.

Over six hundred members and their friends attended the joint meeting of Theo. Herzel Lodge, No. 314, and Oregon Auxiliary No. 2 Daughters of the Covenant on Tuesday Evening, March 12, 1918, the occasion being the visit of Dr. Ben Zion Mosessohn, the noted Palestinian leader. After a class of sixteen candidates was initiated by the degree team, the doors of the lodge room were opened and the ladies' auxiliary and other members were admitted to listen to the wonderful address of the Doctor on "The Duties of Jews in the Present Crisis".

A public Seder on the evening of the second day of Passover was arranged by the B'nai B'rith of Portland and their ladies' auxiliaries. The guests of honor were all men in uniform and such others as took interest to participate in the affair. The capacity of the hall was limited to the ruling of "first come, first served". The local rabbis participated in the Haggadah services and the suggestion to hold the Seder originated with the Oregon Auxiliary, No. 2, Daughters of the Covenant.

Portland Lodge, No. 416, held a most successful meeting on Tuesday evening, March 5, 1918, at which time a class of fourteen candidates was initiated by the Theo. Herzel Lodge degree team. Rabbi Jonah B. Wise delivered an interesting lecture on the Bible.

Other features were a large class initiation and a farewell ceremony to twelve young men, members of Toledo Lodge, who had been drafted and were leaving shortly for training camp.

Rabbi David Alexander addressed the young men very impressively and presented each one at the close of his remarks with a wrist watch and a Mezuzah in the name of the lodge.

District President Borinstein's talk was inspiring and at the same time entertaining, holding the rapt attention of the large crowd for nearly an hour.

Refreshments were served at the close of the meeting.

A number of boys from Camp Devens, Harvard Radio School, Commonwealth Pier, attended. A large number of members of the lodge and their families were present. The affair was a decided success, which was principally due to the efforts of the Committee on Arrangements of which E. S. Berger was chairman.

SPRINGFIELD LODGE, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

On the evening of April 18, 1918, the Jewish citizens of Springfield, Mass., showed marked appreciation of their citizenship by pledging themselves to support the nation both in man power and money in prosecuting the war to a successful conclusion. At a big mass meeting held under the auspices of Springfield Lodge No. 684 of Springfield, Mass., they gave profound expression of their patriotism. The appeal to the patriotic members of the Jewish community netted approximately $58,000. This substantial contribution marks the beginning of a drive of the Jewish Liberty Loan committee. It was also announced that three of the local Jewish organizations had 100 per cent subscriptions from their respective memberships.

Mr. Henry Lasker, member of the general committee of District Grand Lodge No. 1, and chairman of the Springfield Jewish committee of the Third Liberty Loan campaign, presided at the meeting. The speakers were Mrs. Frances Stern of Boston, Rev. Harry Levy of Boston, Colonel Harry Cutler of Providence, R. I., Rev. CLARKSBURG, WEST VIRGINIA.

Clarksburg Lodge, No. 727, has taken on new life since the inauguration of our new officers. The attendance of members is larger and there seems to be a general enthusiasm amongst all the members.

There is a favorable feeling amongst some of our members towards the Zionist movement and on Sunday, Feb. 10, at the close of our regular meeting, we had a debate on that subject. The judges of the debate have not yet rendered their decision.

Ever since the visit to Clarksburg of Bro. Jacob Kun, a number of our members concluded that if we could arrange a lecture course it would help secure new members.

To put the idea into real execution, we made up a purse amongst our members and notified our educational committee to get busy, with the result that on Wednesday, March 13, we had Rabbi Isadore Rosenthal, of Lancaster, Pa., deliver a lecture in the Masonic Temple entitled, "Modern Thoughts".

"Modern Thoughts", as well as Rabbi Rosenthal, so pleased the audience, that we are now arranging another lecture for April.

B'NAI B'RITH DAY CELEBRATION BY DALLAS LODGE.

B'nai B'rith Day was properly observed by Dallas Lodge No. 197, of Dallas, Texas, at Temple Emanu-El, on Wednesday evening, March 6, 1918. Judge David B. Samuels of the city court of Shreveport, La., was the principal speaker.

In the course of his talk he gave a resume of the history of the desire of that people through all the ages. The fact that the ten commandments were given to the world in the wilderness and not to the individual bears out the right of democracy as the logical and ultimate condition that must prevail throughout the world.

"All wars are for some great cause of humanity", he asserted. "So it is with this war. It will cost the lives of millions of people, but from the baptism of fire a new, free world will rise, phoenix-like, from the bloodshed and slaughter. This war testifies to the fact that might is not right, and that there is nothing before virtue and righteousness".

He also outlined the significant part the Hebrews of the world were taking in the fight against autocracy for the sake of democracy.

The Rev. William H. Greenburg made the opening remarks, introducing Judge Samuels. He discoursed briefly upon the significance of the occasion in the Jewish calendar. He touched upon the ethical aims and purposes of the order of B'nai B'rith, which stands for the mental and moral welfare of the Jewish people.

The office of the headquarters is always happy to greet and welcome visiting brothers. Bro. Dr. Elias Caplan, of Israel Lodge, No. 796, has been appointed by Brother Davidson, District Deputy for the state of Maine. Bro. Dr. Caplan is one of the founders of the Pine Tree Lodge, No. 817.

Bro. Dr. B. S. Antonowsky, of Maimonides Lodge, No. 809, of Liberty, N. Y., arranged a public patriotic meeting at the City High School under the auspices of the lodge. Bro. Maurice P. Davidson, President of the District, was the principle speaker.

Brothers John Feinstein and Sidney E. Simon, members of Saskatoon Lodge, No. 739, of Saskatoon, Canada, visited Regina, Canada, on Sunday, March 3, 1918, and addressed a meeting of co-religionists for the purpose of interesting them in the matter of instituting a B'nai B'rith Lodge in that city. The visiting brethren were agreeably surprised as to the interest taken in the work of the Order and as a result of their efforts a petition was circulated during the meeting securing a sufficient number of signatures for a charter for a lodge to be instituted in that city.

Gilead Lodge, No. 41, of Milwaukee, Wis., moved into its new quarters in the Milwaukee Odd Fellows Temple at 191 Tenth St. and the first meeting of the lodge was held there on March 14, 1918, with one of the largest audiences that the lodge ever had. THE LAMP LIGHTER.

him to do his God appointed work. These are critical days in the history of the world. The old standards are vanishing quickly. We are going not through an evolution but through a revolution. And it is the thought of the Jewish prophets that is going to be adopted. The new internationalism is what the world is coming to. We are entering upon an era of human co-operation in every field. Such is the thought that lies at the basis of Mr. Wilson's masterful addresses. And the Jew has a tremendous obligation and opportunity. I do not mean the Jew as an individual, but the Jewish people.

And the Lodge has its special obligation these days. It must awaken Israel to the realization of the task that lies before him, the sacred duty that devolves upon him.

This then, I take it is the special work of the Lodge that lies before it to accomplish during the coming years. To strengthen the hand and heart and mind of the Jewish people that it might achieve its mission with courage and with zeal. To point out to our people the error of their way, that has resulted from the newness of emancipation. To hold before the eye of Jew, Jewish values, Jewish thought, Jewish ideals as our prophets taught them. To make the Jew feel that it is duty as sons of the prophets to bring light to the world now and in the future days.

Let others hug the hearth fire. Let others remain in comfort. It has been given to the crucified nation to walk in the cold and sleet and darkness. The lamp lighter's work is a divine task. Everytime the pole is lifted the lamplighter has united himself with eternity.

Israel, lamp lighter to the world, thou shalt some day kindle a flame that will grow brighter than the sun. It will warm the hearts of men and women and cause little children to laugh in their play. It will dry the tears of the world, cause the golden grain to sprout out of the ground and no man shall want for the taste of it. Israel, lamp lighter to the world, go about your work with a cheerful heart. The night is not scattered yet. The fog is not lifted. The greatest work is yet to be done. Only when the morning sun rises mayest thou remain at home in comfort and in ease. Until then, Israel, walk your rounds and lift the pole and pierce the gloom with shafts of golden glow. God himself has called you to perform the task!

LIBERTY BOND IN HOME OF EVERY BEN B'RITH IS SLOGAN.

Harmony Lodge, No. 711, I. O. B. B., prominent among the patriotic organizations of Bridgeport, proposes to "go over the top" in the Third Liberty Loan campaign. Its energetic president, Lawrence S. Finkelstone, has enthused the members with the importance of every Ben B'rith putting his shoulder to the wheel until the close of the Liberty Loan campaign.

Harmony Lodge is making an effort for a Liberty Bond in the home of every member. Bro. Isaac Moss of the local War Savings Stamp Committee is co-operating with the Committee of Harmony Lodge consisting of Dr. M. S. Rosen, Jacob Flamm and John Rosenbluh in the sale of stamps at every meeting and splendid results are being obtained.

On Sunday evening, April 7, Bro. Charles H. Shapiro, first vice-president of District Grand Lodge No. 1, delivered an address before a large audience in the Park Theatre, which in seating capacity is the biggest theatre in the city, and at which there was a goodly number of co-religionists among those present, his address being delivered under the auspices of the State Council of Defense, who are displaying moving pictures showing the part of Connecticut and Bridgeport in the present war.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' WELFARE FUND.

The B'nai B'rith News is informed that a check for $3,000 from Jephtah Lodge, No. 143, of Paterson, N. J., and one for $100 from Connellsville Lodge, No. 801, of Connellsville, Pa., were forwarded to the treasurer of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work.

There is only one way of not hating those who do us wrong, and that is by doing them good; anger is best conquered by kindness.—Amiel.

CHARITABLE SOCIETIES RECEIVE PROCEEDS OF HARMONY LODGE CHARITY BALL.

At a largely attended meeting of Harmony Lodge, No. 711, I. O. B. B., held on Tuesday, April 9, a hustlers' club was organized to boost the 250 membership campaign recently launched, the captains being Morris Romm and Harry DeBorken. President Lawrence S. Finkelstone announced that a class initiation of 25 candidates will be held at Harmony Lodge Rooms on May 6, at which the Prize Team of Horeb Lodge of New Haven will officiate. It is expected that there will be visiting members from various B'nai B'rith lodges in the state in attendance. A novel notice in the form of a subpoena is being prepared by Joseph Solomon to summon the members for the occasion.

The Charity Ball Committee reported a record amount of proceeds are to be distributed to the Children's Aid Society, Philanthropic Committee of the Sisterhood in the Park Avenue Temple and the Hebrew Ladies' Aid Society.

Isaac Moss, of the War Savings Stamp Committee, delivered an interesting talk on the progress of War Savings Stamps in fraternal organizations. At the conclusion a large number of stamps were disposed of by the committee in charge, consisting of Dr. M. S. Rosen, Jacob Flamm and John Rosenbluh.

The Entertainment Committee reported that the semi-monthly whists have proven very successful, and that the Hebrew Children's Aid Society was planning similar whists for the remainder of the season.

Bro. Charles H. Shapiro, chairman of the Intellectual Advancement Committee, announced that an address on "The Jewish Woman on the Farm," would be delivered by J. S. Pincus, editor of "The Jewish Farmer" during the course of the month.

JORDAN LODGE, NEW YORK.

Zionism was the subject of a very interesting and spirited discussion at an open meeting held on March 21, Thursday evening, under the auspices of Jordan Lodge No. 15. This is the first of a series of meetings at which special subjects will be presented. The Intellectual Advancement Committee of Jordan Lodge, Bro. Rev. Dr. Jacob Goldstein, chairman, has prepared a noteworthy program. It is the intention of this committee to present speakers of local and national prominence.

Nine members now represent Jordan Lodge No. 15 in the United States service. This Lodge is making a special effort to keep in close touch with our "boys" and to that end has established a Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare Committee, Bro. I. W. Wyskoff as chairman, to act as the "link" between our "boys" and the Lodge. Packages that smack of good things not included by Uncle Sam in his menu, also smokes and articles of comfort, are sent regularly to the camps.

Our Big Brother Committee, Bro. Harry H. Cohen, chairman, is in close touch with the Jewish Big Brothers; we do not permit the international crisis to interfere with this serious work. It is with pride that we give honorable mention to the "Big Brothers" of our Lodge for the noble efforts and work being done in that direction.

CHARLES WEIL LODGE, PINE BLUFF, ARK.

On April 11 Rabbi Raphael Goldstein, president of Charles Weil Lodge No. 279 of Pine Bluff, Ark., raised under the auspices of that Lodge $600 for the war sufferers of Europe at a largely attended meeting held at the temple of the Camden Congregation. Lazarus, president; Mrs. Leo Berg, vice-president; Mrs. A. Levy, secretary; Miss Sadie Rose, treasurer.

Hall, which was largely attended. Brother Frankel delivered the principal address, speaking on the "War and the Responsibilities and Duties As a Result of the War Devolving Upon the Jews and Members of the Order."

Americanism and Zionism

By Julian W. Mack

I have been asked to tell you why I became a Zionist and what Zionism means to me.

Addressing you, my Jewish friends, all American citizens, let me begin by saying that there is absolutely no incompatibility between Americanism and Zionism. One might take that for granted: one might well believe it merely by recalling the many loyal American citizens who are Zionists, the leading Englishmen who are Zionists, the citizens and subjects of all nations who are Zionists, and the fact that our Government and their governments have never accused them of disloyalty or in the slightest degree doubted their patriotism, because of their Zionism; indeed, in every country, outspoken Zionists have been and are honored by the leaders of the nation. I say that one might therefore take it for granted that there can be no such incompatibility. But we Jews are rather peculiar; we want to be more loyal than the king himself, holier than the pope. We want every possible cloud dispelled, every conceivable doubt removed, lest the foolish and unthinking might cast even the most unjust aspersions upon us.

Zionism, as I view it, on this fundamental assumption, this basis of fact, that the Jews are a people. I purposely use the word "people" instead of "nation" or "nationality" because of the several connotations of these latter words. Now, what do I mean by saying that the Jews are a people? I mean that all the Jews, no matter of what country they may be citizens, are one people. That does not, however, signify that they form a state, that they are a political nation, or that any Jew owes any political allegiance to that Jewish people, for a people is something entirely different from a state or a nation.

Some States, like France or Italy, have what, in the course of centuries, has come to be practically a single people. In others, like Germany, the great majority of the subjects belong to one people, the Teutons; there are, however, distinct minorities, like the Poles. Others, like Great Britain, have different peoples, each predominant in a geographically distinct territory, the English, the Scotch, the Welsh; and yet, so amalgamated or federated that, while preserving their individuality, the three peoples together form one people, the British. Switzerland, too, has three geographically distinct peoples; they form a political nation, a state, Switzerland; and, like the British, they have created a single people, the Swiss; but every Swiss citizen, while owing and yielding political loyalty to Switzerland alone, while feeling himself, moreover, in every sense, predominantly a part of the Swiss people, yet, unlike the Englishman, the Welshman or the Scot, is kin, by a common inheritance of which language remains the most vital factor, to the people of a foreign country—France, or Italy, or Germany.

Our own country is unique. Here representatives of all the peoples of the world have gathered and intermingled, and in less than a century after the United States, as a political state, was established, the assimilable elements of its inhabitants were fused into a new nationality, the American people. The American Jews are, of course, full-fledged citizens of the United States; they form, too, an integral part of the American people, to whose civilization they, like each of the other component parts, have contributed a rich inheritance. Every American, like every Swiss, either personally or through his American ancestors has a kinship with one and frequently with more than one of the older peoples of the world; for the Jews, that relation is primarily with the Jewish people.

Am I then preaching the dangerous doctrine of dual nationalty? Not at all in the sense in which it is dangerous, in the sense of dual political allegiance. Let me emphasize as strongly as I can, that a man can be a citizen of only one state; a man can owe his political allegiance, and that is what citizenship means, to only one country at a time; there can be no dual citizenship. But kinship he may have with two or even several peoples. In other words, some loyalties, like that of citizenship or of religion are single and exclusive; others, like that based upon a common civilization or upon affection may be manifold. A true man ought to be and is no less a dutiful son because he becomes a faithful husband, or later an affectionate father; for him there is no incompatability between these three relations. Indeed, on the contrary, just because the loyalty of it should be strengthened by the strengthening of every other branch. The more devoted a man is as a husband, the better he should be as a son and a father. Similarly, a man may have an inherited kinship with one people and yet, in the fullest sense, have made himself part and parcel of another people. Sympathy with the ideals of the Jewish people will but intensify the devotion of the American Jew to American ideals because there is essential agreement between them.

With the people of the new Jewish commonwealth, the Americen Jews will co-operate, with a zeal born of a common inheritance and a common religion, to aid them in developing in Palestine a Jewish civilization and to bring its beneficial fruits to all the peoples of the world. But with the commonwealth itself, they will have no political connection whatsoever; it will not be their country; it will give them no political rights or protection; they will yield to it no political allegiance; their citizenship in and their loyalty to the United States will remain single and undivided. This is emphasized in the clear understanding expressed in the British Declaration of November 2, 1917, inserted to avoid any doubt or misunderstanding, and declaring that > "Nothing shall be done which may prejudice the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country".

And so I say that there is not the slightest basis for a fear that the Zionists are urging anything in the nature of a dual political allegiance.

But this does not demonstrate that there is a Jewish people. Once upon a time, of course, there was a Jewish people. There was more than that; there was a Jewish state. That Jewish state at no time in its history included within the realm of its political allegiance all the Jews; but the people in Palestine, the Jewish nationality forming that state, represented and constituted, practically, the Jewish people. They stood for that people just as the Englishmen, the Scotchmen and the Welsh living in Great Britain, together stand for the British people, as the French in France stand for the French people.

That people was scattered when the Jewish State was finally destroyed; and it dispersed to all parts of the world. Most peoples, under these circumstances, destroyed as a political state, would very quickly lose their identity as a distinct people. But the Jews never did. Something in that people caused it to outlive the destruction of the nation; something in the members of that people caused them to persist and held them together.

Many a Jew has felt in times past that there is no Jewish people, and he has thus fallen away from his people. But we in our own time and generation have been witnesses to the fact and to the fundamental importance and vitality of the fact that there is such a people, and this, especially in the times of that people's greatest sufferings.

All of you remember the Dreyfus case. Was there a Jew throughout the world who did not feel in his soul during that tragedy that he too was a Jew? He might deny to all the world, but he could not deny to himself, that he, like that man, was a part of the Jewish people. Because it was Dreyfus the Jew, not Dreyfus the man, who was accused by his bitter anti-semitic enemies, the Jewish people were undergoing a trial; and every Jew felt a personal relief and pride when our great sister republic established his innocence, as only under French law it could be legally established. Justice had again prevailed and we had peace for a little while.

And then again the unthinking began to fall away. But the massacres of Kishinev came. The clouds were dark and threatening; but, as ever, they had a silver lining; and it was just bright enough to show to every Jew in the world that he, too, was a Jew, and a part of the Jewish people. Again it flared up, the oftimes latent Jewishness of every honest Jew. He knew that those people over there were suffering solely because they were Jews; solely because they were of the people to whom he belonged. And later on, when in the person of Beilis, the whole Jewish people, nay, more, Judaism itself was again on trial, surely no thinking Jew could any longer doubt that there is a Jewish people. And yet some men, even some reform rabbis,—I know of no such orthodox rabbi,—say today that the Jews are not a people, that they are merely adherents to a certain religious faith. I answer that in the days of Dreyfus, in the days of the Kishinev victims, in the days of Beilis, an American radical or reform Jew did not think of these sufferers merely as co-religionists; indeed, he knew that there was a great gulf, a sharp line of religious demarcation between his Judaism and that of the Orthodox Russian Jew; he felt, however, that notwithstanding this difference, they were bound to him by the tie of a common inheritance, a common tradition, a common sympathy based beyond question upon the ancestral religion but not limited thereto. And this feeling makes them not, of course, a nation in any political sense, but a people.

There is, however, also a negative aspect. Suppose we keep on saying, "We are not a people, we are just the same as the others, except that we have a different religion". We should be burying our heads in the sand. Ask your neighbor, and let him tell you whether we are a people or not. His answer will be unequivocal; and not at all from any spirit of anti-semitism. Surely there is no anti-semitism in the British Declaration, in its recognition of the existence of the Jewish people, in its avowed desire to re-establish the Jewish Nation; on the contrary, it is the most friendly act towards securing national reconstruction, based upon the very patent fact that there is a Jewish people. And in this, the British Declaration meets the aims of the Zionist Movement.

There are really two ideals in this world along the lines of statehood, Cosmopolitanism and Internationalism. There are dreamers who say, "Wipe out all these lines of division. Let us no longer have Englishmen, Americans, Frenchmen, when the war is over; let us have one great country, the world. Let us all be citizens of it". This is cosmopolitanism. Internationalism, while based upon nationalism, does not involve a clashing of nations, or the domination of one nation. True internationalism aims at the highest self-development by each nation, not in conflict but in friendly rivalry with the other nations, each endeavoring to work out the best that is within it for the good of its own people, and through them, as its contribution to all the world. And in that spirit of internationalism, the Jewish people want again to become one of the nations of the world, a nation that will develop the best that is in it, the best that a Jewish environment and Jewish ideals, Jewish religion and language and law, in a word, Jewish civilization can bring forth, not alone for the good of the Jews in that commonwealth of Judaea, not alone, too, for the good of the Jewish citizens of other lands, who will feel a kinship to the people in that commonwealth, but for all humanity.

That brings us to Zionism. So far I hope I have satisfied you that there is a Jewish people. But the question is proper, why and how should that people through a nucleus of its members be re-established as a political community? I say a nucleus because, of course, no one dreams of putting all the Jews in Palestine or of driving any Jew out of any other country or into Palestine. The nucleus of the Jewish people, whether it be two million or more persons, who will gather there and will be the Jewish nation, will be those, and those alone, who voluntarily go there to become members of that Jewish commonwealth or who, if anti-Semitic oppression should continue in any part of the world, prefer to go there rather than elsewhere.

My point of view is this: Just as there is an individual psychology, so there is a national psychology. Just as each individual has a potential creative force, so, too, has every people. And the creative power of a people is something more than, something different from, the sum of the creative powers of its members. Now, when the Jewish people,—and in using this phrase I do not mean all of the members but that nucleus of them which represents the whole—when the Jewish people had a national life, it created the highest ideal values for the world. We know the names of but a few outstanding individuals, because while individuals did their share, the people as a whole was the real creator. It was the Jewish people, gathering within itself the creative power of its individual members and enhancing that power by a united will and a united action, that evolved those fundamental concepts upon which modern civilization rests.

Now, if the Jewish nation in those ancient days was capable of making such important contributions, and if that people has been able, throughout these centuries, to persist and to maintain its identity, despite the loss of language, despite the loss of national life, despite the oppression which has been its lot, it surely is to be expected that that people if re-established among the nations of the world, will again be able, in a Jewish environment, through its now latent creative forces, to renew its development, and as in the days of the prophets, to give to the world further ideals of justice, of unity, of peace, now so sadly needed.

What international political status the Jewish democratic home rule commonwealth shall have is not material; whether it shall be and shall remain under the protectorate or suzerainty of one or the other of the great powers or as suggested in the program of the Inter-Allied Labor Conference, be made a free state under international guaranty, is not a question of principle; the Peace Congress will determine this.

What we want, what we hope for, what we expect is that whatever its form, the Jewish Commonwealth will be a force for righteousness in the regenerated world. We may be disappointed. But men must take risks. We have our hopes, our beliefs, our faith and on them we, as American citizens, are willing to risk our lives and our fortunes. Shall we, as Jews, fear even to risk our money on our faith in the probabilities of that Jewish Commonwealth? That is the problem that is up to the Jews of the world today. And Great Britain has put that problem before us.

A few years ago Zionism was a dream—a noble dream. And when the war began, most of us thought it was still only a dream. We did not expect it to be realized in our lifetime. But many of us became Zionists, because we said to ourselves: "A dream though it be, it has

Jewish Ideology.

I imagine we still have no law, we are a free society, we wish to arrange our life according to the advice of the modern free thinkers, to make use of a contract or an agreement which shall regulate our mutual relations.

Then, if you will not be so much inclined to wage war, you will admit that we must reckon with the religous as well as with the national feelings, which are inborn with us; the thought of economic justice is also to be considered

Imagine this contract has already been consummated, our first law-giver has taken care of that; you should not be vexed with me when I say that I am greatly in doubt whether you would be able to do it better.

I will explain myself quite openly. You may take so much pride in the discoveries of your modern prophets, who, in your opinion, have discovered the cause of all causes and entered into the sanctum sanctorum of history. I refer to your prophet who has made the discovery of the historical materialism.

But I will positively accentuate that our first prophet and liberator has considered it very earnestly. The fact is that he has not created new material forms, but has idealized the historical materialism which existed at that time.

The religious form of sacrifices begins with Cain and his brother, that is, the first children of man formed it, which has later assumed a bloodthirsty course, and Moses ennobled it by restricting it to the altar, thereby idealizing the brute matter.

The same can be said about the national ideas which found support in barbarism and brutality, he gave them an ideal turn, he wanted to have an ideal state.

Now I come to the most important point.

The economic form in those historic times was slavery. To this more than to anything else he gave an ideal direction, which started it on the way to the complete development of liberty.

Here I must explain myself more fully. Let us adopt an abstract symbol, which [illegible] represent an original moral idea, at the same time also an idea of freedom; how would you have been able to do it in the best way?

Well, I will show you systematically how it can be conceived.

Let us take the idea of Sabbath rest. This is a practical arrangement, which represents the divine moral idea that is expressed through a two-fold signification.

The first is the religious view which reckons with the ideas of God, world, man, morality.

The Sabbath is a general strike against slavery; a free time to meditate about the beginning and final aim of creation, the world shall not be too much absorbed in business, it shall also gain for itself a moral perception.

I will more emphatically call attention to the second signification, which may be of value also for free thinkers and unbelievers. The Biblical words, "And thou shalt remember that thou wast a servant, and the Lord, thy God brought thee out", express the moral and historical idea of freedom, which liberates the oppressed and tolerates no slavery. The divine voice proclaims it explicitly from Sinai's height. "Be no slave yourself and practice no slavery."

I will lay stress upon the following and you may pay attention to it: Everywhere in the Law of Moses when an appeal is made for benevolence against violence, there comes the expression, "Remember that thou wast a servant"; this is an appeal for liberty which is based upon the historical thought of freedom; the sense of history which is the development of freedom by mankind against the spirit of slavery.

Thus is the historical materialism of that time being idealized gradually and systematically. First one should practice freedom at least once a week; your servants shall also have rest and not be constantly enslaved.

Then it comes in a wider sense, in the form of the "land-Sabbath", the earth shall also have rest. I understand it more thoroughly.

Just as it is assumed that the one who cultivates the land is entitled to use the product of the same, so it would not be wrong also today that the land shall be free at least once in a shemitah (period of seven years), of which Moses said: No one shall cultivate the land, no one shall have special privileges in regard to the fruit which the earth brings forth, everybody shall be entitled to use freely the gifts of God.

The strong man shall not grab everything in his own hand, the weaker one shall also have an opportunity to enjoy all the blessings of the land.

Moses states plainly, "that the poor of thy people shall eat", it is for the use of the proletariate.

The law of shemitah aims besides, to abolish the slavery of a fellow man and also liberation from all economic oppressions; I see in it the highest thought of freedom.

Further comes the Jobel, the law of the fiftieth year, which intends to regulate landed property in general, with the abolition of all kinds of oppression and the fixing of an all sided, most perfect liberty; "a year of liberty for all the dwellers thereof", which is based upon the divine principle "mine is the whole earth, all the children of Israel are my servants", which means the whole earth belongs to God not to any man; all the children of Israel are under the supreme rule of God alone, no man has a right to enslave them.

This is also the purport of our historical light of liberty.

When to this shall also be added the further explanation of the prophets: "Mine is the silver and mine is the gold", all money belongs to God, which means that freedom is not confined exclusively to land alone; also in the other forms of private ownership the system of grab and slavery shall not prevail, then I do not know if there can generally be a higher conception.

The Historical Course of Evolution.

Others will answer: The intention of these laws is not bad at all, if we only would practice them in real life. The people was never very particular about them.

About this we must take in consideration the course of the historical evolution. We advanced little by little, humanity came after us.

You must know that our historical astronomers and moral mathematicians, the prophets of Zion, have taken account of three periods in universal history. The third period, which they foresaw as a consequence after the long years of martyrology, must finally take a better turn; it goes slowly, from step to step.

Then the time was also not fully prepared for it; the end will come, there will be created a better order, the economic side will also be regulated.

The stage of higher perfection comes at a slow pace; sooner or later the ideas of our prophets must become realized.

The Harmony of Union and the Systematic Moral-Historical Fight of the Prophets.

Others see puzzles or contradictions in the system of the prophets; they think that it does not agree with the law, I see in it a complete harmony.

The prophets fought against the egotistical nature of man in general, against that which is too materialistically inclined in the life of the nations, which assumed a broader form in the nationalistic sense.

It is characteristic of all nations who disappear from history that they lose the moral equilibrium, when times become better, chauvinism begins to develop, the rulers want to extend their opulence and power through wars with other nations or by increasing the inner slavery, by oppressing the weaker classes among their own brothers. The prophets came out against this order in general with the word of God.

We were no worse than others, our people passed through the same process, the natural development of selfish materialism.

Against this the prophets came out in a systematic combat; they did not fight the law but only the exaggerated materialism which hid itself under the mantle of legality; the prophet, Isaiah, characterized it in the following words: "For we have made lies our refuge, and in falsehood have we hid ourselves".

They regarded the law as a social machine, where all parts are regulated to serve a united aim; idealism shall have a free course of evolution, materialism on the contrary shall be limited, the balance of the social life is thereby regulated.

In the continued course of history, when the spirit departed and everything became far too widely materialized, the prophets were forced to accentuate mainly the ideal aspiration, the essential part, the voice of God which is in the law and they said, "Harken unto the voice of God".

They did not fight religion, only the false side which is hiding in it, the self deception; they understood that religion, the ceremonial divine worship, are in themselves not aims but means for the moral purpose and when the latter was left out they protested. On account of the Karbanot (animal sacrifices), or selihot (penitential prayers) the people became demoralized, the prophets foresaw the fearful destruction which the people are bringing upon themselves, so they had to combat the material side of it by depreciating ceremonialism.

The thundering voice of the prophet calling out, "Is this house, whereupon my name is called, become a den of robbers in your eyes"? (Jer. 7:11), should also be heard today.

It is the same also with nationalism; the prophets did not come out against self-help and the preservation of the body of the people, but against the extreme materialism, against lust of power and chauvinism.

In regard to the economic side which has become too much commercialized and demoralized, the prophets came out with more force and energy; they fought against all forms of slave-trading and oppression, and demanded complete brotherly freedom.

The Prophetic Message is for All Humanity.

Finally it must be explained that the fight against demoralization is also today aimed against the whole world; the prophets foresaw the bad consequences which humanity will bring upon itself by making materialism an idol for worship.

The preliminary condition for a better future consists in the lofty thought of our prophets, which finds expression in the double sentence, "And let none of you devise evil against his brother in your heart", and "In that day a man shall cast away his idols of silver, and his idols of gold, which they made for themselves to worship".

The inner chauvinism and the outer materialism lead man astray; you shall not be so enthusiastic with the modern idolatry.

Humanity has two ways before itself, either it must comprehend the divine idea of our prophets and begin to practice a better system, or it will be ruined, all brutal force and means of destruction will not help it.

You must recognize the high moral principle of our faith, which begins with love of morality and ends with the idea of universal peace.

JEWISH ADMINISTRATION AT WORK.

Palestine Rejoices and All Elements Co-Operating.

The Jewish Administrative Commission for Palestine has established bureaus in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv and is preparing to settle down to the actual work of laying the foundation for the Jewish State, according to the first official report from that body, which has just been received by the Provisional Zionist Committee in New York City.

This report, which is dated April 18, describes the remarkable demonstration which greeted the commission on its arrival at Tel Aviv, the Jewish suburb of Jaffa on April 6. Every society and organization joined with the town representatives in making the commission welcome and a huge parade reached its climax when an address of welcome was read to the commission on the Boulevard Benjamin Rothschild. Dr. Chaim Weitzman, head of the commission, evoked great enthusiasm when he replied in Hebrew, as did also the address of James Rothschild. The British military governor of Jaffa, who participated in the reception, expressed his sympathy with the Zionist aims.

The commission reports that several informal conferences with representatives of various organizations revealed the fact that its work would have the co-operation of all elements of the Palestine population. The one disturbing feature of the report is the announcement that large sums of money are needed to save the orange-growers from ruin, owing to the inability, due to the war, of marketing the crops. The commission says that long-term loans to the orange-growers are an imperative necessity.

It is easy to decide without thinking; it is easy to think and not decide; but it is hard to think fairly and decide courageously.

THE JEWS IN RUMANIA.

Letter from the Joint Foreign Affairs Committee.

On the eve of the Peace Negotiations imposed upon Rumania by the Central Powers a number of representative organizations in this country dispatched letters of sympathy and encouragement to corresponding bodies in Rumania. On behalf of the Anglo-Jewish Community the Joint Foreign Committee addressed the following letter to the President of the Central Committee of Rumanian Israelites at Jassy:

22nd February, 1918.

Dear Sir—I am directed by the Presidents of the Joint Foreign Committee of the Jewish Board of Deputies and the Anglo-Jewish Association, Sir Stuart M. Samuel, Bart., and Mr. Claude G. Montefiore, to express to you, on behalf of the Jewish Communities in the British Empire, their profound and heartfelt sympathy with you and your Rumanian co-religionists in the trials and sorrows which have lately so cruelly afflicted your valiant country.

All England has watched with admiration and gratitude the bravery and endurance with which the Rumanian army has sustained the cause of the Allies in southeastern Europe against overwhelming odds, and British Jews are especially gratified and proud to know that their Rumanian co-religionists have borne their full share of the sacrifices and glories of that heroic struggle. They do not doubt that your Rumanian fatherland will ere long reap the full reward of the gallantry of its sons, both Jews and Christians, and that, with the coming triumph of Right and Justice in Europe, a new era will dawn for the Rumanian people, who, without distinction of creed, will find their brotherhood re-consecrated in a great, united, and free Rumania.

With all fraternal greetings and good wishes, I have the honor to be, Dear Sir, Yours very faithfully,

LUCIEN WOLF.

Comite Central de l'Union des Israelites Rumains, Jassy.

Count Czernin's Statement.

As stated in our "Stop Press" edition of Friday last, Count Czernin, the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister, in the course of an address to a deputation of the Vienna City Council, which waited upon him on Tuesday week, referring to the treaty of peace which was in process of being negotiated between the Central Powers and Rumania, declared:

"We shall solve the Jewish question. The Jews will henceforth be citizens with equal rights in Rumania."

An earlier pronouncement by Count Czernin to the same effect was printed in our issue of March 15.

Statement by the German Chancellor.

The Neue Zuricher Zeitung states, on trustworthy authority, that the Rumanian Government will shortly issue a manifesto formally declaring its approval in principle of the emancipation of the Jews. It will announce, however, that the necessary consent of Parliament to such a step will only be sought after the new elections, and that consequently the Emancipation Act will become law on the assembly of the new Parliament.

The German Chancellor received Herr James Simon and Drs. Paul Nathan and Franz Oppenheimer, on behalf of the United German Jewish organizations. In the course of the interview, Count Hertling assured the deputation that the Government was interested in the favorable solution of the Jewish question in Rumania and that it was using its influence in that direction.

The Zionist leader, Professor Warburg, also had an interview with the Under-Secretary of State, Herr Von Bussche, on the Rumanian Jewish question. The Zionist organizations in Germany and in Austria presented memorials on the Jewish problem in Rumania to the respective governments and the heads of the Parliamentary Foreign Affairs Committees. The Zionists claimed for the Rumanian Jews full civil and national rights.

So far, however, the only official statement made by the German Government on the Jewish question in Rumania is the reply of Herr Von Bussche in the Parliamentary Committee, merely suggesting that Germany had already done its duty towards Jews in Rumania by improving their position in the invaded territory. The statement, which did not convey a correct appreciation of the facts, was regarded by the Socialist authors of the interpellation on the future of Rumanian Jewry as highly unsatisfactory and evasive.—London Jewish Chronicle.

Sketches of Modern Jewish History

Science of Judaism

The change in the political condition of the Jews, beginning with the French Revolution, and the growing secularism of education, beginning with Moses Mendelssohn, resulted in a changed attitude to the conception of Jewish studies. The former exclusive application to the study of rabbinical law and the rather unconscious dogmatic attitude, which without expressing it in so many words, considered all sayings of the rabbis as infallible, had to give way before the modernism in Jewish thought. This, again, created what is rather inadequately and awkwardly termed "Science of Judaism". The term gave rise to many misunderstandings, of which one may be quoted that believes science of Judaism or Jewish science, as it is sometimes called, to be the Jewish equivalent for Catholic science, namely a harmonization of the Jewish dogma with the results of modern science. Instead of all polemics, it may briefly be said, that by science of Judaism, we understand the systematic and critical study of Jewish history and literature.

Leopold Zunz is justly called the "father of science of Judaism". His essay on rabbinic literature, which was published in 1819, clearly outlined the scope of these studies. While not intending to deprive this pioneer of the credit due him, we must not overlook the fact that he had a number of predecessors, who, though not as consistent as he was, and not equally conscious of their objects, helped to blaze the path for this new development. The first man who investigated Jewish literature with a critical mind and for purposes different than the regulation of religious practice, and the defense of rabbinic infallibility, was the Italian scholar, Azariah Dei Rossi (1511-1578). In a series of essays he showed the contradiction between statements of the rabbis on science, history and ethics, and statements on the same subjects by secular authorities. He boldly declared that the views of the rabbis on science and history are not infallible, and their ethical views are not to be taken literally. This created a storm of indignation, but in the end was accepted by all men of culture.

Various other rabbinical authors, while not as well read in secular literature as Dei Rossi was, would, without attempting to lay down a fundamental principle, occasionally discuss similar ideas in their works. One of these men, not sufficiently appreciated, was Rabbi Jair Hayyim Bacharach of Worms (1639-1702). Bacharach occasionally discusses some remarks ascribed to the teachers of the Talmud in their arguments which are by no means specimens of the highest ethics. So one rabbi is quoted in Talmud as saying of another, "He does not seem to have any brains under his cranium". Of course, such manners cannot be defended, and Bacharach mildly suggests that such strong expressions were occasionally indulged in to call the attention of students to an error in the views of older authorities, but were by no means meant to justify rude language. Still more important are Bacharach's occasional attempts to build up a systematic theology. So he devotes a long essay to the definition of the term "oral law handed down by Moses when he descended from Mt. Sinai". The average rabbi of the seventeenth century never bothered about such definitions. He used the term without trying to define it, and took it for granted that Moses and Aaron were acquainted with the rabbinical law in all the details laid down in Talmud and later codes.

Rabbi Joseph Steinhardt of Fuerth (1706-1776), otherwise a strictly observant expounder of the law, who, to quote one instance, prohibited dancing under the penalty of excommunication, pays attention to the questions of philology and archeology in the Talmud. This again is something unusual, for the average rabbi of the eighteenth century did not care for the etymology of a word in rabbinic literature as long as he understood the passage in its context. It may be not without significance that Rabbi Steinhardt's wife, the "Rebbezin Kroendel", the sister of Rabbi Isaiah Pick of Breslau, was well known as a rabbinical scholar, and her name was proverbial even in my youth. Her brother, Rabbi Pick, was, like Rabbi Steinhardt, more interested than most of his contemporaries in the philological side of Talmudic study.

A most remarkable combination of strict rigorism in ritual and blind belief in rabbinical authority with scientific interest, is presented in the Palestinian scholar, Hayyim Joseph David Azulai (1724-1806), who as a missionary for Palestinian institutions traveled widely over northern Africa and a great part of Europe, and spent the last thirty years of his life in the cultured community of Leghorn, shows a peculiar combination of two opposite tendencies in rabbinic studies. In his legal works he scrupulously notes the most rigorous practices of former rabbis. He discusses even such absurd questions as whether a woman committed adultery by having intercourse with a demon, he writes the most unintelligible Cabbalistic prayers, and at the same time applies to rabbinic literature very sound critical acumen. His dictionary of rabbinic authors is a valuable book of reference even today, based on thorough studies and critical examination of old manuscripts.

What these men did in occasional references was done systematically by Leopold Zunz. This most remarkable man was born in Detmold August 15, 1794, and having lost both father and mother at an early age, he was educated in the orphan asylum founded by the Samson family in Wolfenbuettel, afterwards, through the influence of the noble philanthropist, Israel Jacobson (1768-1828). changed into a Jewish high school. Jacobson, who was filled with the desire of raising the intellectual and economic condition of the Jews, had an eye on promising young students, who as teachers and ministers should help in carrying out his plans. He selected two boys of this school, Isaac Marcus Jost, born in 1793, and Zunz, one year younger, for this purpose. Both were sent to the Gymnasium in Wolfenbuettel and to the University of Berlin, with the aid of Jacobson, and thus are the first Jewish scholars who received a regular humanistic and academic education. Both made their mark in Jewish literature. Zunz was the first Jewish boy confirmed in the manner which since has become the rule even in orthodox circles. Jacobson himself, who liked to act as an amateur minister, performed the ceremony, and it was due to him that the name of Zunz was changed from Lipman to Leopold, or as Zunz in his sarcastic way expressed it, Jacobson inflicted the name of Leopold on him. Zunz's first essay on rabbinic literature was already mentioned. It may briefly be characterized as an outline of the method how to use rabbinic literature as source for the study of history. The main idea that Jewish literary activities are part of the general activities of mankind, is presented here, as it is presented in the title of one of his later works, published in 1845 under the title, "Zur Geschichte und Literatur." This collection of essays, dealing with various subjects, pertaining to that speciality, is simply called essays on history and literature, to emphasize the fact that Jewish history and literature is part of humanity's intellectual activity. One essay in this collection deals with Jewish ethics, giving extensive abstracts from mediaeval books on the subject. It is the author's design to show the high moral ideals found in Jewish literature and is therefore distinctly apologetic. The apologetic tendency, however, is at the same time scientific, for it does not read into the text anything which is not found in it, and therefore stands infinitely higher than any number of Christian works on the ethics of the New Testament.

Zunz, while always guided by scientific methods, was also moved by Jewish sentiments. It was his ambition to show that Judaism was misrepresented in its spiritual activities, as the Jews were misrepresented in their economic and domestic life. We find Zunz, therefore, often guided by political conditions of his time, though never losing sight of scientific aims. His master work, "Gottesdienstliche Vortraege der Juden", intended as a history of sermon literature, published in 1832, owed its origin to a rather comical feat of Prussian autocracy. King Frederick William III strongly disapproved of all attempts at progress within the synagogue. He saw no reason why the Jews, who found the synagogue tradition not to their liking, should not become Christians and in this way render the task governing his majesty's subjects easier. All autocrats from Antiochus Epiphanes down to Alexander III of Russia, were of the same opinion. Frederick William, therefore, availed himself of the opportunity offered by the protest of the orthodox section of the Berlin Jewish congregation and prohibited all innovations in the service of the synagogue. One of these innovations was a sermon in the vernacular. It was the object of Zunz in his work to show that the synagogue at all times had included in its service edification and instruction. While apologetic and occasioned by an emergency Zunz' work is strictly scientific. It deals with all the technical questions of the origin of sermon literature, most of which, down to the latter part of Middle Ages, was published anonymously, and only through keen criticism, based on the vocabulary and similar aids to historic research, the time, and eventually the place of its origin, can be ascertained. The work extends down to the author's time, and the wideness of the latter's information, as well as the exactness in detail are today a marvel for the student.

It was equally due to a silly order of the Prussian government that Zunz in 1836 published an essay on the names of the Jews. For some yet unascertained reason, the Prussian government has issued an order declaring that the Jews should not adopt any non-Jewish names. The order was so hastily conceived that it had to be changed several times in its wording, but it always remained impracticable. The Jewish banker, Aaron H. Heymann, of Berlin, was called to appear before the police for having committed the crime of calling a son Joachim. He could prove that his own father, a Prussian subject, bore that name, and he might have proven that Joachim is only a Greek spelling for a name found in the Hebrew Bible. The Prussian government finally let the whole order drop into oblivion, and it is said, though this is very likely a legend, that it was done because a Jewish father insisted on having his newly-born son recorded as Jesus, which undoubtedly was a Jewish name. Zunz' work again shows his vast amount of information on the Jewish literature of all ages.

Another work of the great master that deserves mention, is one which deals with the literature of liturgy, especially with the mediaeval hymns. Piyyutim. This subject is too technical to be presented to a general public, but it may be said that in it Zunz shows himself as independent of movements within the synagogue, as he shows himself independent in his other works of paternalism from outside. The reformers of that period objected to the length of the services, and to the unintelligible character of the liturgy of the old synagogue. Zunz again wished to urge the study of this literature as a historic study independent of the practical side of communal Jewish life. With this Zunz' religious position is defined. Reformers and orthodox have claimed him alike. He clearly says that he does not belong to either party. His anti-orthodox views are presented in an essay on higher criticism, in which he assigns the book of Leviticus to the post-exilic period, thus dating it from a time more than a thousand years after Moses. He also declares in a letter addressed to Aaron Bernstein, the author of a book on the myths in the Pentateuch, that he does not believe that any of the names in Genesis, except that of Nimrod, are historical. On the other hand, he also aims his sarcastic darts very often at reform, though in his youth he was preacher in the reform congregation of Berlin, and in 1835, for a few months preacher in the "Temple for Improved Service" in Prague. While whimsical, and therefore not always consistent in dealing with questions of the time, he seems to me to have defined his position quite clearly in a letter addressed to his youthful admirer David Kaufmann (1852-1897) then a student, and afterwards an author of marvelous erudition. In this letter, Zunz says, "I care only for Jews, not for Judaism". His attitude was that of a student, who looked upon the problems of Judaism as upon any other department of mankind's life.

The early works of Zunz stimulated many others to follow in his wake. Most prominent amongst them was Solomon Loew Rapoport (1790-1867), a native of Lemberg. Rapoport, who began his career like other intelligent young men of his country as a Talmud student, was first awakened to a different conception by the Hebrew literature produced within the Mendelssohn school. He learned to read German, and translated some of Schiller's poems into Hebrew verse. Afterwards, stimulated by Zunz, he began to devote himself to a scientific study of rabbinic literature and his biographical essays on some mediaeval authors are contributions of lasting value to our historic literature. Appointed to the position of "Kreis Rabbiner" in Tarnopol, an early center of progressive Jewish life, he was the object of bitter persecution on the part of the orthodox element. Called to Prague as rabbi in 1840, he represented there the extremely orthodox element, and his later works did not come up to the promises indicated in his earliest productions. He conceived the large plan of an encyclopedia of rabbinic Judaism, but the first volume which he published, containing only the letter "Aleph", remained a fragment, though quite valuable as such. Another Galician scholar closely allied with Rapoport, was Nahman Krochmal (1785-1840), born in Brody, another center of progressivism, and also stimulated by Zunz, as is best seen from the fact that, feeling his end near, he ordered in his will that his manuscripts be sent to Zunz, who should edit them. Krochmal has been largely overestimated, owing to the petty sectionalism which exists in Judaism, for the eastern scholars have the otherwise quite intelligible ambition to show that the Talmudists of the old school, broadening out in their intellect, were the real pioneers of science of Judaism. This subject, again, is too intricate to be presented to a lay public. It is true that men like Krochmal, saturated with the knowledge of rabbinic literature, to which they had devoted their early life exclusively, possessed an advantage over men like Zunz, whose education was harmonious and extended over all branches of human knowledge, but the application of the system of scientific method to rabbinical literature Krochmal and Rapoport had to learn from Zunz. With all this they still occasionally show the traces of the old uncritical school. One instance taken from Krochmal's posthumous work, shall illustrate this point. The Talmud says that Abraham already practiced Erub Tabshilin. The reader will at once see how difficult it is to present such a subject. The term mentioned is one of the legal fictions, quite frequent in rabbinic law. Work on holydays is prohibited as is work on Sabbath, with the only exception that what is needed for the sustenance of life, like cooking, is permitted on holydays, while prohibited on Sabbath. If a holyday precedes the Sabbath, the difficulty would increase, for it would require that cooking for the Sabbath be done on Wednesday, in case Thursday and Friday are holydays. The rabbis evaded that difficulty by advising that a small quantity of food be placed in the pantry on Wednesday and a formula be recited, which declares that this was prepared for the Sabbath. Then one may cook on Friday as much as he feels like, pretending that he is merely making liberal provision for the holyday, though he knows the food shall be eaten on Sabbath. The Talmud says that this was already practiced by Abraham. This statement is one of the many naive views on history found in many places in Talmud, and in all orthodox religions. Johann Deutschmann, a Lutheran theologian of the seventeenth century, proved that Adam was a Lutheran. Krochmal would not accept such an interpretation, but tells us that the Talmud merely meant that this evasion of the Biblical law was a consistent development of Judaism in its adaptation to new emergencies.

The presentation of science of Judaism would not be complete were we not to mention, at least in passing, two prominent Italian scholars, Isaac Samuel Reggio (1784-1855), of Goerz, and Samuel David Luzzatto (1800-1865), of Trieste. The former developed from a strict traditionalist and Cabbalist of the type, very frequent in Italy during the eighteenth century, into a bold advocate of reform, while the latter, for thirty-six years professor of Biblical and systematic theology in the Rabbinical College of Padua, the first modern training school for rabbis, conservative in his religious view, developed an astounding industry in all branches of the science of Judaism, especially in the history of literature, and is the first modern Bible exegete produced by Judaism, though quite conservative when viewed in the light of present-day higher criticism.

Of all the men quoted, Nahman Krochmal was the only one who had a son who followed in his father's footsteps. Reggio's son, educated in Padua, became a merchant. Of Luzzatto's sons, one, Filosseno, was a promising student of Judaism, but died at the age of twenty-five. Another one, Isaiah, a lawyer, devoted himself to the publication of his

"ONE"

(Being the Jewish Aspect of the Present Century's Theme)

By HARRIS J. GRUNDSTEIN

One — the figure, one — the Roman numeral, one—how much it represents! It represents a unity, an undivided entity, a single something—one.

A book with an infinite number of letters, words and phrases, marshalled in endless array, across numerous pages interspersed with numerous illustrations placed between two separate and distinct covers, is only a single something called a book. The thread of thought running through the beads of language, threads its way from cover to cover, making of all a single entity, a unity, an undivided something—one.

A human being with a body, two hands, two eyes, two ears, a nose, a mouth, a brain, a heart—is only a single something called a human being. An indescribable something called a soul runs as an invisible chord through each limb, each act, each thought, holding the mind, the body and the heart bound closely together in act, thought and motion and making of all a single entity, a unity, an undivided something—one.

And mankind is one. Adam and Eve, Moses, Caesar, Richelieu, Bonaparte, Disraeli, Christ, Washington, the Kaiser, President Wilson, you and I and all those beings yet unborn through all the years to come are atoms of that wonderful something called mankind. We are all absorbed in the stream of humanity which is coursing its way through the misty caverns of ages, over the pebbles and rocks of troublesome days and years, through the quiet sunny dells of worldly peace and comfort, on—on—on to the very source from which it sprang—the "Sea of Eternity". We are all merged into this stream and become a single entity, a unity, an undivided something—one.

And history is one. We hear much about eras, about certain periods of coma, of rest, of inactivity existing between one great event and another. That is wrong. That is a misconception. There are no intervening periods between great events, for great events do not come upon us suddenly. They are slowly developed and there is no place where we can point and say here this stream of events ended and there the new stream began. History gradually and steadily evolves itself. Facts of life slowly tend in a certain direction, gathering strength and forces as they accumulate, just as gases in the bowels of our earth oft tend to a certain direction. They meet with a barrier which arrests their progress and which they must overcome if they are to proceeded upon their ways. They gather behind this barrier accumulating in number, increasing in force, gaining in strength, until this augmented power cannot be longer denied. There follows an explosion, there is a crash and our eyes behold an earthquake. In life the same is true, the facts of life act as the gases in the earth and the explosion is followed by an "earthquake" if in science it is called an invention, if in music it is called a song, if in thought it is called a book, a play, a poem, a story. These are all eruptions which are inevitable. And they are all integral parts of that great something we call history.

History is as an immense, celestial urn which is gradually being shaped upon the slowly revolving wheel of time. It is being carefully, diligently and minutely molded by some indescribable power which seeks to complete this urn, this colossal urn, this urn called "Utopia". The pages of history which we see show us merely the completed surface of this wonderful urn which is to be completed some time in the hidden future.

And looking at the completed part of this urn we find not a flat surface but instead a carefully and delightfully molded face with an intricate design incrusted upon it. It is an harmonized interweaving of dreams, thoughts, ideals, actions and ambitions of mankind. Here we see the heavy impressions of science sunk deep down into the surface. There we find the protruding, inspiring forms raised by the diligent hands of labor. Here the touch of music; there the tint of art and diving in and out of all this design we discern the smooth stem of religion weaving its way between the leaves of friendship, faith and love. Each gives a different something to this stupendous, intricate, magnificent design—man's history. Each is an essential part of the whole. Without a bit of each the design would be incomplete, but with it we behold an inspiring yet baffling something called history—an involved entity, a sublime unity, a single something—one.

And we who are living today are one. The Jew and the Gentile, the Black and the White are all merely integral parts of that great something called man. What differences are there between us? The master minds of the world have sought to find a difference and they have failed. They have studied, they have searched, they have examined, they have experimented, and in the end they have seen the very same thing they had seen at the very first, they have seen and they still see only one great indivisible something called man. Shakespeare, the immortal bard, endeavoring to reason it otherwise, becomes baffled and in bewilderment he asks through his character "Shylock", "Hath not the Jew eyes, hath not the Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions; fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same summer and winter as the Christian is? If you prick us do we not bleed? If you tickle us do we not laugh? If you poison us do we not die"?

How true this is of all of man! Hath not a Negro eyes, hath not a Negro hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? Is not the Protestant fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same summer and winter as is the Jew? Our bodies are all the same. Our passions are all the same. Aye—even our Gods are all the same—No! No!—that is wrong—our Gods are not all the same. There are no Gods. There are no separate and distinct deities in this world. We all pay tribute to the same God—the one God—the only God, Israel's God—Jehova. He was worshipped by man when man was first created. He is still being worshipped by us and we shall continue to worship him forever.

But until now we have worshipped him in different ways. The ancient people, the first people of the earth worshipped him through the flowers, birds and trees. They believed that the great power who controlled the world was represented or symbolized by the flowers, birds and trees—for these things are beautiful and they reasoned that this supreme power being the source of all beauty was represented by them. So they worshipped their maker in this fashion until some of the people began to ask questions, and one of the questions they asked was, "How can an ever-present power be symbolized by something which was ever-changing with the seasons"? As a result they stopped worshipping the trees, birds and flowers and we next find people praying to animals — the swan, the white elephant and the sacred cow. This continued until the people set their minds aworking, until they began to reason things out. Then they came upon a queer problem. They could not perceive how an ever-existing, everliving power could be truly symbolized by that which could perish and die. With this in mind they forsook the worship of trees and animals and started to worship the sun, the moon and the stars. But this did not please them either. For though they were praying to something which they could see, the sun, the moon and the stars being visible, yet they could not see what the sun, the moon and the stars were. They soon abandoned this mode of worship and created images and idols at whose shrines they worshipped for a time until they again set their minds aworking. (Each change in the mode of worship was a direct result of an inevitable chain of thought.) They began to perceive that a truly great, active, all powerful God could not be adequately represented or even symbolized by any inanimate, bedaubed forms of clay, so they destroyed these images of clay, but in so doing they went to another extreme. They created idols and images of the imagination — the mythological gods — Mars, Apollo, Neptune, Diana, and all these deities were placed under the control of a supreme God, Jupiter or Jove (who was himself the mythological symbolization of the great power who controls all the world). But with the passing of Rome and of Greece this form of worship also passed away and we come to the last mode of worship where we find that people have based their religion upon the doctrine that man is created in the image of God and have worshipped that image—man—a human being—Buddha, Mohammed, Confucius and Christ.

Now—people prayed to these trees, animals and human beings not for what they were in themselves but for what they were believed to represent. The people believed that these trees, animals and human beings were the earthly symbolizations of that supreme power which controls all the world. But through all these thousands of years there has been only one group of peoples which has continually prayed directly to that great power himself, and that group are the Jews. And what is this power to which they have prayed and to which they still pray?

Some say 'tis might of Superman,
Some say 'tis nature's rod,
Jews know not what that power is
But worship it as—God.

And the Jew can never be taken from his God and his God can never be taken from him—for the Jew's God is visible only to the mind's eye. He is everything and yet he is nothing.

Yet this great ideal, this quaint belief, this wonderful conception has outlived all other beliefs and conceptions, still lives and will live on forever, for that is the very same God we have all been praying to indirectly, and eventually we shall all pray to him as do the Jews—eventually we shall pray to him directly. For though there are gods and gods and gods, there is only one real God and that is the one who revealed himself to Abraham and bade him to teach all of mankind that the Lord, our God, is one and only one, and his descendants, the children of Israel, the Jewish people, have been doing this for innumerable centuries, and are still doing it and must continue to do this, to spread this belief in this power himself—for he is the only God that ever was or will be, and science itself bears witness to this fact.

Science in its painstaking endeavor to question everything and to destroy all which cannot withstand its searching glance, has been able to discredit all the so-called Gods that have ever been worshipped on the earth save one and only one. The scientists say, give us matter and motion and we will create whatever man may desire. But matter and motion are the body and spirit of Israel's God—Jehova, and eventually we will all recognize the fact that he is the only God to pray to. It is inevitable, we must. And who should be the ones to carry the eternal fire of holiness to the sanctuary's threshhold of the generations to come if it be not the Jews who have steadfastly maintained their belief in him through thousand of years of relentless oppression and persecution? It is their duty. It is their task to teach all of mankind that our God is one and only one, and that "to him every knee must bend and every tongue pay homage".

But this task shall not now be such a difficult task to perform. We have all already recognized that the God of the Jews is the God of all, that he is your God as well as mine, that all our Gods are in reality one and the same.

In fact we have gone much farther. We have already perceived that fundamentally we are all, Jew and Gentile, Black and White, one and the same. But this does not mean that we are identical. We are one as to our beliefs. Our methods of worship may be different at present but the ultimate object of our worship is the same and eventually our methods of worship shall become the same. And we are the same as to our bodies. The same flesh, bone and blood is in us all. But we are different as to our missions, our duties, our tasks.

Every person, in fact everything, that has ever been put into this world has been put here for some purpose and that purpose is its mission. The fruits, animals and trees were created to give food, clothing and shelter to man; to help man to live and to progress to some ultimate unseen goal. They all work for man and man works for mankind and all form a glorious unity.

Now—unity does not mean that everything in it is identical. If things are identical there is no difference between them and there is therefore no problem of unifying them, since they already are identical. But unity means something entirely different. It means an harmonious union, an adapted entity, a combined, conformed, co-related mass of different things. It means that there are separate and distinct somethings possessed of inherent individual characteristics of their own working harmoniously with each other. It means a unity of action produced by co-operative individualism. It means that things are themselves and yet of help to another. It means that things are alone and yet connected. It means that things are individual but co-operative. It means that there is an harmonious combination of all produced by co-operative individualism.

Somewhere in some secure vault or underground chamber of war-ridden France there is hidden a world-famed picture called "The Angelus". It is the work of the world-renowned artist, Millet, and is being jealously guarded as a sacred treasure of this renowned artist's handiwork. It is a glorious picture and yet it is only a single picture, a single entity—a single something—one.

But this picture is not one mass of red or of green, of light or of dark. It is an harmonized presentation of numerous tints, of various shapes of shades and of shadows, of fields, of skies, of trees, of animals, of human beings, of human dreams, of human passions, all skillfully worked into a delightful image or rather inspiring portrayal of life itself, and it is called "The Angelus"—a picture, a wonderful picture, yet only a single picture, a single entity, a single something—one. Yet the trees and the animals and the beings therein represented are not identical. They may be alike in that they are all possessed of some form of life. They may be the same in that they are the tools of the artist who uses them in his daily labors (and for the work to be perfect the tools have to be perfect), but they are different kinds of tools used by the artist for different purposes, for different reasons to obtain different results—all of which are necessary for the completion of the inspired task which the artist has set himself to perform—the painting of this picture.

Now—an artist by himself can create no wonderful picture. He must first have a canvas upon which to paint his picture. Weavers must sit at their looms to create this for him from flax or cotton, and farmers have to obtain this flax or cotton for the weavers to use. The artist must have a frame upon which to stretch this canvas and keep its surface smooth. So lumbermen must enter forests and fell trees. These trees must be taken to saw mills where they are to be sawed into the proper shapes and forms. Then some of these new shapes—called boards—must be nailed together by a carpenter, and the canvas stretched over it by the true craftsman. And to do only this much for the creation of this picture we first require hammers and saws and machinery. These require coal, iron and steel. We need to employ miners to dig down into the bowels of our earth to obtain these for us. Now, the artist needs his pigments. These must be made for him by chemists. The chemist needs test tubes which require glass which in turn require certain forms of sand which have to be dug from the earth by laborers; and he needs chemicals with which to make these paints; these must be obtained from earth, tree and flowers, by other skilled men. Meanwhile we must have factories and mills and all must be constructed and operated by craftsmen—men who know how to do that which they are required to do.

And the artist needs brushes to paint with; he needs pots and pans in which to place his pigments. He needs birds, flowers, trees, men, skies, fields and rivers to pose for him. And all these men, all these mechanics, all these human beings need to live; need to be clothed, fed and sheltered, which requires more craftsmen. They need a clothing, feeding and sheltering of the mind as well as the body, and of soul, as well as the mind. This requires architecture, wearing apparel, books and music. And all of these must exist, and all must be used—for all and more are needed for the creation of that one picture which is now hidden in some secure place somewhere in war-ridden France.

All these craftsmen, all these trees, all these animals, are alike in that they are possessed of some form of life. All are the same in that they are the tools of this artist (and for the picture to be perfect—the tools had to be perfect). But they are not identical tools, for each one was needed and was used for a different purpose, for a different reason, to obtain a different result.

All the peoples of the earth are the tools of the world's greatest artist—God. And they are not identical tools, for each is possessed of a different form of genius, some for science, some for music, some for art, and some for religion. And each is a different kind of tool being used by this great artist for different purposes; for different reasons to obtain results. Each has its own distinctive duty to perform upon this master artist's sublime canvas called "Life". And that duty can be performed only so long as the one seeking to do so is himself. Each must be a perfect tool for the artist to use or else the work cannot be perfect. If the Jew is to be a perfect tool for this artist and is to perform his duty—the spreading of the belief in this Jehova himself—the Jew must remain a Jew. He must not submerge or diffuse himself, for then his strength becomes subdued and eventually it shall shrink into nothingness. If the Jew is to be true to his duty, he must first be true to himself. And if he is to perform that duty he must remain himself, a Jew—a real Jew—an undiluted, undistorted, unrevised Jew.

NEO CHASSIDISM OR EMOTIONAL JUDAISM.

By Aaron Bray, M. D.

Read before the Dorshe Droth Society, January, 1918.

The history of Judaism since the beginning of the Christian era is replete with efforts to undermine Rabbinism and combat Talmudic Judaism. Well known among these movements are Karaism, Kabbalism, Mendelssohnism, Chassidism, and our modern Reformed Judaism. Each of these movements produced men of great power who served the spiritual interest of the people, as well as great imposters who served their own commercial or financial interest. Probably the most harmful of these movements was the so-called Kabbalistic period. Confusion of thought reigned supreme. Exponents of various shades of opinions were in constant conflict with each other, often necessitating an appeal to the Christian and civil authorities in an effort to down what they considered mischievous tendencies. The learned Jews were still able to steer clear on some middle ground clinging tenaciously to talmudic religion, the masses, however, suffered from mental confusion, their religious mind fluctuating to and fro knowing no way out of the chaos produced by the contesting elements. The faith of Judaism was hanging in the balance in the beginning of the eighteenth century. On the one hand the complete collapse of Kabbalism as a result of the failure of the Sabbateans to make good their promises, and the various exposures of fraud subsequently have been productive of considerable dissension among the masses. On the other hand a cold pantheism or Spinosaism has permeated the more cultured minds leading gradually to religious nihilism. In the center, midway between these two extremes, stood a dry cut Rabbinism which while of great intellectual and spiritual value, nourished a kind of learned aristocracy, satisfying the Talmudic student but not giving any impetus of religious fervor to the masses. The student of Jewish history and its philosophy must analyze and visualize the conditions that must have prevailed at that time in order to appreciate the value of neo-Chassidism as a contributory factor in the development and preservation of Judaism. We are apt to underestimate the value of the Chassidic movement if [illegible] do not view the subject from a clear, unbiased point of view. It is likewise essential that we take into consideration the emotional element that plays such an important part in religious movements. No man can satisfactorily explain his religion on the grounds of Reason. All so-called scientific religions are neither science nor religion. Science does not stimulate religious fervor; neither does religious emotionalism depend upon the verdict of science. Viewing, as we try to do, the evolutionary stages of a religious movement, and calling to our aid the experiences we have gained from present-day controversies in matters pertaining to religion, we shall probably be able to ascribe to the Chassidic movement possibly beneficial function in the religious development of the Jews in the 18th century.

All religions have this in common that they work for their self preservation; they vary in the methods employed and yet not infrequently methods employed by one are copied by others. The main object is to prevent decay or absorption. Judaism works its salvation in the same way. It will not die, and does not want to be absorbed either by religions antagonistic to it or even by a religion that claims some similarity. History will testify that while an individual may lose all religious feeling and become emancipated as an absolute free thinker or atheist, a people never emancipates itself from religious doctrines. Individuals may be guided by reason, a people is led by emotion. Emotionalism is the fountain of Religion. Emotionalism is the father of mysticism and all peoples are subject to it. This I hold to be a truth that no amount of subtle argument can controvert. This principle alone can explain the springing into existence of various cults and sects which become so infectious and contagious that they rapidly spread among the masses. The psychology of the masses plays the most important part in swinging a people from one extreme to another and only occasionally is there middle way to stem the tide of emotionalism. This holds good in all religions and can be observed in the evolution of Judaism. Judaism may be said to be more susceptible to this generalized principle, because of the peculiar environment under which it has to develop and especially because its evolution must take place in environments peculiarly strange to its atmosphere. A religion that has to grow in all atmospheres of various cultures influenced by external pressure, has a much more serious struggle for its preservation and cannot escape infection or infiltration of various emotional states from the surrounding elements.

Chassidism and Traditional Judaism.

The student of Jewish history must admit that Chassidism has injected a new element into Judaism. This new element, namely, the emphasis of moral universalism in which enthusiasm plays an important role, was a healthy one, whose primary object was to infuse a deep sense of religious feeling into the masses that could not discern the subtle pilpul of Talmudism or Rabbinism. Like all other religious movements in Judaism, Chassidism based all its doctrines on the Bible. All Biblical stories were crowned with a halo of deep religious and moral value. The manifest content of the Bible was merely an external garb containing a deep religious meaning in a latent form which could only be discerned by proper interpretation. The interpreter of necessity from this point of view must be a pious man who considers himself a part of the God Spirit or divinity. The interpreter must be a holy man, a righteous man who sees in everything the manifestation of God. Unlike all other movements in Judaism, Chassidism has not neglected the traditional or oral law but has combined written and oral laws for the advancement of its interest. These laws Chassidism considered merely as means to the end of sanctifying the holy scripture. Even Talmudic Judaism considered deed above creed; the chassidic doctrine lays, however, more stress on the motif of religion. Knowledge of the Thora and Talmud, while useful, was not considered essential, but the thought or idea or motif was the essence and substance leading man to the realization of God. According to Talmudic Judaism, the Am Haaretz in the old accepted meaning of the word could not be a pious man. In the new interpretation of Chassidism, Chasidoth is independent of Limudoth. A man may be a very pious and holy man without being at the same time a great Talmudic scholar. A Chasid is superior to the Talmid Chacham, and a penitent or Ba'al Teshuba is superior to all regardless, as to his Talmudic knowledge. This element of piety extolled by the new Chassidism has at once acted as a revolt against a learned Talmudic aristocracy and placed a doctrine into the hands of the masses which raised them to a level at least in their own estimation with the subtle Talmudic scholar. In short, Talmudic Judaism appealed to the intellect, Chassidism appealed to the emotion. Not all men are intellectually endowed, but all men respond quickly to the emotional element; hence the rapid rise of emotional religion. Chassidism still encouraged Talmudic studies, but not at the expense of the less learned. Chassidism did not choose its leaders or rabbis, because of a deep knowledge in Talmudic literature, but estimated the value of its leaders by the degree of piety or holiness. Consequently a Rabbinical degree of Semicha was not essential to leadership. In fact, Rabbinical degrees were not looked upon favorably and the holder thereof was regarded somewhat with suspicion. It may be said that the Chassidic movement was an effort to reclaim the masses to Judaism without the requirements of years of preparation in Talmudic studies.

Causes That Contributed to the Development of Chassidism.

Every new movement must of necessity find a fertile field for its propagation. A susceptibility to the movement must exist in order that it take root among the masses. First it requires that there should be a definite degree of dissatisfaction with the existing current ideas. There must be manifest a disagreement among the masses or a latent detachment from previous notions. Every new movement requires two essential elements for its progress. First a prepared ripe field, and second an ardent enthusiast to propagate the new thought or idea. It is the combined forces of these two elements that make a new movement possible. The time must have its man, even as the man must have the proper psychologic period. The historian can easily see both these elements present in the early part of the 18th century when Israel Baal Shem became the unconscious leader of a rapidly developing sect in Judaism. I say, unconscious leader, merely because Bal Shem did not lead, he was merely followed. Both classes of Jewish society were deeply affected and suffered from confusion in those days. On the one hand a cold rationalism or Spinosaic pantheism had made a deep breach into the old orthodoxy and had given rise to a certain amount of skepticism among the educated and semi educated classes. On the other hand, the unlearned classes, or rather masses, suffered a deep disappointment from the failure of the Cabbalistic wing and followers of Sabbati Zevi. The utter shameful collapse of the Sabbathian movement which was part of Cabbalistic Judaism was largely responsible for a considerable loss of faith among the masses. To this must be added the shameful conduct of Chajon, and Frank, which led to a wholesale conversion of thousands of Jews of the old type of Chassidism or Cabbalists who were preaching a doctrine of Trinity.

The Philosophy of Neo-Chassidism.

It is not an easy matter to define clearly the essential difference between Chassidism and Talmudic Judaism; neither can one clearly state the essence of Chassidism. There is indeed no special book that defines Chassidism. One can only gather from desultory and isolated references that Chassidism has evolved a peculiar philosophy of life. One may term it a spiritual pantheism in contradistinction to the Spinosaic spiritless Pantheism. Chassidism finds the spirit of God manifest in everything. There is nothing in the world that does not contain sparks of holiness (Nizuz Kadisha); that without that essence it could not exist. Schechter speaks of the essence of Chassidism as the universality of the Divinity from which all important propositions and rules of conduct are deduced. There is nothing which is void of God. God is present in every human thought, in everything created; one may therefore contemplate God even in the material joys of life. He who does not fully believe in the universality of God's presence has never properly acknowledged God's sovereignty, for he excludes God from an existing portion of the actual world. The cardinal dogma of Chassidism is "God, the father of Israel; God, the merciful; God, the all-powerful; the God of love not only created everything but is embodied in everything. Creation is continuous, so is revelation. This revelation can only be appreciated by faith; hence, faith is more efficacious than learning. It is faith and not knowledge that gives a man strength in the face of danger and emboldens him to become a martyr to a cause. In every man one must see the work of God. We must, therefore, honor him for the good, and abstain from judging the evil that is in him, but we must pray for him, we must work for his spiritual reclamation. Chassidism claims three cardinal virtues: Humility, Cheerfulness and Enthusiasm (Hislahavoth), the latter principle is emphasized everywhere and is supposed to be the most important means or medium by which one reaches the very presence of God. It must be remembered that no religious precepts have been abrogated by Chassidism and everybody was supposed to have lived up to all religious regulations, but these were merely the outward expression of true service or ABODAH. One must keep the commandments not because he will win grace in the eyes of God, but to learn how to love God. The Thora is eternal but its explanation is to be made by the spiritual leaders of Judaism. Of the three cardinal virtues the HISHLAHAVOTH plays a very important part in the Chassidoth. Prayer is the chief means of reaching or approaching God. Prayer must move in the realms above and not be concerned with affairs sublunary. Prayers should not be offered for the trivial wishes and needs of the individual, but should be the means to bring one nigh to God. In prayer man must lay aside his individuality and not even be conscious of his existence. The self or ego must entirely be obliterated. If the self is not entirely quiescent the object of prayer is not attained. Indeed it is only through God's grace that after true prayer man is yet alive; to such a point must the self-annihilation proceed. In order to reach such degree of self-annihilation it is necessary to employ certain methods preparatory to the prayer. The set time for prayer is not considered essential in Chassidism. This preparation consists of a ritual bath which is indulged in by the Chasid, even in cold weather. Kevonoh (devotion) and hislahavoth (enthusiasm) are the chief elements in prayer by means of which one may reach the high stage of self-forgetfulness. This is to be gotten by various bodily motions (shaking and jumping), to work oneself into an ecstasy. The real pious man has entrance to the Schechina, and may through such communion, radiate various powers to the followers of the creed. He may be able to heal the sick and obtain children for the childless mother and [illegible] future events. Service or [illegible] essential element and this must [illegible] with a certain amount of [illegible] mere mechanical performance [illegible] ordinance is valueless. A man is not nearer to his God when he has gone through the whole round of laws to be found in the code. The service of fear or for reward is likewise useless, it must be a service of love. Man must not remain on the same religious plane; merely repeating certain routines of yesterday is not service. There must be a daily advance in the knowledge and love of the divine master. Freedom from active sin constitutes merely a negative virtue and may be the result of a lack of temptation. Sin may be latent in the heart, even if not committed in act. Only the uninterrupted communion of God can free the heart from concealed sin. You must, therefore, have God always with you. Piety is the essence and substance of Chassidism. This can be expressed by prayer and singing of hymns. Satan is more afraid of these exercises than of all the controversies in the Meheram Shiff. Chassidism was not against learning, but it did not lay stress on it to the extent that Rabbinism did. Furthermore they were more interested in the so-called SIFRE MUSAR than the Talmud or Bible; learning that does not yield the fruit of piety is a useless thing.

The Spread of Chassidism.

Chassidism spread very rapidly; now it has practically claim to one-third of the Jewish population. One cannot always account for the rapid spread of some movements in the world of religion. One can see this rapid-spreading movement in the so-called Christian science movement which has some marked similarity to the Chassidic movement, inasmuch as both these sects claim the power to heal the sick by prayer. It seems man is a mystical animal and is willing to be led or misled by mysticism. The dry laws of science do not appeal to him; the flexible laws of emotion and the spiritual speculation do. The supernatural controls him, and he is by heredity susceptible to its forces. It requires years of learning to unlearn the impressions received in childhood and to be guided by reason rather than by emotion. It is therefore not altogether strange to observe that the ignorant are more susceptible to superstition and the supernatural and consult the oracle of the time. Chassidism, it must be remembered, developed in the communities where the least amount of learning prevailed. Rumania, Galicia, Russian Poland, part of Hungary, where Talmudic learning was at a low ebb, were fertile grounds for the new doctrine. It is a curious coincident that at the same time similar movements developed in Christianity. Thus the jumpers in Scotland and the Shakers in America appeared to have made considerable progress. The charitable feeling towards each other had naturally attracted some adherents. Of course, one must remember that Chassidism is as old as Judaism and certainly must have existed in a considerable number during the Maccabean period and, furthermore, that the Cabbalistic era was full of Chassidism, believing in all kinds of miracles and in the power of the Rabbi to heal all ailments, so that the neo-Chassid is an off-shoot, not of a short and rapid evolution, but the product of centuries. Still, it is not easy, on rational grounds, to explain the rapidity with which this Chassidism spread and why it still holds sway over a very large percent of Jewry. Fanaticism is the usual explanation; I confess, however, that the word does not explain.

Origin of Neo-Chassidism.

Neo-Chassidism begins with the Bal Shem Tob. It began to spread through the period of his life. He was apparently a sincere believer in religious pantheism. He had no idea of finding a new religious doctrine, he was merely one of those wandering souls who seek their own spiritual elevation in their own peculiar way. He did not try to change religion but change himself while tenaciously adhering to the traditional religous practices and finding happiness in it. He was deeply religious, not for gain, not for reward, but for the satisfaction of his soul. He did not establish a system of philosophy, but he lived a life that revealed a certain theory or religious system. He was born in the year 1700, somewhere in Wallachia, of poor parentage. In his early youth he was regarded of very little promise. He played truant very often and rather than be in chedar he would roam about in the mountains. He served as belfer (assistant teacher), later as shammes, and later still as Shochet; finally as a teacher. After his marriage he was an expressman, Bal Aagula, and finally with the aid of his brother-in-law he became an inn keeper. While trying hard to earn

A WORLD IN THE REMAKING

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

Written for the B'nai B'rith News

For a full year the United States have been co-partners with the Allied nations in the war against the Central Powers. We have openly and formally declared Germany as our foe; with its confederates we have broken off diplomatic intercourse. We mean to fight to a finish. We shall not rest our arms until a decision is reached in line with our objects in leaving behind our traditional isolation. Thus it is at once brought home to us that we right here have concluded one period in our history and have launched another which must needs be of momentous consequences to us. With one stroke of the pen, as it were, we have gone back upon our policies of over a century old; we have intermeddled with a conflict primarily European and we have contracted alliances with European powers. Shall we say that we have let go the corollary of our previous position, the Monroe doctrine? Perhaps. At all events we cannot expect that at the concluison of the war we shall emerge quite the same people that we had been. In the stress of a struggle of unprecedented magnitude we have submitted to conscription and soon enough we may heed the cry for universal training in arms. The bane of militarism which we have all along shunned bids fair to overwhelm us and it makes little difference that it was not of our own choosing. Nor does it matter that we do not mean to use it for aggressive purposes. Aggression is frequently but another form of defense. To ward off peril at your doors you must strike out abroad and strike first and efficiently. We are witnessing round about us a highly commendable spirit of patriotism calling for and obtaining sacrifices of life and treasure; but with it is intermingled the high-handed lawlessness of the mob striking terror in the hearts of dissidents. Not that unpatriotic acts should be condoned, but then it is the business of constituted authorities, not of vigilance committees. What is going on here in America is but a sample of the transformations with which all the belligerent nations are confronted. There is a world in the remaking. No one knows when this war will end. It may drag on to the end of the first quarter of the twentieth century. We have therefore all reason to anticipate great changes in the humanity of the succeeding decades of reconstruction. Before we can attempt to delineate the nature of post-bellum conditions, we must seek to ascertain what the status was before the furies of the world war were let loose, the sum total of the achievements of the nineteenth century.

We shall, of course, have to start our retrospect a bit in advance. A well-known writer, in describing the nineteenth century, has found it expedient to begin, so to speak, with the creation of the world. But then he had set himself the task of studying the foundations of the century's civilization. With us the century that has passed away is to be understood as the precursor of the times we are going through now. We must therefore take much for granted.

The political history of the nineteenth century has as its starting point the French Revolution; for us Americans it sets in a decade earlier with the Declaration of Independence. Both upheavals were a sequel to the rationalist systems of philosophy of the close of the eighteenth century. On this side of the Atlantic we borrowed a few phrases as to the rights of man and the like; but on the whole we had the easier task which may be described as the detachment of a colony from its mother country. We became our own masters; readjustments of a formal character became necessary; but we took over our Anglo-Saxon heritage into the new order almost without a break. The fathers of the Constitution builded well and we have remained a stable community. Not so in Europe. There it meant a break with the feudal system, that relic of the Middle Ages. The Latin hotheads did not stop at liberating the third estate; they experimented with all sorts of vagaries; they resorted to carnage and internecine warfare, until they were held at bay by a coalition of powers fearing lest the contagion might invade their own territories. In the hour of danger a master-general seized the reins of government. The war of defense was turned into campaigns of aggression. The revolution issued into imperialism. The conqueror, at his will, moved the boundaries of nations; of his own kin he planted kinglets wherever it suited his whim; he swept away the old order, brushing it aside as so much cobweb, and let in the new light from the imperial seat, the center of the world's culture. At Moscow, and later on Belgian soil, before the doors of England, the empire was shattered, and Napoleon was carried away a prisoner to muse over his successes and failures. The period of restoration ensued. A romantic hankering after pre-revolutionary chimeras set in. The Holy Alliance entrenched itself in autocracy. Yet the national uprisings which brought on the collapse of imperialism left their impress. While France was rocking upon the unstable ground of change, now a kingdom, now a republic and now again an empire, Prussia with its policy of blood and iron crushed premature schemes for German unity until it could thrust out its rival Austria, consigning to it the impossible task of welding together a heterogeneous congeries of nationalities and dooming it to a state of dependence upon the northern empire, at last consolidated upon the ruins of the second French empire. Italy followed suit and Rome, the seat of the temporal power of the Pope, became the capital of the united kingdom, a third, but somewhat unwilling, partner in the alliance of the Central Powers. France meditated revenge, and at last entered into a compact with Russia; the Moscovite empire, balked for a time in its Balkan and Oriental policies by the German chancellor, kept nursing its Pan-Slavist dreams over against Pan-German machinations. England, watchful of the balance of power, cautiously threw in its lot with the Franco-Russian Entente. The Balkan wars led to the dismemberment of Turkey in Europe; at the doors of Constantinopie the Bulgars were halted. Austria was quick to snatch a slice. Italy annexed Tripoli and had its designs upon Albania. Russia had been weakened by the Japanese War and seemed to recuperate. Germany, feverishly perfecting its fighting machine on land and at sea and chafing under British restraint, was making ready against "the day." And suddenly the day came. The war was let loose under the pretext of defense with the maxim "Necessity knows no law". But as the bloody warfare continued, the schemes of Pan-Germanism unfolded themselves, and we are pretty well acquainted with the dream of Central Europe, with Austria and Bulgaria and Turkey as vassals of the Kaiser, with Russia dismembered, with the road opened overland to Central Asia and India. We are in the throes of another imperialism, more ruthless than the Napoleonic, and the menace of it extends to our own shores.

So much for the political antecedents of the world-war. Imperialism is the foe of small nations. It means to impose the will of a dominant race upon the vanquished races. Germany is past master in the art of spreading its "kultur". Where the Ostmark, called into being as a bulwark against Slav invasion, has failed, the northern states assembled under one head have succeeded only too well. Of old they sent out their colonies into Slav regions and into the Orient, and Bismarck attempted the Germanization of the Polish provinces through forced sales of land, through transplantation of Poles and the settlement of Germans in Polish territory. Naturally there were rumblings, as also among the Danes in the provinces snatched from Denmark and the Alsatians in the conquered lands beyond the Rhine. For it is indeed the weakness of imperialism that in the name of nationalism, the nationalism of the governing majority, it tramples underfoot the aspirations of minorities. Another foe of nationalism is internationalism. Its rise in the nineteenth century was conditioned by the struggle between capital and labor. The war of the classes superimposed itself upon, nay, placed itself athwart, the conflict of nationalities. The many questions of Pan-Slavism, Pan-Germanism, and whatnot are submerged in the all-absorbing question of the rise of the proletariat. Under whatever names the struggle manifests itself, be it Communism, Socialism, Nihilism, Anarchy, it partakes everywhere of an economic character. The mark of the nineteenth century was industrialism. It held its sway in the democracies of Western Europe and America as well as in the autocracies of the East. Sometimes it took on the form of agrarian plutocracy. The haves and the have-nots are locked in a combat just now held in abeyance because of the war. But the Russian revolution is upon us, and it is largely of an economic character. To what lengths internationalism may go, how it deadens all regard for national rights, though it feebly pronounces for self-determination, how it kills the fighting spirit and meekly submits to invasion, how it loses itself in Utopian dreams and lets go its grip upon the realities, we are witnessing with our own eyes. Collectivist internationalism is clearly pitted against the individualism of Anglo-Saxon civilization no less than against Teutonic imperialism. And when it comes, as it has come, to a decision by force of arms, individualism must at least for the time being yield to concentration of power and discipline.

Another factor, and the least appreciated, in the present struggle is the question of colonization. History knows of the migration of masses. Economic reasons usually lie back of them. Certainly it is the case with the migration of individuals leaving behind overpopulated countries or districts for such as are sparsely settled and thus afford an opportunity for obtaining a livelihood. Surplus population is a problem with which every civilized country has to reckon. The Teutonic powers of Central Europe found the world pretty much divided when they bethought themselves of colonizing. Germans and Austrians had migrated before as individuals or as groups. But then they found themselves lodged in ready-made states with a predominant civilization not their own to which they were forced to accommodate themselves. Underground attempts, fostered by the home government, might be made to maintain a semblance of separatism; but in the long run it could not prevail. Germany perforce had to recognize that she had sons in the diaspora whom she was rapidly losing. But colonies of the other order, planted amidst the blacks of Africa, with the chance of establishing the Germans as the dominant element, were but few. For their protection a navy had to be built up, and conversely, as the navy grew, it called for an object of protection, for more colonies in oversea dominions. Germany showed the mailed fist and demanded a share in the world's spoil. It reached out in thought for the possessions of other nations. Witness the Agadir incident. So far we have considered colonization from the point of view of the mother country. But colonization becomes a problem to the country in which large masses of foreigners proceed to settle, especially if by reason of a lower standard of living they tend to disturb the wage scale of native laborers or because of diversity of race and color they become unassimilable. Harsh and discriminating immigration laws will cause friction between one country and another and may precipitate a conflict. It is sometimes wise to offer the nation offended other outlets and spheres of colonizations elsewhere. Moreover, at all times the exigencies of trade will bring foreigners to our doors and all nations more or less tolerate expatriation or facilitate naturalization. Thus the homegeneity of national states becomes in a measure impaired. National civilizations everywhere become a matter of the dominant majority. Where races are so dovetailed that it becomes well nigh impossible to designate the territory after the one or the other everlasting friction must be the result. Think of Czechs and Germans, Croatians and Hungarians. Of such problems there will be a goodly number when the ambassadors of the belligerent nations shall sit down to compose their differences and to establish a lasting peace.

The plenipotentiaries will naturally deal with political and economic questions primarily. But there are other problems awaiting humanity as reconstituted after the war. It is felt that certain lines of thought will have to be re-examined. Men will go down to the bottom of the gigantic conflict if it is to be avoided in the future. The question of disarmament and of international law will come up. Shall the coming peace be merely a truce which in its turn will pave the way for a still bloodier conflict? The dream of the cessation of warfare once and for all times will occupy the minds of that pacifism which is grounded in idealism. Men will have realized that back of the world war lies a gross materialism which is the outgrowth of those marvelous achievements in scientific achievements for which the nineteenth century stood out pre-eminent. And of all the aberrations of the materialistic mind the most pernicious has been the elevation of the state out and above the sphere of morality. The state can do no wrong. Self-preservation is the supreme law of nations. Such maxims will have to be revised. Room must be found for international moral obligations. There must be a way to punish outlaw nations. Our President has outlined a plan for a League of Nations. That is something different from the International. For whereas the International levels the differences between nations and civilizations, the League of Nations contemplates unity in diversity. E pluribus unum must become the motto of the universe. In other words, humanity will be confronted with the problems of universalism and particularism. Each has been exaggerated in the past. Both may very well coexist. In the quest after larger spiritual values mankind will likewise grope its way to a solution of its attitude towards the Invisible. Accepted tenets of religion will pass through the crucible. Religion has divided and again united man. Here again it may be found that the truth lies in the middle. The absolute claim to truth may be given up and a spirit of true toleration find cultivation. We shall learn to accommodate ourselves to a diversity of forms in a unity of goal. It is not at all necessary that the One God must be worshipped everywhere after the same fashion.

As Jews we are particularly concerned with the outcome of the war. The nineteenth century brought us emancipation, but in its wake there came Anti-Semitism and the Jewish question. It is as irksome to the peoples among whom we live as to ourselves. Both sides will have to co-operate to find a solution. The Napoleonic formula may have to be revised. With a changed world we must expect transformation in the lot of the Jew. Among ourselves three modes of solution have been evolved. They all date from the conditions preceding the war. A new chapter is being opened up in universal history. It cannot but mean a new chapter in the story of our people.

Now that we have sketched the manifold problems with which mankind and the Jew will have to grapple in the twentieth century, when once the bloody war is over and done with, we may proceed to an analysis of the momentous questions before us. The contrasting points of view, such as Internationalism and Nationalism, Universalism and Particularism, Diaspora and Mother Country, Messianic Times and the Messiah, Reform and Orthodoxy, may be capable of a synthesis, were I to adopt Hegelian terminology such as underlies Krochmal's Guide to the Perplexed of Our Own Times. Perhaps that the following disquisitions will go to constitute a New Guide to the Perplexed of Our Own Times. Surely the times have changed since 1851.

EVERY JEW

By Rabbi Emanuel J. Jack.

Stockton, Cal.

All Jewish institutions stand out as bulwarks of Judaism. Some form the line of first defense, others the second line of defense, and so on; yet each in a greater or lesser degree serves as a protecting wall against the inroads and onslaughts of those many outside influences that make for the undermining and loosening of the foundation stones of our faith. Just as our glorious country for its protection against foes and invaders looks to the army, the navy, and the marines; so, too, do we look to the Jewish congregation, the Jewish club and the Jewish lodge for the protection of our Judaism for the preservation and promotion of our common ideals and for the engendering of loyalty to our birthright. And just as the marines are looked upon as the first to fight on land and sea, so, too, are our lodges, especially our beloved order of B'nai B'rith, which has ever shown itself the first to fight on land or sea for the rights and protection of every Jew.

The B'nai B'rith alone, of all our numberless organizations, has created a common ground on which can stand and tread all Jews, regardless of their religious inclinations, regardless of their national aspirations, regardless of their shades of belief and differences of custom. In this respect the B'nai B'rith is bigger and broader and more inclusive than any other Jewish organization. For all others, barring none, have restricted themselves in their powers for good through inviting responses to their appeals to particular groups only. Thus they present a paradoxical condition not unlike that which confronted the two youngsters who were watching a building in the process of erection. Said the one to the other, "What is it that keeps the bricks together?" "Why, it's a stuff called mortar that keeps them together," replied the little fellow. "Aw, you're wrong," corrected the first one, "that's the stuff that keeps them apart." And how true it is, institutions that should serve to keep the Jews together tend to keep the Jews apart. However, we find the B'nai B'rith, after years of struggle and discouragement and disheartenment, today standing alone in its wonderful, stupendous and colossal achievement of cementing all the various Jewish elements into one grand, massive, towering structure of strength and service.

Disobedience to the state in any manner within the state's competence is disobedience to God. Obedience to the state is loyalty to God, and patriotism is blessed by religion.—Cardinal O'Connell.

NEWS FROM LONDON

By Our Correspondent Dr. M. Epstein

London, April 15, 1918.

The great social and literary communal event of the past month was Mr. Israel Zangwill's first "Arthur Davis" memorial lecture, under the auspices of the Jewish Historical Society of England. Arthur Davis belonged to that type of man who, though devoted to business, yet finds time for scholarship. In this country Thomas Hodgkin was a banker, but he also wrote the best account of the barbarian invasion of Italy; Grote was a business man, but he found time to study the fortunes of ancient Greece. Arthur Davis was a manufacturer, but his leisure he devoted to the cultivation of Hebrew, and he became one of our foremost Hebraists, albeit self-taught. To him the community owes a beautiful and scholarly edition of the Festival Prayers, in which he was assisted among others by his gifted daughters, both poetesses of skill and charm. In order to honor his memory, his children and his friends decided to found an annual "Arthur Davis" lectureship, the purpose of which should be the advancement of any branch of Jewish or Hebraic learning. The foundation was made over to the Jewish Historical Society of England, and this year, during the Passover week, Mr. Zangwill, who was a friend of Arthur Davis, delivered the first lecture, Mr. Herbert Samuel being in the chair. His subject was the contrast between the Jewish and the Teutonic ideal of the chosen people, and those who were privileged to hear the lecture were agreed that it was a clever handling of an attractive theme. American Jewry will be in a position to read the lecture even before it is read here, for it is to be published before long in the Menorah Journal. We, however, had the advantage of listening to it, and it was a very representative gathering that showered applause on the lecturer's head.

Zangwill's production was not merely instructive, it also made one wish that more constructive work of this character were to be found in our midst. Two or three decades ago there were attempts made to produce original work in the field of Jewish literature. The Society of Hebrew Literature published some very useful volumes; the Jewish Chronicle encouraged literary and historical research; those were the days of Joseph Jacobs, Asher Myers, Myer Davis and others. That period was succeeded by the age of the Literary Society, when society was the main attraction and literature was merely incidental. Yet even then spasmodic efforts were made to produce collected opinions on a single theme. Books were published on aspects of the Hebrew genius, and pamphlets were issued giving the substance of single lectures. More solid work throve no longer. Today we are only distributors of literature, and, indeed, we actually have a Society for the Distribution of Jewish Literature. Distribution is both necessary and beneficial, but we lack creative work. In the States there is the Jewish Publication Society; and the English translation of the Bible by American Jewish scholars is much appreciated here. In England we seem to be sterile. The war is not to blame, though, of course, the war has meant putting things of the spirit on one side for the present. Even before the war we were tending intellectually in the direction of the desert. We have not the men. Jews' College might have become the center of a Jewish renaissance in England. But the institution in Queen's Square has never been able to emerge from the cloud of unpopularity that rested upon it. Give a dog a bad name—! That feeling weighed upon the staff and the students alike. At best Jews' College is only a tiny oasis in the desert. It may be that our intellectual energy was expended in other things. Most of our younger men were devoted to Zionism, and spent their leisure in working for Zion, work which promises to be crowned with success. Already classes have been favored in London for cultivating living Hebrew and Arabic, in preparation of the great return to the Holy Land.

The Zionist Commission reached Cairo safely and was given a right royal welcome both by the authorities, including General Allenby and Sir Reginald Wingate, England's High Commissioner in Egypt, and by the Jewish community. By the time these lines are in print the Commission will have reached Palestine, where much work awaits them. Above all, relief is urgently necessary, especially for resettling the war refugees. An appeal for the purpose, signed by that veteran worker in the cause of Jewish charity, Hermann Landau, has just been issued, and there is little doubt that it will meet with the response worthy of the cause.

Meanwhile the Zionist Commissioners were not the only visitors in Egypt from this country. The Judaeans—as the Jewish Regiment continues to be called—have also arrived, and a second batch of Jewish soldiers will follow soon. These may even include the first American contingent, who have been received here with warmth. It may interest our readers in America to know that when the troopship bringing them to English arrived at its destination, the officer in command called for three cheers for the Jews, who, he said, had been the life and soul of the party during the voyage. The Chief Rabbi arranged for a reception for them at his house, and last week a number of ladies undertook to show them the sights of London. It was curious to observe how the visitors were impressed by the antiquity of many a building and many an out-of-the-way corner. Perhaps that was because they themselves belong to an ancient race and were bent on going to fight for the land of their fathers. On this point the following extract from the report of the proceedings in the House of Commons on Tuesday, March 19, 1918, may be worth mentioning:

"Mr. Caradoc Rees asked the Under Secretary for War whether he could give an assurance that all Jews recruited for Jewish units would, as far as was reasonably possible, be utilized in the Palestine area.

"Mr. Macpherson: I am pleased to be able to give this assurance. All recruits enlisted for Jewish battalions will be drafted to Jewish units in Palestine if medically fit. As long as the exigencies of the service permit, Jewish battalions are definitely intended for employment in Palestine".

Colonel Paterson, who is with the contingent at present in Palestine, is to have two Jews at least as colleagues. Major E. Margolin (Distinguished Service Order) has taken over the command of the —th Battalion, and Colonel F. D. Samuel (Distinguished Service Order) of the —th. It is understood that Major Margolin will take out to Egypt the next batch, which will very likely include some of the American members of the regiment. Major Margolin is exceedingly popular among the men. Born in Russia, he emigrated to Palestine and then settled in Australia, where he joined the army at the outbreak of war. He has seen fighting both in Gallipoli and France, and his wide sympathies mark him out as an ideal commander.

Looking at these American Jews who had enlisted for service with Jewish units in the British Army in order to go to Palestine, one could not help thinking that the Jews of England and America ought to come into closer touch with each other. True, America is comparatively far off, but in these days of quick communication what does the distance really amount to? It must be confessed that the Jews of England will possibly be the gainers in the long run by this intercourse. Were it to be brought about, the enterprise and go-aheadedness of American Jewry might catch on here. Possibly, too, the American Jewish community might not think it altogether useless to cultivate the suggested intercourse. We are a small, compact community, but we have our points. Well do we remember the visit to London of the officers of the Order, and the stimulus they left behind. We ought to have common conferences on problems of charity, of religious education, of synagogual worship, of communal reform. Now that the bond between the two countries has been cemented in their alliance in the struggle against German unlimited monarchy, this plan ought to be easy to carry out. If it were, it would enable the two lodges of the Order in England to do a fine piece of work in acting as the bond between the two communities. The prospect is worth thinking about.

A year ago when the fortunes of war seemed to be turning against Germany a more chastened spirit filled the Germans. They were more subdued than usual; they passed that famous Reichstag resolution of July 19, protesting that they desired no annexations and no indemnities. The prodigal son wanted to return home. But the events of the last three months have puffed up the German people, have made them drunk with success, and once again their evil pride has swollen to bursting point. They forget that the fortunes of war sway backwards and forwards, and caution is the best policy of the wise man as of the wise nation. One of the worst sides of the German character is again emphasized by the recurrence of anti-Semitic activity. This rich product of German Pan Germanism has become so noticeable once more that the Society for Combatting Anti-Semitism, by no means a Jewish organization, finds it necessary to come forward with an appeal in the cause of elementary justice. The declaration confesses pitifully that many people had hoped that the trial of the nation in the fire of war suffering would burn out all civil discords and passions, and so make the existence of the society superfluous. That hope has been disappointed; "a new anti-Semitic campaign has commenced"—even before the war is over—and threatens to extend its operations after the war. It is a sad commentary on political conditions in Germany where Christian love and social idealism are conspicuous by their absence. At any rate, let us be thankful for the Society of Combatting Anti-Semitism. Yet while its work merits credit, its very existence is a testimony to the backsliding of Germany, which shows itself at almost every turn. Hermann Cohen has just died at the age of 76. He was recognized as the foremost Kantian scholar in Germany. Yet when the Prussian Academy was about to issue an authoritative edition of the works of Kant, Cohen was not selected as a member of the committee. Why? Only because he was a Jew.

Hermann Cohen had a brilliant career, and it was given to few men who attended the Rabbinical College at Breslau to end up as a full-fledged university professor. His father was the teacher of the small Jewish community at Coswig in Anhalt, and Hermann was intended for the ministry. But philosophy attracted him, and he became the founder of the famous Marburg school, which is characterized by Idealism. Hermann Cohen, the Jew, comes to the fore in this respect, as he came to the fore in his constant interest in Judaism and Jewish learning. When he retired from his chair at the University of Marburg in 1912 and settled in Berlin, he took a deep interest in the Lehranstalt für die Wissenschaft des Judentures, the governing body of which he joined. But the teacher had to teach, and Prof. Cohen delivered regular courses of lectures on aspects of Jewish philosophy to large audiences not only of students, but also of the general public. Geiger once called him "The soul and conscience of Judaism". Certainly his wonderful idealism won universal admiration, and he left his mark on the study of philosophy in Germany. Had he not been a Jew he would doubtless have been loaded with honors; being a Jew, he received only the recognition meted out to multitudes of average men. But that is the way of the German government.

MAN POWER.

Otto G. Finkelstein, Chicago, Ill.

Commencing about the middle of the year 1913, continuing through 1914 and the major part of 1915, the tread of countless thousands seeking work was heard throughout our land. With jobs at a premium and the situation so manifest, few there were who questioned the sincerity of any one seeking employment. During such abnormal times, social agencies were taxed to their utmost and countless panaceas were offered.

Many of us railed at the existing employment exchanges, while others opened or advocated the opening of additional employment offices. One can readily see that such changes do not create work—they merely act as clearing houses or connecting links between the job and the man.

Times have indeed changed, and the cry of "Labor Shortage" is now heard on all sides. This latter term is as misleading as it was unfounded during the whole of last year (1917). At the last annual meeting of the American Association of Public Employment Offices, held in Milwaukee in September, 1917, representatives from all sections of our country and Canada unanimously agreed that there was no so-called labor shortage at that time. While it is true that certain industries can not find sufficient help, it is equally true that there is a surplus of applications for other lines.

It is also well to bear in mind that in a country with a population of over one hundred million, there are many annuitants and idlers who work but occasionally. Not until we have another large draft for the army will these non-employed be drawn into industrial service.

Since we entered the war, [illegible] and construction lines have been [illegible] crippled, so that thousands of [illegible] artisans and helpers in these [illegible] out of work.

Mechanics are not born, and a scarcity of labor in any particular field does not warrant the assumption of a scarcity in all channels, nor can we be expected to transplant their families or uproot their entire surroundings in order to take positions thousands of miles away from their homes, especially when housing accommodations are not available in those localities where the shortage is now felt.

Our Eastern seaboard has been humming with war industries, but up to recently this has not been true of the great Central and Middle West states with a large working population.

Unemployment and Modern Industry.

Assuming that there is a universal shortage of labor at the present time, the fact remains that unemployment is a problem of normal times. Unemployment is a co efficient of modern industry.

The writer has before him a Turnover Chart which is in vogue in the employment departments in some of our largest industries, and under the heading "Exits" from the service, or discharge, there are 26 printed classifications, with blank columns for additional causes.

It has been stated that in one large plant of several thousand workers, there has been a complete change in one month. With our methods, or lack of methods, in hiring and firing, coupled with the industrial unrest due to the increased wages in war industries and the rising costs of necessities, it is not strange that this shifting process has assumed such large proportion, nor can the workers be blamed for this condition. We are safe in asserting that in many cases employers resort to "stealing" labor by offering higher wages or other inducements. It is entirely unfair to expect the workers to shift for themselves in an aimless search for employment; they are entitled to a most perfect system of information.

The Employment Exchange.

Employment exchanges, when fully developed and properly functioned, should be able to collate and classify all opportunities for employment.

We meet social workers who ask if there is any unemployment at the present time, and note their surprise when informed that there really is unemployment at this time and at all times. Their vision is often on a par with those employers who assert that a "good" man can always find work. Social workers, like all of us mortals, are apt to be engrossed in their own problems and fail to see the economic background which produces those same problems.

Unemployment should not be confounded with charity or dependency. It can and does exist without this unhappy result, except when long continued.

A great many of our social ills result after families have suffered either malemployment, under-employment, or unemployment. It is well to have a proper perspective and to reason from effect to cause.

Methods of Readjustment.

Our Federal Government is awakening to the needs of the situation. The first draft resulted in considerable maladjustment. By means of the questionnaire a vocational selection is being made.

Recently the Employment Service was taken out of the Immigration Department and established as a separate entity, to be known as the U. S. Employment Service. It intends to form an equal partnership with all State and Municipal Employment Offices that are now or will be created, and to bear equally the costs of operation. Offices are being opened in many cities throughout the country which heretofore had no employment facilities, and in conjunction with the National and State Councils of Defense and other bodies it is expected to facilitate the placing of men for essential industries, ship building, farm help, etc. Several bills are pending in Congress, one of which asks for an appropriation to advance railroad fares when necessary.

On Feb. 13, a representative of the U. S. Department of Labor, organized in Chicago a Federated Council of Employment Organizations for the State of Illinois. All non-commercial employment offices which may be recognized by the Government will be expected to clear through this Federated Council. Committees have been appointed, and rapid steps are being taken to perfect this organization.

In the latter part of January of this year the Employment Service commenced the issue of a weekly bulletin which chronicles all matters pertaining to this service.

May we voice a hope that as a result of the conditions forced upon us by this war, brighter days, greater achievements and important advances in social welfare will be the outcome.

THE DOWER OF THE LAW.

Shabuoth, the festival of the giving of the law, occurs this month. To many of our children it is the festival of confirmation. We have no quarrel with those who borrowed the rite from elsewhere. Modern conditions had to be met. The problem as it presented itself concerned in particular the girls for whose consecration to Judaism the past had made no adequate provision. It is true, our children are born into Judaism. Nevertheless it was thought proper formally to initiate the boy. He became conscious of his heritage. He assumed the responsibility of membership in the household of Israel. He was made to feel that the Jew had received the dower of the law. Judaism may have its doctrines, its creed. But rehearsing the creed does not yet constitute the Jew. What characterizes Judaism is mainly obedience to the law. Christianity emphasizes the life and example of the founder. Believe in him, and you will do the right for his sake. Yes, Judaism realizes likewise that faith and conviction must underlie our actions. The righteous deed loses all significance unless it is accompanied by the right spirit. But the danger in the other view has been an all too easy sentimentalism which often exhausted itself in mere feeling. Judaism, on the other hand, undertakes the training of the will. We must learn to subject our will to the will of God. We recognize the weakness of the human will, the frailty of the flesh. We speak of the law as a yoke. Yet we bless God for having given us the law. The yoke can be irksome only to him who in overweening arrogance would be master of himself. Law dominates the universe. You would not extricate yourself if you could. A lawless universe would be a sad place to dwell in. We live in society, and society is governed by inexorable law. Place yourself en rapport with law, make yourself an instrument of law, and you will enjoy that measure of freedom which is consonant with the freedom of everybody else about you. The constitution of our country is a system of checks and counterchecks. So is the constitution of the world. By checking ourselves we realize liberty. For liberty is neither licentiousness nor anarchy; it is law. We may for a moment welcome the lack of restraint. But it plays havoc in the end. And so the Jewish system surrounds the Jewish child with a chain of restraints. Ceremonies serve a useful purpose; they are symbols of a life hedged in. The moral import may not always be perspicuous; but it is there nevertheless. Some tend to become obsolete; others take their place. They help in creating the psychological atmosphere; they are the outlying forts protecting the inner citadel. The truths of Judaism open themselves up through Jewish life. An abstract Judaism is condemned to impotence. It may be repeated after the manner of the parrot. The Jewish life is the all-important thing. It does not shut itself off in a world of its own. The place for the exercise of the will is the world right about us. There is no other world. All the problems with which we meet in our avocations, in our business life, in our civic duties, constitute the dominion of Judaism. God commanded the law, but the law obtains between man and man. Such was the message of our prophets. The prophets were preachers, exhorters. We have had them in the sequel, to guard against the deadening of mechanical piety, to spur on the will when it was dormant, to comfort in the hour of trial. But the prophetic exhortation would have been powerless without the co-operation of the masters who undertook to train a whole people in subservience to law. We stand today as their disciples. We transmit their energy to our children. The Jewish family life is the creation of the law. Wedlock is a consecrated union, hedged in by restraint, made holy by the chastity of body and mind. And the covenant between Israel and God which our festival commemorates was pictured in the terms of weeded affection with the law as our dower. God enters into the family life of the Jew in the form of an immutable law by which the universe is regulated and which dominates human conduct and the life of human society. Happy is our lot in the possession of God's law!

OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

With the war coming nearer and nearer home to every family in the land, there is a natural resentment on the part of the citizen of actions and utterances smacking of lukewarmness, if not downright hostility to the American cause. Unquestionably in a great number of cases the diffident citizen—of alien enemies the government makes short shrfit—is ill-advised when pursuing particularistic policies at a time when the nation must present a united front. If he cannot enter wholeheartedly into the cause of America let him, to say the very least, keep in the background and keep silence. There is no excuse for any other mode of behavior. At the same time it cannot be gainsaid that undue hysteria has taken hold on the minds of the citizens, with which is coupled the mob spirit of taking the law out of the hands of responsible agents of the government. Treason and disloyalty are scented where none exists. A cry is now being raised against the curriculum of our public schools. Be it said that we unhesitatingly indorse the view that the public schools should be nurseries of the loftiest patriotism. We are no friends of the parochial system. Our children should meet on common ground. We discountenance any attempt at division. The Catholics at least withdraw their children. The Protestants have been clamoring for imposing a measure of Protestant Christianity on the schools supported by the taxes of the entire body of citizens. But we have come to realize other insidious dangers. If they are there, it has been our own fault, the fault of our political system. For the sake of votes the politician has catered to the wishes of certain minorities. We believe that foreign languages should be taught in the public schools. But then they must be taught for the cultural element in them or because they may prove useful. Any other motive should never have been permitted to enter into consideration. It will be eminently useful to the American soldier to know the language of the soil in which he is fighting, and also the language of the enemy he is contending against. But there should be no room in the public schools for any foreign language simply to please certain constituencies.

The mistake in the past has been in the motive, not in the matter. The time may come when Hebrew will be taught in the high schools along with Greek and Latin. Languages are the door to literature. Literatures are the key to culture. Our modern culture is rooted in the past civilization of Rome and Greece and Judea. But modern culture is also a product of many living civilizations. Cultivate by all means and above all the study of the English language and Anglo-Saxon institutions and American history. Those are the things that unite us. And when a foreign subject is introduced it ought to be handled in such a manner as to bring out the things in which we differ from the foreigner. Comparison and contrast bring out the native peculiarity. We study the history of mankind, past and present. But the touchstone must be made to reside in our own history. Our children must be made to see and appreciate the institutions and the standard of life and the mental horizon of this country. Let us therefore do away with the spirit of particularism. But let us not sacrifice useful subjects of instruction. By narrowing down the curriculum we shall shut out from the education of our children the very things which should broaden them. We want a broadening education. Only through breadth of view can a free people remain free. Text-books may be faulty; they can be improvel. Bad school-books should never have been tolerated. But above all it is the teacher that counts. If he or she is imbued with the true spirit of Americanism, nothing else matters.

THE JEWISH MILITARY IN RUSSIA SUPPORT THE JEWISH PARAGRAPHS OF THE STOCKHOLM PEACE MANIFESTO.

The Jewish press bureau in Stockholm communicates:

The newly formed union of the Jewish military held at Odessa a conference at which the work and the forms of organization of this national confederation embracing all the Jewish military organizations were discussed.

Mr. Revutzky, whose candidature to the elections to the Constituent Assembly was supported by the Poale-Zion moved an address to the International Socialist Bureau in Stockholm with congratulations on the insertion of the Peace Manifesto of this Bureau of the Jewish demands. After a discussion, the following resolution, as formulated by Revutzky was carried:

"The General Assembly of the Odessa Branch of the Jewish Military Union of Russia hails with animation the principles proclaimed by the Socialist International on the Jewish question, and requests the International to further support the programme which forms the hopes and aspirations of the Jewish proletariat and of the entire Jewish people, namely, an internationally guaranteed personal-national Autonomy for the Jews in Russia, Poland, Austria and Rumania, and protection for the Jewish immigration and colonization in Palestine".

Similar resolutions were carried by crowded meetings of Jews in Odessa, Shitomir, Jekaterinoslaw and other towns.

JEWISH GENERALS IN FRENCH ARMY.

There are at least three Jewish generals in the French army, two of whom are by birth Alsatians. These are General Gideon Geismar, a native of Dambach, and General Camille Levy, commanding the 31st Division, who is a native of Ingweiler. Colonel Gideon Geismar was brought up in orthodox Jewish surroundings and faithfully observes Jewish traditions. As a diversion from his absorbing labors as chief of staff of an army corps before the war, Brigadier-General Geismar devoted much of his leisure to making translations from Hebrew classic works. The rank of Brigadier-General in the French army has recently been bestowed upon Colonel Libman.

BULGARIAN GOVERNMENT AND RUMANIAN JEWS.

The Bulgarian Minister at Berlin, in the course of an interview with a representative of the Judische Rundschau, stated that his government intends, at the Peace Congress, to press for the grant of full rights to the Jews in Rumania. He also promised that steps would be taken to protest against the cruelties to Bessarabian Jews, and added that his government sincerely sympathized with Zionist endeavors.

ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE.

The attention of the Administrative Committee of the Anti-Defamation League was called to a song entitled, "What's the Use to Worry When You're Broke". The picture on the front cover showed a Jewish character sprinkling the floor of his store with gasoline. The words of the song implied that this was a common custom of the Jewish people. A committee of the Anti-Defamation League called upon the publishers and as a result of this visit, the words of the song were changed, the picture on the front cover was changed, and the Administrative Committee now has on file an entirely new song breathing not the slightest bit of prejudice against the Jewish people.

A letter was received from Doubleday Page & Co., publishers of Grimm's Fairy Tales, advising us that they would take up with the English publishers of the work, the matter of eliminating the fable entitled "The Jew Among the Thorns." No further copies of the book are now available for sale through the publishing houses.

The Chicago Abendpost saw fit to publish an offensive Yiddish joke. The attention of the editors was called to the matter and they replied to the committee, expressing their regret that the joke was permitted to appear in the columns of the paper. They advised us that they would be very careful with all such matters in the future.

In a column of the Chicago Tribune, devoted to letters from readers, appeared a letter entitled, "A Tightwad." The letter carried the implication that the Jewish people made a habit of being tightwads in Liberty Loan Campaigns. The editors of the Tribune were written to and they replied stating that they regretted that mention was made of the nationality of the man and assured us that they would be very careful not to allow such occurrences to take place in the future.

An ad appeared in the Philadelphia Inquirer reading as follows:

> Lost—If the little short man of Jewish denomination, who picked the pocket of the undersigned of $103 on Navy Yard car, at Thirteenth and Walnut streets, 2:15 p.m., last Saturday, communicates with the undersigned, he positively can have $6.50 which was in another pocket and will not prosecute.—E. T. Peterson, 810 N. Broad street.

The matter was taken up by the Philadelphia representatives of the League, Brothers Meyerhoff and Rabbi Krauskopf, who received the following reply from the editors of the paper.

"Referring to your letter of the 8th, inst., in reference to the advertisement that appeared in the Lost and Found column of the Inquirer, we find that this was accepted by a new operator.

"It is strictly against the rules of this office to accept advertisements of this kind, and while we take every precaution to avoid any such errors, they occasionally will occur. We regret it very much indeed.

"Following your suggestion, the enclosed editorial was inserted in today's Inquirer. We trust it meets with your approbation.

"Sincerely yours,
"E. I. BACON".

The editorial referred to is given below:

Why Specify a Denomination?

An advertisement in the Lost and Found column of the Inquirer produces an indignant protest from an esteemed citizen. The advertiser had been relieved of a pocketbook and he asks "the little short man of Jewish denomination", whom he accuses of the theft to communicate with him and avoid prosecution. "By what manner of reason", our correspondent asks, "did the advertiser obtain the information that the one who picked his pocket is of the Jewish denomination? When and where did he catechise him as to his religion? And even if the pickpocket professes himself of the Jewish faith, is the Jewish denomination responsible for his guilt"?

The protest is well put. We add to it a question of our own: By what right is a man's religious faith dragged into any shady transaction? Would the advertiser in this instance have written, "the little short man of Presbyterian denomination," or Baptist, or Methodist, or Catholic denomination? Then why the Jewish denomination? For a denomination is the religious organization to which a man attaches himself, and most assuredly a religious denomination cannot be held to account for the doings of an individual.

Doubtless the advertiser did not have in mind a slur at the Jewish faith. Nevertheless the sting is there, and it is very properly resented.

LEADING JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS OF GERMANY UNITE.

All shades of Jewish opinion, from extreme assimilation to ultra-nationalism are represented in the newly perfected "League of Organizations of Germany for the Defense of the Rights of the Jews of the East", with a program covering practically every phase of life, religious, national, civic and cultural. The organizations which have thus far entered the new league, which is known as "V. J. O. D.", are:

The Central League of German Citizens of the Jewish Faith.

The Jewish League for the Defense of the interests of the Eastern Jews.

The German-Israelite Communal Union.

The Grand Lodge of Germany.

The Frankfort-on-the-Main Relief Committee for the Suffering Jews of Eastern Europe.

The Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden.

The Committee for the East.

The Union of German Jews.

The League of German Liberal Jewry.

The Zionist Federation of Germany.

The president of the V. J. O. D. is James Simon; Oscar Cassel and Dr. Frank Oppenheimer, vice-presidents; P. Mankivitz, treasurer; Dr. S. Kahn and R. Lichtheim, honorary secretaries; Dr. Hantke and Dr. Paul Nathan, honorary directors.

The chief function of the League, as announced in its official statement, is to place before the proper authorities, now, during the war and also before the peace conference the viewpoint of German Jewry concerning all Jewish problems in the East, and in the Orient. It has assumed the task of perfecting similar organizations and for the same purposes in Austro-Hungary, Turkey and Bulgaria, and to secure the co-operation of these and already existing organizations for concerted action.

The specific principles for treatment of the Jewish Problem in the East and the Orient as formulated by the new league are:

1. Legal and actual equality with all rights and duties of a citizen.
2. Religious liberty.
3. The right to an independent Jewish culture.
4. The right of free Jewish immigration and economic activities in all parts of the Ottoman Empire.
5. The right to Jewish immigration and cultural autonomy in Palestine.

In a long commentary on this document the Juedische Rundschau, the organ of the German Zionist Federation, throws light on the meaning of this new union of Jewish forces in Germany. In the first place, the initiative came from the Anti-Zionist Jewish organizations, whose association with the German Government is not obscure. In the second place, the original idea of the promoters was to exclude Zionists from it, but (here again it is not reckless to detect official influence), this plan had to be dropped, and in point of fact the German Zionists played an important part in drafting the program of the new organization and share very important offices in it, including the vice-presidency, the chairmanship and the secretariat. The last three objects on the program indicate the character of the new organization. The first of the three, the claim to the right to national culture, is undoubtedly intended primarily for application in the client states which the German state is establishing on its Eastern frontier. The second and third of these three are directed to Turkey in general and to Palestine in particular.

CAPTAIN JULIUS I. PEYSER GIVEN IMPORTANT POST.

Captain Julius I. Peyser of Washington, Past President of District Grand Lodge No. 5 has practically been placed in charge of the work of housing all of the United States war workers. At the present moment, this problem is of the greatest importance to this country, and Congress has appropriated sixty million dollars for the housing of these workers. Captain Peyser's work has been highly commented by the Congressional Committee.

A JEWISH NATIONAL COUNCIL IN RUSSIA.

In view of the present trend of events in Russia, the general Russo-Jewish Congress is to be delayed for an indefinite time. All parties have agreed to establish a Provisional National Council on which all these parties will be represented according to the number of the mandates they received at the elections to the Jewish Congress. This council will represent the Russia Jewry temporarily until the Congress will be gathered.

GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY TO BE OBSERVED BY ORPHAN ASYLUM.

Cleveland Jewish Institution Will Celebrate Fiftieth Anniversary of Its Establishment.

FOUNDED BY B'NAI B'RITH JULY 14, 1868

Arrangements are under way for the celebration of the Golden Anniversary of the founding of the Cleveland Jewish Orphan Asylum.

The fiftieth anniversary celebration will take place in this city Sunday, July 14. There will be a gathering in one of the large down-town theaters on that day and a program is now being arranged by the local board. The annual meeting of the board of trustees and directors will take place on the day following the anniversary celebration.

First steps looking toward the erection of the Jewish Orphan Asylum were taken by District No. 2, I. O. B. B., when the Civil War was in progress. The first board of trustees was chosen in 1867 and in 1868 it was decided to purchase the tract known as the Cleveland Water Cure property. The committee named by Trustee Chairman Jacob Aub consisted of Messrs. Abraham Wiener, S. Newmark, Kaufman Hays, Jacob Rohrheimer and Jacob Goldsmith. The purchase price was $25,000. The tract then acquired had a frontage of 165 feet on Woodland Avenue and a depth of 680 feet. There was a large brick building on the site. The trustees took possession March 3, 1868, and soon afterwards additional property with a frontage of 165 feet on Woodland Avenue was acquired for $6,000. The annual meeting of the Grand Lodge, I. O. B. B., was held in this city in July, 1868, and the brick building, acquired with the land, remodeled for orphan asylum purposes, was dedicated July 14, 1868. The dedication ceremonies included addresses by Dr. Isaac M. Wise of Cincinnati, Mayor Stephen Buhrer of Cleveland, President Bamburger of the Grand Lodge, Miss Theresa Aub of Cincinnati, Benjamin F. Peixotto, Isidor Bush and Simon Wolf. Members of the B'nai B'rith marched to the asylum grounds.

In 1879 Dr. and Mrs. Samuel Wolfenstein became superintendent and matron. The present structure was completed in 1888. Following the resignation of Dr. Wolfenstein, Rabbi Simon Peiser was elected superintendent and Mrs. Peiser matron.

The institution has acquired the tract known as Cherry Farm as a site for a new home. It will be built on the cottage plan. A number of the children may spend their vacation at the farm this summer.

The report of Superintendent Peiser read at the recent quarterly meeting showed that the present population is 485 children, 300 boys and 185 girls. The superintendent reported further that there are sixty-five graduates of the Home in the Army and Navy and five in the Red Cross service. The Alumni has presented a service flag to the institution. The boys and girls have contributed to the Red Cross War Fund and have purchased Liberty Bonds of both the second and third issues.

Announcement is made in the Jewish Orphan Asylum Quarterly Magazine just issued that a book of Dr. Wolfenstein's addresses and sermons is to be issued as a Fiftieth Anniversary token.

A collection of over 2,000 photographs, taking in the complete history of the Home, will be exhibited during the coming celebration.

THE HILSNER CASE.

Prisoner Released.

Leopold Hilsner has at length been released as a participant in the amnesty granted by the Emperor of Austria on the occasion of the birth of an Archduke. Hilsner, it will be remembered, was sentenced to death for participation in an alleged murder said to have been perpetrated for ritual purposes. The sentence was eventually commuted to imprisonment for life. All the efforts made since then by Jews and Gentiles to procure his release on the ground that he was innocent of the crime imputed to him proved unavailing.

THE JEWISH AUTONOMY IN THE UKRAINE.

The Jewish press bureau in Stockholm has received the following telegram from Petrograd: In connection with the proclamation in the Ukraine of National Autonomy on a personal basis for all nationalities, the Ukrainian Rada has also published a law concerning the constitution of the Jewish Communities on a democratic basis. The elections to the community-councils will begin on February 17.

RECEPTION TO PRESIDENT M. P. DAVIDSON.

The informal dinner and reception tendered to President Maurice P. Davidson and Mrs. Davidson, of which announcement was made in the April bulletin, took place on Monday evening, April 22, at Bergfeld's Restaurant, opposite I. O. B. B. headquarters. In departing from the customary form of reception, the Advancement Committee undertook an experiment that could be justified only by success and that justification was amply provided. The affair was exceedingly well attended and those present represented all of the manifold activities of the district. The excellent dinner was so arranged by the dinner committee that while exceptional in quality and service, it was nevertheless entirely in accord with the precepts of the Food Administration, not a single viand being offered of any kind needed for troops or civilians abroad.

At the conclusion of the dinner a number of brief but brilliant addresses were made dealing with the work of the district and with the part taken in it by President Davidson. The utmost jollity pervaded the entire evening and all present seemed to find in the cordial and infectious good humor a marked respite from the stress and strain of the times. At the close of the evening many of the party visited headquarters and the younger folks ended a happy evening with a dance.

Bro. Clarence G. Bachrach, chairman of the District Advancement Committee, officiated as toastmaster and found the post a sinecure by reason of the pith and wit of the several speakers, for whose pearls of eloquence his own good-natured remarks needed but to form the string. The speakers were Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan, secretary of the district; Charles Hartman, executive member of the district; Joseph Rosenzweig, Past-President of the district; Philip Davidson, father of President Davidson; Joseph Levinson; Aaron W. Levy; Louis Quitman; Henry Duschnes; Alfred Weil and President Maurice P. Davidson. President Davidson spoke enthusiastically of the splendid work being done by District No. 1 in support of the Third Liberty Loan, both as to the creditable results accomplished and as to the spirit and energy displayed in the work. He reported that the district had already obtained subscriptions exceeding $500,000, in addition to the large subscriptions made by or through our members, but filed through other channels. He thanked those present for the good work they had done in the Liberty Loan campaign and complimented the ladies of the Auxiliary of the Home upon their self-sacrificing work for the Red Cross. Prolonged applause and cheers followed his fervent closing appeal for continued support in the war work of his administration.

The committee which arranged and had charge of this most successful occasion consisted of Lester Brucks, chairman; Wm. Asher, Dr. J. L. Blumenthal, Henry Harkavy and John J. Jalien.

Those in attendance included the following: Wm. Asher, Miss Amy Asher, Edwin Brucks and Miss Edna Brucks, Lester Brucks and Miss Harriet Brucks, Dr. J. L. Blumenthal, Miss Blumenthal and Mrs. Blumenthal, Nelson A. Bardow, Maurice Beck and Miss Beck, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence G. Bachrach, Dr. Harry Bloom, Isadore Bieber, I. Victor Burger, Maurice P. Davidson, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Duschnes and son, Gabriel Davidson, Julius Davidson and Miss Parsonet, Philip Davidson, Alfred Davidson, Mr. and Mrs. Isidor Enselman, Mr. and Mrs. Fred I Ettlinger, Horace Eckhouse, Herman Eldot and Miss Tobias, Lester B. Friedman, Mr. and Mrs. Jacob S. Glaser, Dr. Samuel Greenfield, Henry Gutenstein, Dr. Harry G. Goldman, Charles Hartman, Henry Harkavy, John J. Jalien, Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan and son, Wm. Klapp, Moses H. Kahn, Sydney S. Landau, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene H. Levy, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Mark G. Levy, Mr. and Mrs. Aaron W. Levy, Louis Lorence, Joseph Levinson, Leopold Phillipp, Daniel Nachbar, Louis Quitman, Joseph Rosenzweig, Ely Rosenberg, Morris Rosenbaum, Max Rockmore, Ferdinand Reinheimer, Charles Schnitzer and Miss Schnitzer, Mr. and Mrs. George M. Sachs, Jacob Shapiro, Benjamin Schieber, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Stark, Milton Steiner, Myer L. Victorius, Alfred Weil and Miss Weil.

JEWISH HUNGARIAN MINISTER AND ZIONISM.

The new member of the Hungarian Cabinet, Dr. Vazsonyi, has upon the first occasion of addressing a Jewish gathering in his new capacity expressed his opposition to Zionism. He said: "The Hungarian Jews do not carry on separate national politics because they see their future in the truly national and democratic politics of Hungary".

FOOD CONSERVATION.

Washington, D. C., May 14, 1918.

Adolf Kraus, President Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, 1228 Tribune Building, Chicago.

In view of serious wheat situation and our obligations to the Allies until next harvest, I would appreciate a special appeal to the members and families of all fraternal organizations to voluntarily give up wheat and wheat products until next harvest, so far as circumstances of individuals permit following example of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, first-class hotels, many clubs, and other organizations. We also suggest at the same time that your members be asked to avoid waste in meat, reducing consumption as nearly as possible of all meats and poultry to two pounds per week per person over four years of age, also exercise economy in use of sugar. Please wire collect: First, do you approve this appeal to your membership? Second, are you prepared to circulate appeal to all your lodges? Third, do you believe that it will be effective with your membership? We plan to make similar appeal through all religious organizations to be presented from pulpit May 26th. Upon advice from you we will forward further instructions.

HERBERT HOOVER.

Chicago, May 15, 1918.

Hon. Herbert Hoover,
Washington, D. C.

To your first and second questions my answer is yes. Will publish your appeal in our official newspaper. My answer to third question is the average of our membership will intellectually and loyally compare favorably with any other fraternity, therefore believe appeal will be fairly effective.

ADOLF KRAUS,
President B'nai B'rith.

JEWS NAMED RUSSIAN ENVOYS

Adolph Joffe, who was chairman of the Russian peace delegation at Brest-Litovsk, has been appointed Ambassador to Berlin. Leon Kameneff, who was a member of the peace delegation, has been named as Ambassador to Vienna. Both of these are prominent leaders in the Bolsheviki party.

TRANSITION MEASURES TO PEACE CONDITIONS.

The Jewish press bureau in Stockholm reports that the Society for Jewish Artisanship Development, in co-operation with the Jewish Soldiers' Organization have decided to take measures of economic assistance to the demobilized Jewish soldiers and returning prisoners. These organizations contemplate the establishment of Labor Exchanges, professional schools and courses. One of the outstanding features of the new programme of work under consideration is the development of horticulture and higher forms of agriculture and the establishment of dairies. In the neighborhood of Petrograd considerable allotments were given to Jews who start there now the horticultural work. The school of the Sisters of the Red Mogen Dovid in Odessa has been converted into a primary medical school.

ANNUAL CONVENTION OF DISTRICT GRAND LODGE, NO. 7

The 45th Annual Convention of District Grand Lodge No. 7 convened in the banquet hall of the Rice Hotel at Houston, Texas, on Sunday morning, April 21, 1918, with 135 delegates in attendance.

The gathering was called to order by Chairman S. J. Westheimer of Houston, Texas, who called upon Rabbi Henry Barnstein to offer prayer. The invocation was followed by the singing of the "Star Spangled Banner", after which Judge Chester Bryan welcomed the delegates in behalf of the city of Houston. Brothers J. L. Aronson and M. C. Wagner welcomed all in behalf of the Houston B'nai B'rith Lodges and the Jewish community.

Past President Brother Nathan Cohn of Nashville, Tenn., responded for the District Grand Lodge. The convention was then turned over to the President of the District Grand Lodge, Brother Ralph J. Schwarz of New Orleans, who read his annual message which was received with much enthusiasm and hearty applause. The President's message was followed by reading of various reports such as the District Endowment Fund, Secretary's report and reports of chairmen of various standing committees.

At the conclusion of the morning session Brother Leon Wolmer in a few well chosen words presented in the name of the New Orleans lodges, Brother President Schwarz, with a handsome silver service as a mark of esteem of the lodges.

Upon the adjournment of the morning session the delegates were entertained in the homes of the members of the local lodges.

In the afternoon the convention reassembled and the President announced the personnel of the various convention committees appointed by him.

Sunday evening is always given over to the committee on Cultural Advancement, and on this night the exercises were held at the Concordia Club with Brother Joseph Hirsh presiding. The program was of a high quality, the oration was delivered by Brother Rabbi William Fineshriber of Memphis, Tenn. Brother Rabbi E. W. Leipziger of New Orleans, who was to deliver the oration was unable to attend. The essay was read by Brother A. B. Freyer of Shreveport, on the subject of "Jewries part in post-war problems".

Monday Session.

On Monday there were two business sessions during the day and a war relief meeting in the evening. At the morning session, which was opened at the Rice Hotel by President Schwarz at 9:30 o'clock, the convention took up several reports and communications. A number of contributions to the Jewish Orphans' Home were reported, and Brother Jacob Singer read a resolution, which was adopted calling upon members to contribute more freely to the Widows and Orphans Home at New Orleans.

The session on Monday produced active debate on a number of questions of vital importance to the District, among which were those of welfare work amongst the soldiers and sailors, the advisability of erecting a B'nai B'rith Home for the aged and infirm, the method to be pursued for a membership drive and the conclusion not to liquidate the endowment feature of the District as it now stands. The form of cooperation entered into between the Welfare Board of New York and the Order was ratified without a single objection.

The question of Welfare Work and Social Service also occupied the Convention on Monday afternoon. Patriotism ran high and the resolutions recommending to the Board of Endowment Trustees the investment of $5,000 in Liberty Bonds was adopted by a rising vote accompanied by patriotic applause.

Another resolution which was adopted with loud applause was an indorsement of the request that the proposal to make "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" the official anthem at the camps be disapproved.

The Committee on Leo N. Levi Hospital then submitted a resolution endorsing the resolution of the Board of Trustees offering the use of the hospital to the government during the period of the war or as long thereafter as the war department may desire to use it. This was unanimously adopted.

A recommendation that the dues of all men in the armed service of the company be remitted and that paid up membership indentification card be issued to them was adopted.

Following the afternoon session the visiting delegates were taken on automobile rides about the city and for a visit to Camp Logan.

War Relief Meeting.

On Monday evening an inspiring meeting took place at Temple Beth Israel, followed by a reception at Concordia Club. The meeting had been arranged for the delegates and the community of Houston in behalf of Jewish war relief. The address on that occasion was given by Rabbi Samuel Sale of St. Louis, and the effect was such that a fund of $8,000 was subscribed by lodges of the district for the relief of Jewish war sufferers. In addition to this a large amount was subscribed by individual members of Houston.

In his address Dr. Sale proclaimed the Jewish faith the religion of humanity, and protested against the many and persistent efforts which have been made in the past to detract from the glory and purpose of Israel's mission on earth. This effort, he declared, was furthered by the statement that the Jews had merely borrowed the religious principles and teachings which they are seeking to spread either from the Egyptians, Babylonians or other ancient races.

He declared that the mere fact that the Jewish race has survived and lives today while the other ancient peoples lie dead and buried is an evidence that neither the Babylonians nor the others were the creative genius of the religious principles and moral ideals which the Jewish religion teaches.

This meeting was opened with a service, conducted by Rabbi Morris Newfield of Birmingham, Ala., and closed with a benediction by Rabbi Isidore Lewinthal of Nashville, Tenn.

Tuesday Session.

Tuesday's session brought forth the reports of all convention committees. Brother Rabbi Samuel Sale of St. Louis, Mo., in the forenoon, in bidding "good-bye" to the convention, delivered an eloquent talk on Americanism and patriotism and the part that Jewry plays in both. As a result of this talk the delegates in attendance pledged themselves to purchase on their return to their respective communities, in addition to that already purchased, Liberty Bonds in the sum of $56,000, said purchase to be reported to the Secretary of the District with the certificate of the selling bank or broker attached. District Grand Lodge No. 7, in addition to this, ordered the purchase of Liberty Bonds in the sum of $10,000, a total of $66,000. As a further mark of patriotism a collection was taken up among the delegates in attendance for the purpose of purchasing for each of the 145 inmates of the Jewish Orphans' Home of New Orleans, La., a $5.00 war savings thrift stamp book, and before the convention adjourned Brother Superintendent Volmer had in his possession a thrift stamp book for each orphan in his home.

In view of the prevailing conditions no selection for the meeting for 1919 was made, and this matter was left to the discretion of the General Committee of the District.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year:

President—Sol. Schoenemann, Houston, Tex.

First Vice-President—A. Leo Oberdorfer, Birmingham, Ala.

Second Vice-President—Victor H. Hexter, Dallas, Tex.

Treasurer—Archibald A. Marx, New Orleans, La.

Secretary—Myron M. Goldman, New Orleans, La.

In a few well chosen words Brother President Sol. Schoenemann declared the Forty-fifth Annual Convention of District Grand Lodge No. 7 adjourned sine die.

Entertainment.

In the morning the visiting ladies were taken for an auto ride to Camp Logan and given a luncheon at the Herman Park by the Council of Jewish Women. The big event of the day was a fish dinner at Sylvan Beach Tuesday evening, which was attended by about 600 persons.

Although the convention came to a close, it was decided to go through with the entertainment features scheduled for Wednesday as many of the delegates remained over. These included a musicale at the Rice Wednesday afternoon at 4 o'clock, an auto ride to the Humble oil fields at 9 a. m., and an entertainment at the Jewish Literary Society in the evening at 8:30 o'clock.

LAG BA-OMER

THE JEWISH MAY FESTIVAL

By Gotthard Deutsch

The first principle required for the understanding of history is the appreciation of the fact that human nature is the same in all ages and zones. The beauty of nature, awakening from its winter sleep with its flower clad meadows and its blooming trees, always aroused joy in the human heart and made men chime in with the song of the birds. Whatever the Bible critics may say and even prove, King Solomon surely might have sung: "Rise up fair one, and come away, for lo the winter is passed . . . the flowers appear on the earth, the time of the singing of birds is come".

In the ghetto the love of nature was partly lost. Morris Rosenfeld expresses this regret in his fine poem: "Der Yiddisher May", and long before him Berthold Auerbach in his novel "Dichter und Kaufmann" expressed the same thought. He presents to us the young poet Moses Ephraim Kuh driving through the country on a beautiful spring morning with his uncle, the rich banker, Veitel Heine. Ephraim Kuh is bubbling over with enthusiasm at the sight of the spring landscape, but his prosaic uncle cannot see why one should feel joy at real estate which he does not own.

In city dwellings, where there was no space in front of the houses to plant a geranium, and among people who, wandering through the country, had to think of the danger of being stoned or of the humiliation of being abused, love of nature could indeed not become a powerful sentiment. But it never was completely lost. Human nature is human nature, and so the Jewish youth had its spring holyday on the eighteenth of Iyar, commonly called the thirty-third day of the Omer, which means the thirty-third of the forty-nine days between Passover and Pentecost (the Fiftieth) which is the Greek name for our Shabuot festival.

This holiday interrupts a period of mourning, called the Sefirah, or the time of counting the forty-nine days beginning with the second day of Passover and ending with the eve of Shabuot. This counting is done audibly every evening. On the reason for this practice we shall not speak now, for our concern is with the question, why this period, called the Sefirah, is observed as a time of mourning, and the thirty-third day of it as a holiday.

Rabbinical law books tell us that the mourning was introduced in memory of the numerous disciples of Rabbi Akiba who died during that time. The Talmud indeed contains the notice that Rabbi Akiba had 12,000 disciples, all of whom died because they did not treat each other with respect, a bad habit which has not entirely died out in our days, not even among the reformers who otherwise have become emancipated from Talmudic traditions. A later author adds the remark that these deaths took place between Passover and Pentecost. Graetz believes that these 12,000 disciples mean the followers of Bar Kochba, the heroic leader of the last attempt of the Jews to liberate their home country by the force of arms, and Akiba, as the spiritual leader in this war of independence, was considered the teacher of the soldiers, I have my doubts about this, for Talmudic literature abounds with similar exaggerations, and the Talmud says that the Rabbis spoke often in hyperbolic language. It is certain, however, that neither Talmud nor any rabbinical author before the twelfth century records the law or the practice that in memory of this event no marriages shall be celebrated and Jews shall observe the mourning customs of not trimming their hair and beard. The first author to mention this custom is the French Rabbi Abraham Ha-Yarhi of Israel, though later authorities claim that the practice originated with the Geonim, not later than the eleventh century.

Samson Raphael Hirsch, the leader of modern German orthodoxy (1808-1888), suggests as reason that the persecutions of the crusade of 1096, which occurred about this time, helped to establish the practice. If this were true, it would remain strange that old authors like Yarhi should not have mentioned it, and in addition these butcheries continued into the month of Sivan. It is therefore probable that Rabbi Julius Landsberger of Armstadt (1819-1890), was right, when he suggested that the practice not to solemnize marriages during the Sefirah has its origin in the Roman custom to observe this month as sacred to Venus, the goddess of beauty who was so jealous that she would not tolerate any other lovemaking. We see today that June is the favorite month for celebrating marriages, which is due to the fact that people abstained from marrying in May. In such matters people are very superstitious, as we can see from a remark made by Rabbi Jacob Reischer of Metz (died 1733), who says that in one case, when a couple married during the Sefirah against his warning, their marriage turned out unhappily. The aged Rabbi of Vercelli, Isaac Jacob Cingoli, a representative of the old orthodox and cabbalistic school, quoted this statement in a similar case some years ago, and provoked his flock by his fanaticism.

The liberal school of rabbis ignores this prohibition, and the "Synod" held in Augsburg in 1871, declared it abrogated, but the conservatives still respect it. The late Lord Pribright, formerly Baron Henry de Worms (1840-1903), a prominent English politician, married a Baroness, Todesco of Vienna in 1864. The marriage was set for the Sefirah, and Isaac N. Mannheimer, the preacher of Vienna (1793-1865), was to perform the ceremony. He refused to do it, unless a recognized orthodox authority, Rabbi Abraham Placzek, Landrabbiner of Moravia (1779-1884), would give his consent. The latter refused to do this, and the families finally yielded, postponing the date. The respect for the opinion of Jacob Reischer did not prove felicitous for the young couple, and least of all from the Jewish point of view. The baroness died young, and her two daughters married out of the faith. Lord Pribright, angered at the censure which this fact brought upon him, caused genuine grief to those who gratefully remembered the services which he had previously rendered to the Jewish community, when after his death it became known that he had ordered in his will that he be buried in a Christian cemetery.

The only exception to the rule of mourning is made, as has been already stated, for the eighteenth of Iyar, or the thirty-third day of the Omer. The reason for this exception is still more obscure than the reason for the prohibition of marriages during the rest of the period. Just as a specimen of the fanciful attempts at an explanation, the following are quoted. One author suggests that the preparations for a holyday begin according to Talmudic rule two weeks before, and the eighteenth of Iyar is just fifteen days before Shabuot, and is therefore a holiday. Another author gives a still more artificial reason. He figures out that if we count off the seven Sabbaths of the period and the two new moon days, there are only thirty-three days left, and therefore the thirty-third day is a holyday. Rabbi Moses Sofer (1762-1839), gives another reason which is no better. According to his calculations, the first Manna fell on that day, a hypothesis which is not borne out by Talmudic testimony.

May I, therefore, not offer a solution of my own? The Jewish youth like other children love the spring, and the teachers gave them a holiday with an outing. For the date the middle of Iyar, corresponding to May, was selected. The eighteenth of the month offered the advantage that it would never fall on a Sabbath, and so suggested itself as the most appropriate date. It became the "Yiddisher May" and even the superstitious fear which prohibited marriages during this period, yielded to the call of King Solomon: "Rise up, my fair one, and come away, for lo the winter is past, the flowers appear on the earth, the time of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle"—the symbol of love and domestic felicity—"is heard in the land. Rise up my fair one and come away".

UNDERPAID GALICIAN JEWS DIE OF STARVATION.

Fifty thousand workmen of Galicia, most of them Jews, die annually of starvation, according to Dr. Straucher, a member of the Austrian Reichstag. The author of this startling statement, which was made at the recent meeting of the Jewish National Federation of Austria, said this dreadful state of affairs was due to the fact that the Galician workman is the most underpaid in all Europe.

"The Jews of Whitechapel roll in luxury by contrast with the Ghetto-denizens of Cracow, among whom the death-rate is 6 per cent per annum, compared to 3 per cent for the rest of the population. The maximum income of a Jewish artisan is 200 gulden ($40) annually.

Dr. Straucher was bitter in his arraignment of the type he described as "The Polish Club Jews" who hobnob with the most outspoken anti-semites and "have never lifted a finger to alleviate the condition of their own flesh and blood".

"ISRAEL'S WAR AIMS AND POST WAR PROBLEMS"

Essay by A. B. Freyer, Shreveport, La., at Houston, Tex., Convention District Lodge No. 7, I. O. B. B., April 21, 1918.

Brother Chairman, Fellow Delegates of the Convention, Ladies and Gentlemen:

When our worthy president, Bro. Schwartz, wrote me a few weeks ago inviting me to serve as your essayist on this occasion, I contemplated my acceptance with trepidation, realizing both my unworthiness of the honor and my inability to do justice to the cause, and in accepting it I did so, not because I felt I had any message to bring to you peculiar to my own mind, or one which would be more impressive or important than that which any one of you may have, but with the selfish thought of the inspiration which I would receive to intensify my zeal and my enthusiasm in the work of our Order. In accepting this duty and privilege I reminded Bro. Schwarz that the modern day lawyer was not necessarily an orator. I shall not repeat this warning to you as I am here in person to prove the fact.

My next difficulty was with the choice of a subject which could be made of sufficient interest to you and, as I was in New Orleans a few days later, I appealed to Grand Lodge officers to assist me by advising what to talk about. With one accord the great satisfaction I received was "to talk about—well say twenty-five minutes". I at least received a limitation on the length of the essay for which you are no doubt duly grateful.

Thus left to my own resources it occurred to me as the utmost folly to attempt to engage the attention and interest of the audience, or even arouse the enthusiasm of myself as speaker, with any subject wholly unassociated with the great conflict now occupying the world's intense interest. As satiated as we are with all the harrowing details of the suffering and hardships, the unprecedented destruction of human life and property, the wholesale slaughter of the aged, the infirm, the innocent, the ruthless ravages of the inhuman Hun, led by their power-mad war lord, yet our eyes cannot turn for a moment from the horrible picture and our minds cannot concentrate upon any other thought.

With this in mind I readily yielded to the suggestion that I discuss "Israel's War Aims and Post War Problems" as being of great present interest and even greater future importance, though, of necessity, largely speculative.

In this darkest hour of the world's history civilization stands on trial before the tribunal of right and might. The supreme test of man's superiority over the animal is at hand, the proof must establish as well as supremacy of man over institutions. In this mighty conflict, in which two-thirds of the civilized world is engaged, the struggle for world supremacy is between two great ideas, two great systems of government—Democracy, representing the voice of the people governed, on the one hand, and Autocracy, representing the will of a mighty ruler, by alleged Divine right, on the other.

In all the world's history the sons of Israel have been the grain between the millstones of contention. Never has the world required a sacrifice to expiate its blunders that it did not come to Israel's door for its offering. Never has there waged mighty conflict between man and man that one side and often both did not visit its iniquities upon the Jew, and so it is now that Israel's future grows brighter or darker as the weight of battle sways back and forth. In comparative numbers Israel is playing more than her part in the struggle but in even greater proportion is the importance of the issues to Israel's future. By this war it is hoped the world will be made to recognize the rights of all people, whosoever dispersed, however small in numbers and under whatsoever rule.

For many long weary years some seven millions of Israel's sons and daughters suffered untold persecutions, torture, violations of every sacred right secured by God to man; nay, veritable martyrdom under the cruel hand of an autocratic Czar, yet not a nation's hand was raised to stay the descending blows, not a nation's sword was drawn to shield them. No treaty protected their lives and properties and no intervention could be sustained. It took a savage invasion of beautiful Belgium, a ruthless ravage of that innocent little nation of peaceful people by another autocratic Kaiser, a war lord mad with thirst for world power, to awaken the world to a realization that even a nation cannot be content within itself and ignore the inhuman injustice done mankind—though thousands of miles away. Such a crime was necessary to teach the world that all nations are responsible for the welfare of civilization and all peoples must be respected in their lives, their liberties and pursuit of happiness.

At our last convention in Chattanooga we viewed the situation more as an observer whose ideals, traditions, patience, sense of decency and justice had been tried to the breaking point and our country had finally answered its call to duty by linking her fate indissolubly with that of the Allies and casting her fortunes with theirs. Coming as we do from a race of warriors and heroes of battle from the world's earliest recorded history, the Jew responded to his country's call and we now find him doing his part and more in battle, in finance, in relief, in charity, in field, factory and workshops. standing alone on his merits as a man and a citizen. Before the entrance of the United States into the conflict the "War Aim" of the Jew was without expression save in the ambitions and aspirations which burned deep in his breast and the fervent prayers which ascended unto Heaven. His one hope and dream was that in the end justice would prevail and in the council of nations fixing the terms of peace the freedom of all people would be recognized throughout the world. To plant this seed of righteousness in the heart of mankind the Jew fought courageously for his country's cause that it may be seen he too is entitled to his country's consideration and protection.

However, with the declaration of war by the United States there was given to the world the "War Aim" of the Jew as a people as well as that of our government. When our illustrious President Wilson, in his epoch making address, declared to the world that the object of the United States in the war was to "make the world safe for Democracy", he also voiced the sentiment of Israel, for with the world safe for Democracy it will also be safe for Judaism—when "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness"; freedom of speech and thought; the right to worship God as we may see His light, safety of person and property are all guaranteed by the governments of the world, Judaism may cease its defensive labors and concentrate on constructive activities. A world wide democratic spirit will tolerate no organized political persecutions or prejudices, no pales, no pogroms, no anti-semitic associations and civilization will have advanced one huge step forward towards the ideal of universal Fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man, towards universal peace.

For many months before our entrance into the conflict we heard much of preparedness for war and when the inevitable came we learned the awful cost of our indifference. Let us then profit by that experience, let us reverse the epigram of the sage and "in time of war prepare for peace", which will come upon us quite as suddenly as did the war and with almost as grave results, if we be not "prepared" in mind and spirit.

Israel's work, those problems which our noble Order has pledged itself to solve, will undergo great changes, evolutions, nay even revolutions, after peace has come. History will have written its greatest chapter and will leave the problems of the past over shadowed by those of the future. With the new conditions must come new questions for solution, new remedies, new activities. To these we must turn our attention in reflection and speculative contemplation if we would be forearmed.

The sixty-five thousand Jewish soldiers and sailors now in our country's service and the probable equal number who will be called before the end, or those of that number who will be spared to return to us, will come back new men, changed in mind and thought, in ideals and ideas. Theirs will have been no ordinary experience and their war environments will leave indellible imprints, with tendencies to efface the effect of years of Jewish home life and culture. To bring back into full life, to awaken and re-establish in the heart and soul of those Jewish sons the ideals and aspirations born and nurtured in the midst of the family life of the Jew will be no mean task for the temple, the synagogue, the Jewish institutions and Jewish parents. Many are the war marriages which will have to be re-established and reconciled with the changed condition of the husband and wife. The hasty decision, amidst the glare and flash of a soldier's uniform and the call for foreign duty, the years of separation; the wife fighting courageously her lonely battle of life and the husband fighting bravely the battle of nations; the change of outlook on life as a result thereof; the wound resulting in helplessness or disfigurement; all this and more will bring back together two entirely different persons from those who entered the holy bonds of matrimony. This, too, will offer no mean task to the workers in Israel.

The activities of our own noble Order will undergo great change. Already we have reported to us by our agricultural committee the temporary abandonment of one of the greatest undertakings of our District, the Farm City enterprise, a venture made unnecessary by the new situation brought about by the war. The whole immigration problem has been wiped out during the period of the war and after the war will present an entirely different aspect. Whatever the developments may bring it bids fair that the immigration of Jews will assume a normal aspect and be reduced to a minimum. At all events the question will not be a momentous one after the situation has once adjusted itself and will not require the machinery nor labor it has required in the past.

With a practical certainty of a Palestine of Freedom alike for all men, under the protection of the world powers, whether the dream of the Zionist for a restored nationalized Judaism be realized or not, European Judaism will have its haven of rest and peace in the land where its forefathers dwelt and will find no necessity to flee thousands of miles to a strange land, of strange people, speaking a strange tongue, in order to find an opportunity to shape its destiny, worship God in its own way and enjoy the fruits of the blessings which nature and nature's God has bestowed upon its people.

Again we also find the greatest mass of our suffering brethren liberated from the autocratic heel which once made its cruel imprint upon their necks. Though the Russian Government is today in chaos, suffering under the iron hand of Prussian rule and influence, the end of the war will bring peace to its people, civil, industrial, political, religious peace, and the one greatest achievement of the world's bloodiest carnage will be made effective and permanent with a Democratic Russia, a Russia which will offer all freedom to its people of every class and every faith and which will turn the tide of Jewish immigration into, instead of out of, its land.

With such a change about it Roumania cannot long continue to be the only black spot of Jewish persecution on the face of civilization and she too will come to realize the national value of her Jewish people and will make it to their interest to remain within her domain as free men and citizens.

With political persecution unknown, anti-semitism will have lost its strongest support; the immigration question will be known no more as we have long known it, and the Jewish question will become a National one for the Jews of each country to solve for themselves as their interest appears in their own land.

True it is we can expect more or less racial prejudice and persecution against the Jew in Germany and even Austria after the war, for at least a time. With Germany's war lord conquered and his dream of world domination shattered, as it will be as surely as there is a Divine Power in Heaven, a sacrifice will have to be made to explain the cause of his failure. Israel will again no doubt be called upon to furnish the offering. We note even today the Prussian ruler's iron hand attempting to force the leading parties in Austria to take from the Jew his well-earned liberties and civil and political rights. The Jewish influence in Austria is against the Hun policy to Prussianize the whole of Austria, and anything which stands in the way of the Kaiser is wiped out, regardless of the methods used. In the recent Jewish publications we note the dean of the medical faculty of the University of Cracow has expelled all Jewish non-matriculated students who register themselves as members of the Jewish nationality. In this also is felt the hidden power of Prussian influence.

The position of the Jew in Austria has been most satisfactory for many years and even in Germany has not been the cause of serious concern. It would indeed be most disastrous now if the end of the war should leave or create anti-semitism in either or both of these countries. Let us hope that both will be so utterly crushed in military power that the people will rise up in their might, strike from their arms the shackles of autocracy and secure the eternal peace of the universe by establishing the democracies of both Germany and Russia. Then indeed will Israel find peace and comfort, political, civil and reli[illegible]dom wherever it may choo[illegible] throughout the civilized world

On the other hand, should [illegible] prove a fact after the war, the [illegible] Jewish nation will find itself confronted with even greater difficulties than did the new Government of America after the Revolution. What these difficulties of state and people will be, or how they can be met, even the most speculative of us cannot undertake to suggest.

With immigration reduced to a normal minimum American Orthodoxy will lose its great source of reinforcement; its younger generation persistently abandoning its folds and affiliating with reform congregations and its older members passing away as time goes by. The question then presents itself—will American Orthodoxy be absorbed by Reform Judaism? Only time can tell. And then, too, with the younger generations of Reform Congregations becoming more and more indifferent to the traditions and history of their fathers, less intense in their devotion to their faith; with no Orthodoxy stimulating and keeping alive those traditions, from which Reform Judaism can in turn draw its reinforcement; will heroic measures be necessary to turn back this tide which may lead to uncertain fate? I cannot even contemplate a solution.

But less of speculation: In place of the immigration question absorbing our greater activity we will be called upon to give more attention to those of our faith who are now in our midst; crowded in the tenement districts of our cities. Instead of answering a crying need for more room in which to put the arriving immigrants, fleeing from the persecution of their country's rulers, the time can be devoted to bettering the conditions of those who are here with us. The free institutions of learning, night schools, industrial schools, can well be filled with eager children and parents earnestly desiring to become good citizens and remain good Jews. To teach them the best uses of our wonderful liberty and freedom in connection with their natural talents and industry will be a constructive work of great importance. To show them the practicability of uniting American ideas with Jewish ideals will prove to them that they can live in an American environment without losing one bit of their Jewishness. No other institution can bring before them these facts better and more forcefully than can the I. O. B. B., and when once this object is attained, American Israel will have no partisanship, no factions and no lines of distinctions whatsoever, but represent a solid front for unity of purpose and endeavor.

The Big Brother and Big Sister Leagues will find larger fields of usefulness and added responsibilities. With fathers and older brothers lost or disabled in battle the discipline on younger children will consequently suffer and juvenile offenders increase. To direct this youthful energy along constructive instead of destructive lines, will save to Israel much future concern. To save them from the inevitable ruin of vice and sin and develop their natural talents will yield to Israel's credit worthy sons and future mothers. To this end also must our religious schools be made attractive as well as instructive in order that the coming generations may become familiar with the principles for which their ancestors so nobly fought and suffered. In the youth is Israel's hope and the future of our faith rests in their hands. Their guardianship of it depends upon our moulding of their ideals as well as our example before them.

As has already been suggested, in a world where the security of small bodies of people is guaranteed by all nations there can be no room for political persecution or organized anti-semitism, but we know, of course, that so long as society is less than ideal there will be personal prejudices, and race distinctions. However, with the Jew having proven his patriotism, his courage and valor in battle, his devotion to his country's cause throughout the world, men cannot but reflect upon the injustice of religious prejudices and begin to meet upon a common plane of brotherhood as man to man, each rising or falling on his own merit without regard to faith or creed. My friends, I want to go on record here and now as stating and emphasizing it as my firm conviction that the end of this war will mark the beginning of an era of a new social standard which will make unnecessary our constant citing of our own virtues in order to offset innumerable false charges of alleged vices. Then will the magnificent work of our Anti-Defamation League bear fullest fruit and its labors be reduced to a minimum.

Again, with the return of disabled, disfigured and diseased soldiers of our

THE JEWS IN SERBIA

By Isaac Alcalay, Ph.D., Chief Rabbi of Serbia.

I come from Serbia, a country hardly known to the majority of men and women here. Though small in size, there is not a Serbian living who does not lament that Serbia should have been introduced to the world at large at the tremendous cost that history will never forget. It is in extent about 30,000 square miles. The total population is approximately 5,000,000. That we were ever a God-fearing and peaceful people can readily be adduced from the fact that fully 90 per cent of the people are tillers of the soil. Besides food products raised there which satisfied not only Serbia, but fed Austria and other countries, Serbia yields abundantly certain fruits. Pasture being plentiful makes possible the raising of cattle. Our agricultural exports represented before the war an excess of $8,000,000 yearly. Its imports, on the other hand, drew upon the rest of Europe and America for textiles, machinery and such goods as are lacking in a country devoted chiefly to agricultural life.

Serbia, since its liberation from the Turks, has enjoyed a constitutional government. Its Parliament is conducted upon a democrating basis, near to the American form. The majority in the Parliament shapes the policy and the program of the states' activity. The language is one of Slavic type and has much in common with its kindred neighbors of the same race, especially Russia. Its literature, though not known to English-speaking people, is by no means so poor that it has not contributed, and largely, its share of the beautiful to the rest of the world. Its folk-lore, including national songs and lyrics, as well as legends, is truly beautiful because of its simplicity and honest revelation of our people's soul and strivings. Every village has its school, every township its high school, and Belgrade, the capital, has a national university supported by the Government. From this university the country draws its leaders, both intellectual and political. The religion of the majority is the Greek Orthodox Church, just as is the case in Russia, but there is this difference, that our people have a sufficient native intelligence which has made them a reflective people. And it is this contemplative mood of theirs that has made them a very liberal and not at all fanatic folk.

There are 40,000 Jews in Serbia, of whom fully 10,000 live in Belgrade; the rest are in smaller cities. They came from Spain about the same time America was discovered. What peace and toleration the early Jewish settlers in America enjoyed after years of hardship and persecution was enjoyed by the Spanish or Sephardic Jews who went to the Orient and settled in the land now known as Serbia.

The Jews in my country enjoy every right accorded to the rest of the people, and the rights are many and are not restricted in any case, religious, economic or political. The Government supports materially the spread of Jewish teaching and contributes toward our people's religious development. The Rabbis are paid by the Government and are free to preach our religion as we desire. The Jews in Serbia are thoroughly organized and representatives of the various districts throughout the land form a religious board for the administration of the religious affairs of the Jewish communities throughout the country. The Chief Rabbi, whose office I have the great honor of holding, is the adviser and the intermediary between the Jewish community and the Government of the State. No question that has bearing upon Jewish interests is ever presented before the Government unless the opinion of the Chief Rabbi is first secured. Every community has its own local Jewish tribunal, presided over by the Rabbi of that district. There is also a higher tribunal in Belgrade, where questions that afford dispute are finally decided in the light of religious right and justice. The Beth Din, or court of this nature, obviates much litigation and delay and saves legal expenses. As marriage and divorce are not civil, but religious functions, the decisions of the Rabbis are sanctioned and recognized by the Government.

The Jews thus privileged have not only progressed, but have at the same time learned to gratefully appreciate the full rights accorded them. The Jewish schools flourished up to the war, the Jewish communal institutions were well advanced, and, as our people are thrifty, poverty was not a factor that made it necessary for the Jews of Serbia to seek aid from without. If this is the reason why the Jews of Serbia are not and have not been known to you, then I am sure you have no reason to regret it. We were, in a word, happy and contented.

The Balkan war gave us the first shock. In 1912 the Jews of Serbia gave themselves whole-heartedly to the cause of our fatherland. Among the men who won honor and recognition on the battlefield as soldiers, tried and true, were many of the former peaceful and loyal citizens of our religion.

It is well known that young Abramovitch, the humble Jewish soldier, held the battlefield of Kumanovo against the Turks. "Forward, my comrade", he cried, seizing the regiment's battle flag as the standard bearer was killed. He carried the flag and led his brave men in an attack that drove back the Turks and made Kumanovo a proud name in Serbian history. But there are too many single instances to draw upon which I feel it may be best not to narrate in detail, lest you imagine my motive is to single out the Jew of Serbia for especial commendation. I am sure that the Jews in the American army, and, in fact, in all of the armies of the Allies, will do the same. Not alone have the young men in Serbia done their share, but the older men and women have always been ready to make sacrifices. Ben Zion Bulli, a leading banker of Belgrade, offered the government the half of his fortune. The Jews of Serbia have built government hospitals out of their private funds and women have given up their jewelry for patriotic purposes. I am glad to note during my short stay here that the Jews and Jewesses of America are equally loyal, that they will continue to prove their appreciation of their rights as American citizens and will discharge their full responsibilities, both as Jews and Americans. The loyalty of the Jews during the Balkan wars was not alone commented upon in the most flattering terms, but was especially commended by the king and government. At the outbreak of the present war, the government appointed many Jews to serve on various commissions for the development of our country's cause.

The enactment of the present world drama unhappily forms its pretext in little Serbia. What has followed every one knows and every one regrets. But in our sorrow, and even reduced to practical penury, we have this consolation, that we are not only fighting for existence, but for world justice and the liberation of humanity. Had we been in the wrong, America would not be on our side. We have lost our cities and our villages, we have sacrificed all of our churches and synagogues, we have not been able to perform the burial rites of our dear ones, but, in spite of all, in spite of our unparalleled sorrows and disaster, in spite of Zeppelins and guns that carry 72 or 172 miles, we have not lost our courage, and, with God's help, and with the aid of the powers that are fighting their fight as well as our fight, we see hope for a happier future; we see final victory.

President Wilson, in all of his statements and messages, has ever encouraged us in a truly brotherly manner. He has proved himself to be not alone a man amongst men, but a father to suffering children and women by directing the Red Cross to spare no pains in stamping out hunger and disease.

The sacrifices and the loyalty of the Jew in Serbia are but a reflex of the readiness which the Jews in all other countries invariably demonstrate. In England, for example, in the beginning of the war, it is a known fact that Lloyd George, acting then as Secretary to the Treasury, called upon the late Lord Rothschild, consulting with him as to matters of special national war finance. "Wherefrom are we to get the vast sums required"? asked Lloyd George, among other important questions that he put to his lordship. The simple reply of the eminent Jew was, "We are paying smaller taxes than any other people, considering the wonderful advantages we enjoy. If you were to raise the tax 150 per cent you will find that people will not grumble, but will gladly meet their obligations. I am ready right now to make payment in accordance with the scale suggested by me". This little episode is not taken from manuscript but was narrated to me personally by the late Lord Rothschild in a very simple and innocent manner. The Jews of England followed the example of the Grand Old Leader and they did so when conscription was enacted to a percentage that was more than in keeping with their numbers. I will not dwell upon purely philanthropic contributions, including war relief of a certain type and nature occasioned by the world battle.

What is true of the Jews of Serbia, of England, is true of the Jews of France and now that I am in America I am happy to have convinced myself that the Jews here, not alone the native born, but the foreign born, have and are demonstrating their loyalty to a degree which makes me doubly proud of both my calling and my religion.

We are today witnessing more than half of Europe as a vast battlefield that drinks in the blood of the flower of our youth. We are today witnessing destruction and devastation that have visited hunger upon millions and millions of women and innocent children. And when the naive question shall be asked of us, "Why such calamity should have befallen civilization at its height"? the stern answer will be, "Because civilization was threatened by despotic materialistic powers". The world must free itself at every cost, so that its present price may pay for the future guarantees of a peace and plenty. Each nation will be mastering its own destiny and no single power will be able to enslave any people, no matter how humble its life and how meagre its strength. It is, therefore, the highest honor of the American Republic that it is sending material aid, and above all, her sons. In this America has proved that she has a robust heart and a young soul. In this idealization, America has demonstrated her loftiness, her capacity to serve mankind for all times, her deathless honor. I might be free to tell you that formerly America was known to us simple Europeans as the Land of the Dollar; today America has translated itself as the symbol of all that is noble and of nothing that suggests selfishness. Your entrance into the war was not for material gain, not for land acquisition, but to see to it that the bleeding nations of the world have plenty, not of land, but of the things that count more than land, more than anything in life—freedom—and love of brotherhood.

I have gone into this last phase more minutely not to praise America, because America needs not empty praises, but as a guest and a stranger coming, as I do, from a land where the blood was first shed. I feel your blood and our blood have been offered for justice and right. To you, my fellow Jews, I have brought a message from your brethren in Europe. To Europe I hope to carry your message of readiness to continue to serve America in its Godly task of aiding bleeding Europe, remembering also your loyalty to the cause of Judaism.

It would be presumption on my part to proclaim your duty, to stand back of President Wilson and the cabinet in their program of fighting to a finish—a finish that will secure democracy for the world, "Peace with Honor" for the world, righteousness and justice for the world. We will fight to a finish to make democracy safe for the world—this splendid thought of your great President has given to history. We will fight to a finish to win—Peace with Honor—this noble phrase Disraeli, a Jew, gave to the world. We will fight to a finish, to strive, to fight, to die for righteousness and justice—that is our war cry of history given to Abraham, our Father, by God Himself, a war cry for all humanity throughout the centuries, expressive of our deepest heart-thought, expressive of that idealism by which alone mankind can be redeemed and saved.—Hebrew Standard.

SKETCHES OF MODERN JEWISH HISTORY.

father's work, though not a Hebrew scholar, and a third one Benjamin, a clinical professor, was entirely indifferent to Judaism. A grandson of Rapoport, an ennobled financier, Arnold Rapoport Edler von Porada (1840-1907) showed his interest in Judaism by generous charity, but various great grandchildren have left the fold of Judaism. Zunz had no children and one feels almost tempted to say that this was a typical tragedy. He survived all his contemporaries, and even many of those who, stimulated by his works, may be called his disciples, for he died March 18, 1886, in his ninety-second year. In his youth he was the main stay of a society for the "Kultur und Wissenschaft des Judentums", founded in 1819, of which Eduard Gans (1798-1839) afterwards a convert and professor at the University of Berlin, was president, and Heinrich Heine (1798-1856) one of the members. Heine, himself an apostate, sneers at Gans, who cowardly left the ship, entrusted to his care, instead of perishing with it, and expresses his admiration for Zunz, who remained faithful to the "noble whim of his life". Whatever finally history will decide as to the future of Judaism, the work done by these men will never be forgotten.

The world is as a great violin. The earth is its body and its strings are the races of mankind, the Caucasian or white race, the Mongolian or yellow race, the Ethiopian or black race, and the American or red race. These four races form the four strings upon the violin of the world, and they are supported upon the bridge of nature which supplies them with food, clothing and shelter.

Now, upon each string of any violin we find that there are several different scales and that each scale has several different and distinct notes or tones within itself. The same is true of the violin of the world. Each string, each race, has several different scales within itself, called peoples, and these scales have several different and distinct tones within themselves called nations.

The "E" string of humanity, the Caucasian race, has the Aryan scale or people, the Semitic scale and the Caucasic scale. And each scale has its own separate and distinct notes or nations.

The Aryan scale has the German, the English, the Russian, the Spanish, the Greek. The Semitic scale has the Arabians, the Syrians, the Jews. Each is a separate and distinct tone or note upon this violin of the world. The English are the sounds of the law, the Germans are notes of science, and the Jews are the tones of religion.

For a violin to give forth its finest music each string upon it must be of purest fiber and each tone called forth must be a clear, strong, vibrant self—it must not be a difused note, but must be a clear note, and must be a distinct note, must be itself.

Upon the violin of the world each string, each race, should also be of the purest quality and each note, each nation, must be a strong, pure, determined self. Many have already recognized this fact.

The Jew who is asking for a home, a seat of government in Jerusalem is not asking for a weapon with which to wage wars of conquest and aggrandisement amongst us. He is merely pleading for the establishment of a central source from which new strength, new courage, new inspiration, new life, might be instilled into the hearts of the Jewish people. So that when this war shall have ceased and men, torn and bleeding, shall again return to their homes and shall again endeavor to readjust themselves, and shall seek for some guiding ray of hope or some soothing sound of comfort, and when the master musician —Jehova—in answering their prayer, draws the bow of time across the strengthened strings of humanity and places his finger of opportunity upon the awakened scale of the Jew—there shall come forth the clear, soothing inspiring melody of Israel's religion. And Jewry shall be prepared to do its duty and to do it well.

When all of men shall have learned to do their duties, when each note upon this violin shall be clear, shall be pure, shall be itself, this violin shall bring forth the aeolian masterpiece of which our sages have dream't—"The Symphony of Peace".

When this violin shall sing in rhythmic measure,
When Israel's God shall lead to tasks undone,
All hate shall vanish; Love shall bring its treasure
For men and man—at last—shall live as—one.

FOR THE RIGHTS OF THE JEWISH LANGUAGE.

A memorandum prepared and supported by Jewish, Ukrainian and Rumanian members of the Austrian Chamber of Representatives demands the abolition of the prohibition of 1814 to use Yiddish (and Hebrew) in document. Though, according to the opinion of known scientists, the above prohibition introduced by an old Court Decret was abolished by the Art. 19 of the Constitution, the Austrian Government and administration keep the standpoint that this prohibition is still valid, and base upon it their measures against the Jewish language.

RUMANIAN MINISTER'S PROMISE.

The new Rumanian Minister for Foreign Affairs, M. Misu, ex-Minister to London, on his return to Bucharest via Berne, received a delegation of the Pro Causa Judaica, consisting of Mr. Conheim, of New York; Mr. Boneff, president of the Berne Community, and Dr. Felix Pinkus, secretary of the Pro Causa Judaica. He promised to do his utmost to bring about the complete and immediate emancipation of the Jews in Rumania. The statement has been received with great satisfaction here. Many prominent newspapers have published accounts of the interview.

B'NAI B'RITH OF CHICAGO.

All the lodges of Chicago, namely Ramah, Oriental-Hillel and David Fish, devoted all their energies and activities during the past month in the matter of furthering the campaign for the sale of Liberty Bonds and a most magnificent result was achieved by the committees representing these lodges. From tabulated statements it appears that as a result of the activities of the lodges about half a million dollars in bonds were sold, aside from a large number of purchases made by our members direct who failed to report to their lodge.

The lodges will now devote their energies in the matter of aiding the National War Savings Committee to secure war savings pledges and committees will be appointed and it is expected that good results will be achieved.

In the matter of furthering the work of the Red Cross, the lodges will be represented by committees.

Initiations were held at the meetings of the three lodges and a number of applications for membership were presented.

Covenant Club of Chicago.

A patriotic rally was held at the Covenant Club on Friday noon, May 3, 1918, in the interest of the Third Liberty Loan campaign. The full Marine Band from the Great Lakes Naval Station were the guests of the club and entertained the members present, nearly 300, with patriotic music and its chief addressed those present, urging them to follow President Wilson's plan of "Buying Another Bond". As a result of the enthusiasm prevailing, $103,900 worth of Liberty Bonds were sold during the luncheon, which was a remarkable showing in view of the fact that all of the members of the club had previously purchased bonds in large amounts.

A notable feature of the meeting was also the presence of the Juvenile Band of the Marks Nathan Jewish Orphan Home, which was engaged in patriotic work in the downtown section of the city and were invited for luncheon at the club.

Soldiers' Welfare Work.

At a well attended meeting held in the month of April at the Covenant Club, the merger of activities of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith and the Jewish Welfare Board was effected. Both organizations have been active in helping Jewish men in the army and navy.

A branch of the Welfare Board was organized to take charge of the work in Rockford, Ill., and the Great Lakes Naval Station, Waukegan. Judge Philip Stein was chosen chairman of the branch and the other officers elected were as follows:

First vice-president, Rabbi Samuel Cohon; second vice-president, Mrs. M. A. Weinberg; secretary, Mrs. Moses L. Purvin; treasurer, Nathan Herzog.

At the Great Lakes Station the work will be supervised by Rabbi Levinger and at Camp Grant, Rockford, Messrs. Aaron Horvitz and Maurice Cohen will be in charge.

By James M. Rosenthal.

At the meeting of Adullam Lodge held Monday, April 22, 1918, it was voted that the lodge buy a Liberty Bond. District Deputy Leo Zander was in charge of the campaign to sell Third Liberty Bonds to every Jewish family in Pittsfield, and reported great success, there being about 425 subscriptions from the 1100 Jewish men, women and children in Pittsfield. Past President M. A. Hartstall, of Ararat Lodge, No. 13, Hartford, Conn., was the guest of the lodge and gave a very interesting talk on the 'war relief work being carried on by the B'nai B'rith in conjunction with the Jewish Welfare Board.

KANSAS CITY LODGE ORGANIZES JEWISH BIG BROTHER MOVEMENT.

Kansas City Lodge No. 184, was visited on Monday evening, April the 29th, by the Director of the B'nai B'rith Social Service Bureau, who addressed the lodge on a number of B'nai B'rith topics, calling particular attention to the work of the Social Service Bureau. He explained the need for volunteers to engage in the various forms of Social Service work. He made an appeal for volunteers to undertake Big Brother work in Kansas City. As the result of the appeal over twenty men met at luncheon the following day and organized themselves into a Big Brother Committee, to take care of Jewish boys who needed the guidance of older men. The work will be directed by Brother Herman Passamaneck, Exec. Secretary of the Young Men's Hebrew Association.

The lodge meeting, which was one of a series of cultural meetings held every two months, was very well attended. A class of four candidates was initiated. The meeting opened with vocal solos by Miss Frieda Feffer and ended with refreshments.

Kansas City Lodge has organized a Compaign Committee which committee plans to go "over the top" in filling the quota assigned to the Lodge by the general committee of District No. 2.

To add a diverting influence to the meeting various musical selections were interspersed. Judge Jacob Asher, in opening the meeting spoke of the high ideals of the B'nai B'rith and of its readiness in offering its vast organization to the government.

Mayor Holmes reviewed the strenuous times through which the country is passing and the duties and obligations which confront its citizens.

Rabbi Levi's speech was full of interest and was of an historic nature, reviewing the incidents of the period before the war.

B'NAI B'RITH OF CLEVELAND.

The Cleveland branch of the Jewish Orphan Asylum Alumni held its fifteenth annual ball Sunday evening, April 28, at the B'nai B'rith Building. Nearly 100 former boys of the Home are now in the service and a number of girls are serving as nurses. The proceeds of the affair will be devoted to war welfare work now being raised under the auspices of the National Alumni Association.

Saturday, May 24, has been fixed as Cleveland Day at Camp Sherman, Chillicothe.

All members of the Jewish community are urged to make reservations as soon as possible. A special train will take the parents, sisters and brothers of the soldiers direct to the camp. For further information, call B. B. Given, president of the I. O. B. B., at Main 876.

The Junior B'nai B'rith is planning to have a camp of its own on the lake shore near Cleveland. The chairman of the committee in charge is Herman Stone.

The membership campaign is now on. The organization is making an effort to obtain 300 new members by June 1.

Three hundred newly-elected members of Cleveland Lodge B'nai B'rith will be initiated at a patriotic and athletic rally to be held at the B'nai B'rith Building during the week of May 19.

Under the direction of Mr. Max M. Ozersky, arrangements are now being made for the coming B'nai B'rith event. Addresses will be made by prominent speakers, including Secretary Charles Nadler, of the Youngstown Y. M. H. A. Members of the Cleveland baseball team will be invited guests of the organization at the rally. Initiation of the newly-elected members will precede the rally and smoker. This is the largest class initiated in two years. With these new members, Cleveland Lodge will have a total membership of about 1,300.

At the coming rally, the representative of the Youngstown Y. M. H. A. will address the Junior B'nai B'rith members in the interest of a movement to bring about the affliation of that organization with the Y. M. H. A. group.

A farewell reception was held in connection with the dedication of the flag. The flag was presented to the Hebrew Institute by the Jews of the city under the auspices of Sioux City Lodge, No. 598, with the co-operation of a number of other Jewish organizations. The presentation address was made by Edward E. Baron, president of the B'nai B'rith Lodge and was responded to by Rabbi Emanuel Sternheim, president of the Hebrew Institute. Other speakers were Dave Davidson, chairman of the meeting; Mayor Wallace M. Short; Superintendent of Schools M. G. Clark, A. L. Gilinsky, chairman of Sioux City Red Cross, and Guy T. Struble, chairman of the Third Liberty Loan drive. In addition to the addresses a number of artists rendered entertaining numbers.

TOLEDO LODGE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

On Sunday, April 21, at the request of President Borinstein, of District Grand Lodge No. 2, L. M. Frank, of Toledo Lodge, went down to Chillicothe, O., to assist Zion Lodge in the institution of a new lodge in the latter city.

There are 19 charter members in the newly instituted lodge.

For the purpose of initiating a large class in Mansfield, O., L. M. Frank and the Degree Team of Toledo Lodge went down to that city on Sunday, May 5.

The annual memorial services of Toledo Lodge, in honor of those members who had departed during the past year, were held on Sunday, May 12, at the B'nai Israel Synagogue.

The boys' choir of that congregation furnished appropriate music. Rabbi David Alexander, of Collingwood Temple, delivered the memorial address.

At its regular meeting on Tuesday, May 14, Toledo Lodge was addressed by Bro. Alfred B. Koch, on the subject, "Why a War Chest for Toledo"? This talk explained the War Chest campaign which was later very successfully carried on in Toledo for the purpose of raising funds for the Red Cross, other war needs and all local charities, to cover an entire year's needs.

B'NAI B'RITH OF SAN FRANCISCO

Definite plans for increasing the membership of the B'nai B'rith in the jurisdiction of District Grand Lodge No. [illegible] were formulated and discussed at an important conference held in San Francisco on Sunday morning, April 14, 1918, between Second Grand Vice-President Louis Mendelsohn, of Fresno, as chairman of the membership committee and members of the Committee of Fifty of the San Francisco lodges.

The meeting took place in the B'nai B'rith Building following a session of the general committee. Mr. Mendelsohn impressed upon the members present the necessity of concerted effort for increasing the membership in the district. He proposed in carrying on the campaign for new members, the division of the jurisdiction into geographical units, each to be under the direction of one man in the membership work. The meeting was marked by keen enthusiasm and on all sides was manifested a deep desire to co-operate with Mr. Mendelsohn in his laudable undertaking.

Patriotic service is occupying attention of the members of the committee of fifty of the San Fransisco lodges.

With a large number of members of the local lodges in the army and navy, the committee has arranged to send newsy letters to these brethren at frequent intervals and the sub-committee with Past Grand President Henry Newburgh as chairman, has been appointed to take charge of this work.

Another service of the committee is in furthering the sale of Thrift Stamps. The members have organized a Thrift Stamp club, pledging themselves to make weekly purchases of such stamps.

Columbia, Modin and Ophir Ladies' Auxiliary of the B'nai B'rith, gave a dance on Sunday evening, April 7, 1918, at the Scottish Rite Hall. A large number of army and navy men attended the affair.

Golden Gate Lodge No. 129 has secured a charter giving the lodge formal authority to sell Thrift Stamps to its members. Under the auspices of the lodge a whist party and reunion will be held on May 15, to give the members a splendid opportunity to renew their old lodge acquaintances and meet old time friends. The ladies are especially invited to be present as valuable prizes will be distributed.

On Sunday, May 5, a hike under the direction of Golden Gate Lodge, was made to "Big Lagoon". Bro. Max Aftergoot had charge of the outing.

The meeting of the lodge held on April 17, at which Bro. Judge A. T. Barnett addressed, the members proved to be a very enthusiastic one. Patriotism and loyalty were the keynotes of the evening.

This seems to be the banner year of the Committee of Fifty, representing the San Francisco lodges. The attendances at the weekly meetings are satisfactory and enthusiasm is shown by the members such as has never before been observed. Upon suggestion of the local branch of the National War Savings Committee, a war savings society was organized, the members of which have pledged themselves to purchase Thrift and War Savings Stamps every week.

AKRON LODGE, AKRON, OHIO.

Akron Lodge No. 719 held its fortnightly meeting Wednesday evening, May 8. The lodge has at present a membership of 172.

The chief item of business transacted concerned the great district meeting to be held in Akron, May 26, 27 and 28. It was announced that B'nai B'rith notables from all over the country would attend. At the opening session on Sunday morning, May 26, Governor Cox and Mayor Meyers will be among the speakers. Extensive arrangements are in progress for the entertainment of the guests. The customary automobile rides, luncheon, etc., will not be lacking. A ladies' committee will look after the entertainment of the ladies accompanying the delegates, of whom some 125 from many parts of the United States are expected to attend. Col. Harry Cutler, head of the Jewish Welfare Board for Soldiers and Sailors, will be the speaker, Sunday evening, May 26, at Temple Israel, where a great rally meeting will be held.

It was voted to honor with some gift every member of the lodge entering the country's fighting forces. The entertainment committee reported successful results for the dance given April 28, notwithstanding the handicap of bad weather. It was further resolved to confine lodge business to the first meeting of every month and to reserve the second meeting for initiations of new members and social meetings. An enthusiastic patriotic rally was also considered at the suggestion of a communication from the district vice-president.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

SPRINGFIELD LODGE, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

B'nai B'rith Entertainment Clears $1,000 for Red Cross Purposes.

An audience which nearly filled Court Square Theater, enjoyed immensely, judging from the applause bestowed upon the local amateurs, the Red Cross benefit production by the Springfield Lodge of "Her Soldier Boy", on May 2, the proceeds of which amounted to about $1,000. From the patriotic prologue when Sidney Kohn sang the difficult "Mother" song to the drop of the curtain on the final ensemble, every moment was as full of fun for the audience as for the players themselves, who deserved the full benefit of the showers of applause and roses bestowed upon them.

The guest of honor, Charles M. Stern, Past President of District 1, voiced the sentiments of the audience when introduced by the president of Springfield Lodge, Frederick Robinovitz, to speak between the acts, he said: "I thoroughly enjoyed the performance tonight as much as the players themselves, now that their consciousness of good friendship among the audience has worn off. Each part is so fine, so clear cut, the voices so attractive that I am proud to be here as a representative of the Grand Lodge".

Speaking further of the spirit which the local Order has shown, Mr. Stern said: "I point with pride to the Springfield Lodge, which I have watched from its infancy and am assured that tonight is only another instance of what can be done by our Order". He also praised the wonderful spirit shown in the Liberty Loan drive here.

The songs and the dance specialty by Miss Sallie Tuber, Miss Jane Goldberg and Mr. Peter Gaudette, were hits and the whole cast was a credit to amateurs, the audience finding it difficult to divide the honors between Miss Sarah Savitt as Marlene, Miss Minna Kohn, cleverly acting the part of the peasant girl Elsje, and Harry M. Ehrlich, who, as Teddy, was the life of the show. And the "Amsterdam" song by Miss Kohn, the "Kiss Waltz" by Miss Savitt and Nathan Goldstein, as well as Mrs. Henry Lasker's "Smile, Smile, Smile", deserved the applause with which they were greeted.

SPOKANE, WASH.

Abraham Geiger Lodge No. 423 of Spokane, Wash., held an interesting meeting on Thursday evening, April 25, 1918. A large attendance was present and an interesting program was held. At the former meeting the chairman of the Third Liberty Loan reported $63,650 and an additional subscription of $2,400 was secured at this meeting. Mr. Jacob Schiller dedicated a service flag with 22 stars and an additional three to be added. Mr. Samuel Stein gave an interesting and patriotic talk. Rabbi Rosen delivered a lecture on the subject "A Jew Cannot Be a Good Patriot Unless He is a Good Jew, for Judaism Teaches Patriotism".

The Ida Blum Strauss Auxiliary of the I. O. B. B. gave a benefit card party in the club rooms on Tuesday evening, April 23, 1918. All the proceeds will be devoted to the Red Cross.

B'NAI B'RITH DAY AT WYNNE, ARK.

The celebration of B'nai B'rith Day at Wynne, Ark., was an unqualified success. The exercises were opened by the rendition of "America" by the orchestra of the Wynne High School, with the audience in chorus. Prayer was offered by Rev. Mr. Newell, pastor of the Wynne Methodist Church. Hon. Benjamin Hirsch of Memphis then introduced Professor Willis, superintendent of the Wynne High chool, who delivered a brilliant address. Mr. Hirsch made an impassioned appeal for a contribution in behalf of the war sufferers, the Red Cross Society and the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital, which resulted in subscription of about $500, which will be prorated equally between the three worthy charities mentioned above.

The celebration closed with the spirited singing and playing of "The Star Spangled Banner" by the audience and the Wynne High chool Orchestra.

The committee of Wynne citizens who had charge of the conduct and arrangement of this most enjoyable event was made up of S. Daltroff, J. Abramson and M. Drexler.

MEMPHIS LODGE, MEMPHIS, TENN.

Memphis Lodge No. 35 of Memphis, Tenn., in conjunction with the Y. M. H. A., has inaugurated a dormitory for the use of aviators at Park Field who spend their leave of absence in Memphis on Saturday and Sunday.

The Y. M. H. A. has tendered the entire second floor of its handsome quarters at Madison and Dunlap, with all of its facilities for the purpose, and the B'nai B'rith Lodge will furnish the funds by popular subscription for the necessary equipment. At a recent meeting the Lodge decided to co-operate with the Y. M. H. A. in this laudable undertaking, and when Gilbert Schloss, chairman of the local welfare work of the Lodge made the announcement quite a neat fund was subscribed on the spot by patriotic members who were present at the meeting, and the balance necessary will soon be forthcoming.

Thirty cots with bedding have been purchased, and the dormitory will be opened next Saturday night, and will be at the disposal of the Park Field aviators at Millington during the period of the war. Other quarters that have been opened to the flyers have been overcrowded and unable to accommodate the large number who seek quarters during their stay in Memphis. The Y. M. H. A. quarters will be open to as many aviators who desire to avail themselves of the opportunity, irrespective of their religious affiliation. This was a most commendable move, and met with instant approval by members of both organizations.

KANSAS CITY LODGE, KANSAS CITY, MO.

By L. E. Bloch.

Kansas City Lodge No. 184, I. O. B. B., listened to an interesting address by L. Edward Lashman of Chicago, director of the B'nai B'rith Social Service Bureau, at its cultural meeting, held on Monday, April 20, 1918, at the temple.

The speaker dwelt upon the Jewish war activities, giving numerous incidents and experiences. He gave a full report of the I. O. B. B. houses maintained in towns adjacent to the cantonments.

As a part of his visit to this city, he organized the Big Brother movement, explaining the intricacies of the Big Brother movement, and in this meeting and in subsequent meeting he met with a liberal response from all the members who were present. This meeting assures the success of the Big Brother movement in Kansas City.

Steps were taken to assist in the plea for raising twenty-five thousand new members throughout the country.

MISSOURI LODGE, ST. LOUIS.

A real patriotic meeting was held under the auspices of Missouri Lodge, No. 22, of St. Louis, on Sunday evening, April 28, 1918, and although the attendance was not as large as was expected, yet those who were present were well repaid by listening to the address of Mr. Charles M. Hay, who inspired them with his talk on the subject, "Back up the Boys Over There". As a result of appeal of Bro. Harry Simon, 52 members present subscribed $5,200 for Liberty Loan Bonds, to which sum the lodge added $1,000 from its treasury.

A great deal of business was transacted and a number of candidates were initiated by a Degree Team composed of Past Presidents of the lodge Several petitions for membership were presented and after the close of the meeting lunch was served and a social hour was spent.

B'NAI B'RITH OF ST. PAUL.

On Monday evening, April 8, 1918, at the Arcanum Hall, in the presence of about 359 members and friends, B'nai B'rith dedicated its service flag for its members at the front. The unfurling of the flag during the dedication and the address of Dr. S. M. Deinard, showed enrollment of 15 members in the service. A splendid program followed consisting of "Songs and Stories of Navy Life", by Leon Blehert, recruiting officer for the navy, vocal selections by Miss Sarah Frisch, accompanied by Miss Rose McClellan, both of Minneapolis; address by Frank L. Powers, county assessor, representing the America First Association; four minute talk on "Zionist Membership Campaign", by Mrs. Belle Calmenson; and the singing of "The Star Spangled Banner".

JEPHTHA LODGE, PATERSON, N. J.

Few of the lodges in our Order have been more active and progressive within the past three or four months than Jephtha Lodge, No. 143, I. O. B. B., of Paterson, N. J., for within that period of time the lodge has increased its membership by 25 per cent, has conducted a campaign for the benefit of the Jewish soldiers welfare work, in which, by canvassing the Jewish business men of the community, it raised a fund of over $5,000; on a number of occasions has entertained in Paterson a large number of the Jewish soldiers of Camp Merritt, the Government cantonment, which is only about 10 or 12 miles from Paterson; and in these and other ways has attained a place of prominence among fraternal organizations in its community, which it has never occupied before.

With reference to the new members it is notable that many are young men, and nearly all are men of prominence and substance, so that their affiliation with the lodge will surely add to its importance and beneficent activity.

MAHONING LODGE, YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO.

Although Mahoning Lodge No. 339 of Youngstown, Ohio, started its Liberty Bond drive only a few days before the close of the subscription period and its 117 members had previously bought bonds, they have all fallen in line with the order of the Government and President Wilson to "Buy another bond" and have subscribed over $6,000.

The committee known as the "shock troops" was picked with Judge W. P. Barnum as chairman, and the assaults upon the B'nai B'rith members have been executed with fine success and good results.

Mahoning Lodge is also doing good work in connection with the American Soldiers and Sailors Welfare League to provide comforts and recreation for the boys in the government service.

B'NAI B'RITH OF PORTLAND

ISRAEL'S WAR AIMS.

faith, the problems of our present elcemoysnary institutions will begin to increase and there will be a corresponding necessity for additional ones to meet the added demands. However, with customary zeal the B'nai B'rith will supply all occurring needs and fulfill its obligations, as it has always done. Particularly will there be added need for Old Folks' Homes, to care for the aged parents whose support has been taken away or lessened by war's ravages. In our own District this matter is already receiving due and timely consideration.

Again I say, whether Jerusalem becomes the seat of a nationalized Israel or not, the problems of Israel will be national rather than international. If it does become the seat of our Government as a nation, Israel's international affairs will be directed, controlled and protected through proper political channels under a central authority and will cease to be an institutional activity. Even if Palestine proves simply an open land of freedom and peace to all people the persecuted Jew can at least escape his tormentors and find relief near at hand. Thus will Israel's problem be nationalized and each country can deal with it as may be found necessary.

Then will it even more be emphasized that it is the work of the I. O. B. B. to unite all shades of Israel into one compact indivisible unit. However may various houses of worship, clubs and associations divide Israel into as many "divisions as there are interpretations of Judaism", it is the purpose of the B'nai B'rith to unite Israel upon his common religious agreements and wcld a union of all links into one indestructible chain.

The position of the B'nai B'rith today recalls to mind the simple parable from the Midrash—that when God had created the world He paused before creating man, lest one discordant tone might mar the harmony of His handiwork. So while the music of the spheres accompanied the glad song of nature's voice in all this perfection, He summoned to His side His three trusted counsellors, the Archangels of Wisdom, Truth and Mercy. "Shall I make man"? he asked them. "Make him not, O God", cried Wisdom, "He will trample on Thy laws". "Make him not, O God", added the voice of Truth, "He will defile Thy sanctuaries". But Mercy, kneeling before the throne of Righteousness, sobbed out, "Make him, O God, make him, and I will walk beside him in his dark hour". So God made man and sent him forth as the child of Mercy to live with his brother. As Mercy, has the B'nai B'rith ever walked with Israel's sons in his dark hours and until his night is passed and his day of light has come will it ever continue to walk.

NEO CHASSIDISM.

a livelihood and though very poor, he was considered a very pious man by the community. During the many years he lived in the wood he came in contact with the peasants and learned how to use plants for healing purposes, with which he affected some wonderful cures. He soon became known as a great healer and a wonderful man. In 1740 he settled in Miedzyboz, where he expounded to his followers his religious teaching. All he accomplished he attributed to the power of praying. Besht left no books, all that is known about him has come to us through his followers. Bal Shem was an optimist and preached happiness through Judaism. Since God is in everything there must be some good in everything. Therefore, every man must be considered good. If he sins we must explain his sin, not condemn him. No man has sunk so low as not to be able to raise himself to God, was his favorite saying. He believed not only in Olam Habah, but he also preached on Olam Hazeh. "Whoever maintains that this life is worthless is in error; it is worth a great deal, only one must know how to use it properly". He was opposed to asceticism of the Cabbalist and preached a religion of Simcha or joy through God. The ideal of man is to recognize himself as a manifestation of God. Of course, only a few men can attain such lofty stage and these exceptional men, therefore, become the righteous or the Zadickim who may radiate blessings to others. It may be mentioned here that Bal Shem the (by the Talmudist) most hated man in his time, was in 1759 a member of a committee, a strong advocate in favor of Talmudic study as against the Frankists who brought charges against the teachings of the Talmuds which resulted in the confiscation of all Talmudic volumes that could be found, and the final conversation of Frankists to Christianity. Besht was not a Talmudic scholar nor a great orator, but it seems that he must have possessed some personal magnetism through his piety and through his friendly intercourse with the poor and lowly. His little medical knowledge helped him a great deal, for he supplied it to the poor free of charge. He was looked upon as a miracle worker, as the holy man who has direct communion with God. He died at the age of sixty, leaving many disciples and hundreds of thousands of followers who were known as the Chassidim. There was a great animosity developing among the Talmudists against this sect. It will be remembered that Cabbalists persecuted the Talmudist; in return the Talmudists relentlessly persecuted the Chassidim. The opposition party was known as the Mithnagdim. In several places they appealed to the government against the Chassidim, but of no avail; the sect spread rapidly in spite of all efforts to down it.

The decline of Chassidism began simultaneously with the rise of the Haskala movement. The progress of the former really constituted the regress of the latter. The chief cause of the decline of Chassidism is to be found in the leaders of the sect. There developed the Zadikim dynasty that turned the originally pure and wholesome doctrines of the sect into a commercial institution. Still it must be remembered that even today a very large percent of Polish and Galician, Rumanian and even Hungarian Jewry, are of the Chassidic elements. Whatever may be said against the present-day followers of the Bal Shem, this much I think must be admitted: that the early and original purposes of the neo-Chassidism were high, its doctrine fairly pure, its aspirations ideal and sublime. This is the conclusion of no less a scholar (who was himself raised in the atmosphere of Chassidism) than the late Dr. S. Schechter.

Nine deputies were chosen at large, without regard to class or origin, by the entire population, making the membership of the council 43.

THE B'NAI B'RITH, THE GREAT CONCILIATOR.

What better Jewish organization in American or world Jewry to accomplish this grand purposc than the Independent Order B'nai B'rith? In its ranks are found Jews of every possible and no shade in relation to Judaism. In the B'nai B'rith lodge room Jews meet in amity and understanding regardless of particular synagogue affiliation. Our grand Order could possibly be the great conciliator betwcen Zionist and non-Zionist, bring both together in a conference which shall end in a union of Jewry into a Jewish unity for Jewish services.—Portland Jewish Tribune.

a solid historical foundation; a dream though it be, it has a power of its own, a driving power over men and their souls". And nothing has come into the life of the Jews throughout all the centuries of the dispersion that has lifted up so many of them from the utmost poverty and despair and has made them feel in their hearts and souls so fully the richness of Jewish life. Nothing in the history of the Jews, especially in the last quarter of a century, has come like Zionism to save so many of them from the crass materialism into which, until this war for democracy and the rights of small nations, all the world was in danger of falling; nothing like it, to give them noble visions. Hundreds of thousands of them have hitched their chariots to the stars and have risen to the heights of idealism.

But, as in all ages, they have remained planted on solid ground, they have never forgotten that to consummate their hopes and their prayers, practical work is essential. For thirty-five years, small groups of Jews have demonstrated the pioneering strength and the creative power that is in the Jewish people. While an individual, Eliezer Ben Jehuda, conceived of a renaissance of the Hebrew language for every-day use, it was the Jewish people in the colonies of Palestine that re-created it as a living tongue, the mother speech of the entire younger generation. And in those colonies, they have shown the capability of the Jews as agriculturists; nay, more, they have demonstrated what every scientist knows, that Palestine is indeed a land flowing with milk and honey. And when Turkish misrule, devastating and deforesting the country, shall be replaced by an orderly, modern government, developing the water power, reclaiming the swamps and the deserts, building the irrigation works, afforesting the hills and the mountain sides, and utilizing the underground waters and mineral oils, Palestine can again maintain in comfort a population of millions. But more than this; those colonists have shown that the Jew knows how to die as well as to live; to die, not merely because he wants to die in the holy land, but because he wants to die for the holy land, for the holy land and its redemption for the Jewish people. Our Jewish pioneers and their children have given their blood with the blood of our Allies to rescue that land. Some of my own personal friends among them have died, sacrificing themselves, without a moment's hesitation, young men and women who in the bloom of life had all to look forward to, old men who in their declining years had hoped to live in peace under the orange and the olive trees that they had planted, all of them fighting to save the land of our forefathers; and to save it, not for themselves or for their own children, but for the Jewish people. They have shown us how much a Jew should be willing to risk on his faith in his people; it is up to us now to act so that the wandering Jew may disappear, so that the Jew who must go forth, or who desires to join the pioneers of his race, may find a national home on the ancient soil.

Let us come to the practical problem; it is this: Great Britain has spoken to the Jews of the world; remember, it is not a Mr. Balfour who wrote a letter to a Lord Rothschild; it is the Foreign Minister of Great Britain, speaking in the name of the Government of Great Britain, who wrote a letter to the leader of British Zionist organization, and through him to the Zionist organization and to the Jews of the world; therein Great Britain pledged herself "to use her best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of the establishment of Palestine as a national home for the Jewish people". And during the last month, officially and publicly, France has said Amen to Great Britain's declaration. All of our other allies favor the Zionist ideals, and the Pope, vitally interested in the Christian holy places in Palestine, has spoken for the Jewish commonwealth. Our country is not at war with Turkey; our Government must remain silent at this time, but there can be no question as to where the sympathies of American leaders are; indeed, the publication of the British Declaration demonstrates this. Even Turkey and the Central Powers are now planning some measure of Jewish autonomy in Palestine.

The reasons for favoring the British Declaration, for becoming a Zionist, are various; some join the movement because they believe that from its realization will come a revival and a deepening of the religious feeling of the Jews in Palestine and in all other lands; others because they believe that the Jews of old set an ideal for social justice that the world has not yet reached and that may be attained in this Jewish Commonwealth, to the advantage of the people there and through their kindred, citizens or subjects of other countries, to the benefit of mankind; others because they believe that the Jews have vast capabilities in the arts and sciences, which will be unfolded in and through the schools and universities of Palestine, as well as in the industrial crafts, commerce and agriculture, which will be developed in the enterprises that the Jewish people will establish there; and still others because they believe that in all these respects, a nucleus of the Jewish people, enjoying liberty as a home rule commonwealth under the protection or suzerainty of one or the other of the great powers, or internationalized and neutralized by their consent, will be creative in religion, in ethics, in social justice, in the arts and in the sciences, in every field of human thought and endeavor, and thus again make the Jewish People the Chosen People—chosen not for self-glorification or domination, but for service to all men.

On the Basle platform, the declaration of the first Zionist World Congress, the establishment in Palestine of a home for the Jewish People recognized and secured by the law of nations, interpreted as the Declaration of Great Britain has interpreted it, every Jew can stand; the Orthodox Jew will derive from its fulfilment the grant of his and his ancestors' prayers, for the restoration of his people; the Reform Jew can still pursue his Mission of spreading the light of Judaism throughout the nations of the world.

The British Zionist Commission is at work; a commission of British, French and Russian Jews sent by the Government of Great Britain to survey the entire situation; to start, where the People of the Book would want to start, with learning, by laying the foundation for a great modern University; to build up the Anglo-Palestine Bank, the financial institution of the Zionist organization; and to strengthen it in every way so that if given the necessary funds it can, by loans, aid the thousands of non-Ottoman Jews who had left the colonies at the outbreak of the war, to begin a new exodus from Egypt to the Promised Land, to return to their homes, partially and in some cases completely destroyed, to re-establish the schools and the synagogues and, with a fortitude born of a new hope, again to take up their daily tasks. These pioneers are asking not for charity, but for opportunity; not for gifts, but for loans; not for alleviation, but for reconstruction.

The Zionist Organization is not attempting to duplicate the invaluable work of the War Sufferers' Relief Funds. The latter have the much-needed task of relieving the temporary suffering that has come to the Jews in these times of war, in Palestine, in Poland, in Galicia, everywhere. The Palestine Restoration Fund aims to build up the organization, to lend a helping hand to the creators of the future commonwealth, and thus to lay the foundations now for the institutions of the coming era. You may say this is premature; but, in the light of the British Declaration, no Palestinian work can be premature. Jewry must show to the world that for this ideal of the Jewish commonwealth it is willing even now to offer the most substantial support. In so doing, it strengthens the hands of Great Britain and our Allies by assuring them that it believes in their work, that it is their ally in every sense of the word, that it has full faith in their faith.

Now, my friends, we can build only as we have the means to build. We shall come to you later not for gifts, but for subscriptions to a great national loan; I mean that commonwealth will come to the Jews of the world for a loan of one hundred millions or even five hundred millions, in order that it may do the work of a modern state. Today for the Palestine Restoration Fund we want only the beginning. We want only a few million dollars. But we want all Jews who feel themselves Jews, who are ready now to stand up and be counted before all the world as Jews, to give as they ought to give to that fund.

The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith

Address by Mr. Adolf Kraus

President of the Order

at the Convention of District Grand Lodge No. 2, I. O. B. B., Akron, Ohio, May 26, 1918

To the loyalty of our members the Executive Committee is indebted for being able to present a record of achievements by the Order of which every member of the Order may justly be proud.

To report all of the activities of the Executive Committee would take more time than you or I have at our disposal. I will call attention to some of them, however, for it is a good thing at times to recall what has been done, and from consideration of it, gain strength for the things we have got to do.

The Order is destined to live for many years to come and do good service in Israel's cause. It is today stronger than it ever was in its history and occupies a more commanding position. In 1905 the total number of members in the American Districts was less than 17,000; it is now over 40,000. The increase in other lands is in like proportion. Lodges have been established in Canada and in countries in Europe, Asia and Africa where none had previously existed, and in countries in which the Order existed, the number of lodges has increased so that at the time of the breaking out of the present war it was an international power in Jewish affairs.

I call attention to the prevention of a massacre of Jews in Russia in 1906 and the removal from office of an anti-Semitic Governor of Jaffa in 1908, as part of our work as an international organization. (For particulars I refer you to my report of 1910). The activities of the Order in other lands equal, if not surpass, its activities in this country. But I will confine my remarks to some of the activities which have been carried on in America.

In the year 1911 the section of the city of Constantinople inhabited principally by Jews was destroyed by fire. In 1912 an earthquake destroyed a number of cities in European Turkey. During the same year the war of Bulgaria, Servia, Greece and Montenegro against Turkey was fought and concluded, leaving in its wake much misery and destruction. In each of those cases we promptly forwarded money for relief by cable. In several instances relief funds from the Executive Committee reached the sufferers before assistance came from any of the European organizations.

President Taft presented us with the pen with which he signed notice of the abrogation of the Russian Treaty as recognition of our services in aiding to bring about that desired result.

By the aid of Bro. Simon Wolf, we successfuly prosecuted appeals in several thousand cases of judgments of deportation of immigrants who sought our shores to avoid religious persecution.

We have established in the different Districts in this country Hospitals, Orphan Asylums, Homes for Aged and Infirm, Night Schools, Nurses' Training Schools, Free Employment Bureaus, Summer Camps for Boys, and many other institutions to benefit mankind.

After the San Francisco earthquake and the Ohio floods, we in each instance were among the first to furnish financial relief.

There has always been in certain quarters some prejudice against our people. About fifty years ago it was hardly perceptible in this country. It has been growing steadily since and had reached such dimensions in late years that the Executive Committee considered it wise and necessary to undertake the work of eradicating it as far as possible, or at least to diminish and prevent its further growth; for if permitted to grow it might become dangerous, if not to us who are now among the living, then surely to the next generations.

Prejudice against any sect or nationality incites agitation against such sect or nationality and continuous agitation all in one direction causes changes in laws and even constitutions. That the view the Executive Committee held in that regard was not the view of alarmists, but rather the view of a clear sightedness, is proven by late events. What was law yesterday is not law today. What may be against the law today may be within the law tomorrow. When the passions of a people are aroused, they draw together and array themselves against what may be justly or unjustly regarded as the common enemy. In this attitude human judgment is incapable of justice. The continuous defamation of an element of society which is in the minority is bound in time to color the mental attitude of the majority toward it, and sooner or later this bias or prejudice will find expression in the laws which the majority fancies are necessary for its protection.

Bearing that in mind, we formed the Anti-Defamation League, and in that work, at least, no one can charge that we have encroached upon the task undertaken by any other organization or set of men.

We devoted our first attention to the Press, as that is the spokesman of the public. It was quite common for the Associated Press, when reporting the acts of some offender against the law, who happened to be a Jew, to call attention to the fact that he was a Jew. The religion of other offenders was, however, never referred to. In 1908, I wrote to Mr. Melville E. Stone, manager of the Associated Press, calling his attention to that practice and the injustice such practice might do to law-abiding Jews. He answered promptly that we were right and that he had given orders not to repeat the offense to our people in the future. But many papers throughout the country in reporting local news continued the practice so we had to take up the same question with each paper separately. To the credit of the American Press be it said that with only one exception, every publisher acknowledged the correctness of our position and promised to cause such practice to be stopped. Here and there some new reporter repeats the offense, but throughout the country the giving of such offense is not now a general rule, but rather the exception.

Even "Life," which was recognized as a strong anti-Semitic paper, has finally listened to reason and for months no objectionable picture from our standpoint has appeared in that paper.

The next to combat was the caricature of the Jew on the vaudeville stage. We are not thin-skinned and can stand good natured criticism or caricatures. But when the vaudeville stage portrayed the Jew in the role of a grasping, heartless pawnbroker or a swindler of fire insurance companies, or a dead beat, we protested and did so in such an effective manner that those offenses are now rare. Of our efforts in that direction in the St. Louis "Star" commented editorially as follows:

"Fight Hebrew Comedian".

> "The fight on him has been taken up in many places by the B'nai B'rith lodges. In an issue of the B'nai B'rith News there is a strong editorial against this abomination. It is likely that this editorial will stir lodges all over the country to drive the 'Hebrew' comedian off the boards".

In some of the school books used there were references made to Jews which in their nature tended to poison the children's minds against them. As a sample let us take four lines out of the Mother Goose story:

"Jack sold his egg
To a rogue of a Jew,
Who cheated him out
Of half his due."

Each child reading that rhyme will naturally sympathize with poor Jack and will have a bad opinion of the Jew and, of course, will ever afterward associate every Jew with the one he learned about in the book.

Some of the books have at our request been withdrawn from the school curriculum, and as to others, the publishers agreed to oust the offending portions in the new editions to be published.

In one of Mr. Griffith's moving pictures, "Mother and the Law", the crucifixion of Jesus was represented in making the picture, and a large number of poor long-bearded Jews of Los Angeles were hired to throw stones at the person representing Jesus carrying the cross. The effect that picture would have had upon the minds not only of the young but even the old, if exhibited in every city and town in the country, can easily be imagined. We learned of the picture before it was exhibited and took the matter up with Mr. Griffiths, first on the ground that such a picture would not be historically correct, as it was not the Jews who crucified Jesus, but the Romans; that crucifixion was a punishment unknown to the Jews; that it was a Roman punishment; and next that the production of such a picture would be almost certain to create class hatred. Our arguments appealed to him, and although he produced the picture at a considerable cost, he promptly caused the scene to be cut out. I take special pleasure in calling attention to this, not so much because it is to the credit of our organization, but because of the high-minded action of Mr. Griffith in the matter which ought to be recorded.

It is unnecessary to specify the hundreds of cases we passed and acted on, such as signs in buildings, "Flat for rent, but not to Jews"; advertisements of summer hotels such as "Jews and dogs not allowed on these premises", or "Jews and consumptives not permitted here", etc. It is sufficient to say that we have had some success in our efforts to eradicate such defamations. It would have been useleess to appeal for fair play to those who so maliciously offended. We succeeded by aid of city authorities in having such "to rent" signs removed. We drafted a law making such acts of hotel-keepers punishable by fine and imprisonment and succeeded in having the law adopted in several states. We intend to submit the law to the Legislatures in every state in which managers of hotels are guilty of similar offenses. There is no provision in the act to compel any hotel-keeper to accept Jews as guests. In fact no self-respecting Jew would under the circumstances accept lodging or food in such a hotel. Our sole aim is to prevent such advertisements by posters, mail, newspapers or otherwise.

In 1907, there appeared in print that white slave traffic, so-called, was almost exclusively in the hands of Jews in some of the cities, principally in Chicago. We caused an investigation to be made and found that while the charge was exaggerated, there was some foundation for that statement. There was no law at that time in any State in this country declaring white slavery an offense and punishable as such. We caused a draft of a law providing for fine and imprisonment against such offenders to be drawn, and I presented it to the Illinois Legislature, where is was unanimously adopted. Similar laws were afterwards adopted by other States and the Mann Act by Congress. As soon as the law was enacted in Illinois I formed a committee in Chicago, which is still in existence, and is known as the "Committee of Fifteen", of which a majority were then and still are Gentiles. We retained an attorney to prosecute and detectives to ferret out the offenders, and raisd sufficient funds to pay them. For some period of time I acted as Chairman of that Committee. My orders to the detectives were to catch every Jew engaged in that business and bring him to justice. It did not take long until we had the Jewish panderers in jail, except such as escaped by leaving for parts unknown, never to return. No one can now truthfully say that the infamous trade of white slavery is in the hands of Jews. Lodges in other cities took up similar work. The Federation Review commented on our efforts as follows:

> "In taking up the cudgel against white slave traffickers the B'nai B'rith has shown its just contempt for that nervous unhealthy fear Jews usually have of exposing their own evil doers. The B'nai B'rith has proved itself wise and practical. Earnest, fearless work such as that will lend additional justification for the existence of the lodges and will reflect honor on the Order".

There was a time when in nearly every State the Jews prided themselves upon the fact that no Jews were in the poorhouse or the penitentiaries. For some years that claim had to be given up. Jews can now be found in prison just like their brothers of other creeds, doing time for the State, for all kinds of crimes, large and small. That the number of Jews performing such involuntary service is proportionately smaller than that of other creeds can be no satisfaction to us. One guilty of a crime is just one too many. But to prevent crime, the criminals must not be shielded, for shielding them only encourages them in evil ways. They must be brought to justice. If they will not avoid crime because of the wrong involved, then they must fear to commit one because of the certainty of adequate punishment. And so it is our duty to ourselves and to society to help to bring every one of our people who violates the law, to justice—the duty particularly of every member of our Order, as thereby we will protect the good name of our people. But after we have helped to bring an offender to justice, we have another duty to perform and that is, after he has paid the penalty for his crime, to try to restore him to a life of usefulness—not to shun him but take him by the hand and aid him to lead a proper life. Three years ago, with this in mind, we formed a Social Service League of the Order, whose duty among other things is to watch over those who have fallen by the wayside and try to uplift them. The service has cost the Order several thousand dollars for every man saved. We can record, so far, only a few with whom we have had success. I will mention one case, which if it were the only one, which it is not, would be sufficient recompense for all our efforts. It is the case of a young man who served a lengthy term in Sing Sing. We secured a position for him in one of the largest manufacturing establishments in the country after having submitted his entire record to the head of the house. He was at first given a humble position, but has risen rapidly and is now one of the trusted employes at a good salary with nearly 100 men working under him.

Since this country entered the war, we have raised money for the purpose of establishing, and have established, clubs for the entertainment and benefit of soldiers, not only of Jewish faith but regardless of creed. This—our work—was endorsed by the War Department and praised by the press. We were in a position to carry on that work independently, but some of our most loyal members urged that we cambine with the Jewish Welfare Board, as by a united effort more effective service could be secured for the benefit of the soldiers. We tell each candidate for membership that ours is a service of love, duty and sacrifice; that the offer of membership is not so much a privilege as responsibility, not so much reward as burden. The lesson which we so teach to candidates should at all times be also the guiding motive for the Order. With these things in mind, we entered into an agreement with the Jewish Welfare Board under which the clubs established by us shall be known as B'nai B'rith Branch of the Jewish Welfare Board and shall remain under the control and management of the B'nai B'rith, subject only to the general rules of the Welfare Board, and all funds collected for that purpose go to the Treasurer of the Jewish Welfare Board and that Board shall assume all liabilities of the clubs and shall defray all future expenses during the pendency of the war. While it is true that a certain Field Secretary of the Welfare Board has undertaken in the name of the Board to violate the agreement, it is no less true that the Welfare Board has promised and can be depended on to correct the Secretary's mistakes.

Some enthusiasts among us think the Order should be a leader in all Jewish movements. With the various Jewish organizations in existence it would be folly to attempt to lead in everything, for that would simply insure failure in everything. To be recognized as a leading force in Jewish affairs we first of all must recognize our own limitations. To illustrate: The Jewish War Relief Committee which has as its head the richest Jews in the country, is in a much better position to collect large sums of money than the Order possibly could. To make collections independently of that Committee would spell failure for us and injury to the War Relief Committee in its efforts. By united efforts that Committee has made a wonderful success. Our best wishes and best efforts should be with that Committee as long as relief is necessary.

As we have not engaged advance agents to advertise our doings, opinion as to whether or not the Order in the last few years had been making progress in America may differ. Dr. Emil G. Hirsch three years ago, at a banquet at which nearly one thousand persons were present, mostly young men and women, said:

> "I am glad to see so many young people here. They at least will not remember what I used to say concerning the Order. Of what I then said I have nothing to retract, but conditions have changed. The Order under the present administration is not what it used to be. It is now the duty of every good Jew who has Jewish interests at heart to become a member of the B'nai B'rith".

In 1910, Mr. Taft, then President of this, our glorious country, said:

> "I have known the B'nai B'rith for many years, for its good work, for the social opportunities it gives, and as a model Jewish society. And when I say model Jewish society, I mean a society that may be a model for all societies".

Since those words were spoken the greatest and most far-reaching events in the world's history have taken and are still taking place. The whole world is engaged in a gigantic struggle and no one can with safety foretell when it will end. Proud nations are crumbling in the dust; the Czar of Russia, the oppressor of the Jews, the ruler of the largest and richest empire on earth is a prisoner—not of another despot—but of the common, and by him, despised people. The hundreds of laws which were aimed to destroy the Jews of that land and which it took years for the Russian lords to enact, have in one day been swept out of existence. Will at some future time similar laws be enacted in the land of pogroms? The tendency of the times is against it, but so long as a strong and just government is not in control of that land, Russia will bear watching. And Roumania, which found the way to avoid the Berlin Treaty as far as Jewish rights were concerned, will it also try to circumvent the Treaty lately entered into? From latest reports it seems that such an attempt will be made, but I hope that the time has passed when such things will be tolerated. Never again after this war is ended, should it be safe anywhere in the world, including Roumania, to violate the plain rights of men as has been so notoriously done by Roumania in the past in respect to her Jewish [illegible] that our organization has not merely aided but has taken the leading part in the efforts of Roumanian Jews to secure full rights of citizenship in that land. It should, however, be borne in mind that it might have taken some years before our efforts would have been crowned with success if the Jews of Roumania as well as Russia had not in spite of all persecution fought bravely for the land which oppressed them, but in which they had their homes; that the conduct of Jews has been so loyal in all lands that their respective governments were forced to recognize it by decorating many for bravery. And so another one of our lessons is bearing fruit. In this country each man when introduced as a member is told: "Mindful of the blessings which we enjoy in common with our fellow citizens, let us with loyal hearts be ever devoted to our land of civil and religious liberty". And in lodges outside of the United States the candidate is told: "And as our heroes of old were true unto their standard, so should we continue loyal not only to our faith but also unto the flag of our land and to the government under whose protection we life".

And as before we entered the war, we felt proud of the loyal manner in which the Jews of each land at war stood for the government under whose protection they lived, even if that protection was a very poor one, so I have no doubt that they will be equally proud of the position we have taken, of our unquestioned loyalty and devotion to our own government in every test thus far presented, or that is yet to come.

Next fall we will celebrate the Diamond Jubilee of the birth of our Order. I hope that our members will see to it that by that time our membership shall be doubled, taking care, however, that each man accepted as a member shall stand for the upholding and enforcement of the laws of the land, for the best of American citizenship, in short, for the betterment of all mankind.

The question whether the B'nai B'rith is likely to maintain its prestige as a great international Jewish organization, given a new impetus through the recent commemoration by the order of the seventy-fifth anniversary of its establishment, depends altogether upon the use made in this country of the instrumentalities offered by the existing grand and subordinate lodges. The B'nai B'rith is an American Jewish institution; it was founded in this country; its foreign lodges, while enjoying a quasi-autonomy in their local concerns, look to the supreme executive with its headquarters by the shore of Lake Michigan for their guidance in general international Jewish affairs. The B'nai B'rith, it cannot be reiterated too often, was at the start and remained for many years, a typically German-Jewish organization. This it can no longer be, not because of the war, but because the Jews in this country of German origin or antecedents have long since emerged from the position of being actual or possible constituents of this Jewish fraternity. Therefore, the sooner the B'nai B'rith leaders recognize this alteration which has taken place and make a proper effort to respond to the needs of their new constituency, the sooner the continued, even the enhanced, prosperity of their institution is assured. —Hebrew Standard.

JEWS OF UKRAINE OPPOSE NEW MINISTRY.

The failure of the new Ukrainian Ministry to express itself in its official proclamations concerning national autonomy for the Jews as granted by the previous government, has ranged the Jews in opposition to that body, especially since the new government abolished the ministry for Jewish affairs.

The Jews of Ukraine are hostile to Germany because of its anti-Jewish policy, the object of which is to foster "pogrom" movements and create hatred between the Jews and the peasants in order to distract the attention of the latter from the conduct of the invaders.

JEWS WILL HELP SLAVS IN THEIR NATIONAL ASPIRATIONS.

A dispatch from Paris says that the movement among the Slavs of Austria to obtain their national autonomy was greatly strengthened by the encouragement given them by a manifesto issued by Jews of Bohemia, Croatia and other Slavic countries, in which the Slavs are assured that not only will they receive the support of the Jews in the Slavic provinces, but also Jews all over the world will be in sympathy with the struggle of the Slav for national independence.

An Open Letter to the Hon. Julian W. Mack

By a ZIONIST SYMPATHIZER

Dear Judge:

As a matter of principle I disapprove of anonymity. In the present case I am breaking my own principle. The reason is obvious. My words shall appear as a voice from the Jewish people among whom I believe to be many who share my views as sympathizers of Zionism and yet feel they cannot affiliate with the movement as defined in the Basle Program.

Before stating the one important point of difference, let me first of all voice a hearty, old-fashioned "Yasher-Koah" for the sound thrashing that you administered to those who call Zionism incompatible with American citizenship. You have so masterfully exposed them as "ghetto Jews" that all that I could add to your arguments is this designation. It is the yellow streak in them that makes them shake in their boots and that with all the vociferations of American first, etc., shows that they feel their citizenship as a gift of condescending grace which might at any time be withdrawn. They are like the Sefardim of Hamburg at the time of Shabbetai Zebi, who in their synagogue recited a "Misheberak" for the gracious King Shabbetai Zebi and in their council room passed a resolution that no one should speak of the whole affair to Christians.

There are some minor points on which I disagree with you. You say that "only under French law" the innocence of Dreyfus could be established. This can only mean that the two convictions of Dreyfus were an exceptional miscarriage of justice, due to political passion which fortunately, owing to saner form of legal procedure, were afterwards amended. If my interpretation is correct, I must differ. Dreyfus was a victim of a clerical and monarchical plot on one hand and of the fear of politicians to lose their power on the other. The separation of state and church, made a law, Dec. 9, 1905, showed that the clericals did not have the power which they claimed, and the politicians gained the courage of allowing justice to take its course. It may not make much difference to some people, but to me it means that anti-semitism is not an error of judgment, but a cold fact that politicians either use or dodge.

Another point of difference is found in your own brilliant presentation of internationalism. If the progress of the world tends towards a general application of the Swiss compromise between nationality and statehood, why create another nationality, why not wait until Jew and Christian, or Semite and Aryan, if you please, shall learn to get along as well with one another as the man of St. Gall with the man of Neufchatel?

A still more important point of difference may be found by the re-incarnated Philistine of the seventeenth century Sefardi type, who has got one Judaism in the synagogue and the home and another one on the street, when he reads your enthusiastic description of Palestine's wonderful economic prospects. The coal and oil wells and the water power which will transfer our troublesome Ladies' Garment Workers to Tiberias, and open opportunities to the "Realestatenikes" and other "Alrightnikes" in Jerusalem and Jaffa, equal to those of New York and Chicago, have not been discovered, and you as jurist of national fame can better explain the difference between "Ra-uy" and "Muhzak" than I with my undisciplined, old-fashioned Talmudic mind.

Leave all this go, however, and let us come to the real point of issue. We shall grant a Palestine, combining the resources of California's soil with Pennsylvania's industry, a Jewish statesmanship of the Disraeli type with the altruism of a Lasker, with an international situation securer than Switzerland and San Marino, and an intellectual life in which Spinozas, Bergsons, Jacques Loebs, Israel Zangwills and Joseph Israels will be commonplace phenomena. I shall be as happy over such a state of affairs as I am when I read that a Jewish hospital is counted among the best conducted in the country, and as is even my brother of the "Ethically-Monotheistic Persuasian", when a fellow Ethical-Monotheist enters the Academie Francaise. But what about the avowed fact that even after many years, perhaps after centuries of development, the great majority of the Jews will still live outside of Palestine, and see their—admitted—Jewish nationality fade away into a distant memory, as has been the case with Roosevelt's Dutch nationality? This is especially a grave problem for America, the melting pot of nations.

Look at our actual conditions. We are seeing the fulfillment of the prophet's prediction, the cutting off of root and top of our people. We had our statesmen, like Senators Yulee and Rayner; our financials, like Belmont and Speyer; our publishers, like Pulitzer; our scientists, like Loeb; our authors, like Mary Antin; even our pioneer ministers, like Gershom Mendes Seixas. How many of their descendants are still found in our midst to bother about the chances of irrigation in Palestine and the progress of Ben Jehudah's dictionary?

I like to present conditions in tangible instances. Let us announce in a well-attended public gathering that all those who know the names of their four great grandfathers shall raise their hands. I presume there will be very few. Let us announce next that all who know the names of their eight great great grandfathers shall raise their hands. The result will be poorer still. Let us continue and ask how many know the names of their sixteen male ancestors five generations back. The answer will be: Not one. It is distant history. Nobody knows it, and nobody except a professional bookworm cares to know it. Yet it is not so remote that here might not be a man living who remembers such a remote ancestor of yours.

Let us take the example of a man of sixty living today. Born in 1858, he may easily remember a man, born in 1780, who lived to the age of ninety. This man, a great grandfather at eighty, a thing not at all unusual, has now great grandchildren living who, born about 1860, can easily be grandparents, and the man of sixty can enumerate to their grandchildren the five generations ahead of them whom he knew personally. So within the memory of a living person, not even unusually old, Jewish ancestry may become a faint memory. If our Jewish affiliation is a matter of nationality only, the acceleration of this process would be directly meritorious. Just now all hyphenism is strongly condemned. We disapprove of fifty-fifty Americans even among immigrants. In the case of descendants of immigrants, in the sixth generation, as in the cases of Roosevelt, Gustav Schwab, etc., it would be ludicrous to count them among the Dutch or Germans. Even in countries with an old and stable population this process is continuously going on in individual instances. The son of Max Mueller, the author of a book, ostentatiously called "Chips From a German Workshop", though this workshop was located in Oxford, is an English diplomat. Sir Edward Goschen represented Great Britain at the court of Berlin though he is the grandson of a German bookseller with cousins in Leipsic and Berlin. Similar is the case of the "empire builder," Lord Cromer, the grandson of the Bremen pastor, Baring. France had her premier, Waddington; Germany her chancellor, Caprivi de Caprera; Italy her ex-mayor of the capital, Ernesto Nathan, an Englishman, born of a German Jewish father and an Italian Jewish mother. Why should any full-blooded Jew be excluded from the legitimate privilege of choosing his nationality on the hundred per cent basis? In other words, while it is treason to become a religious "Meshummed", it ought to be patriotic to be a national "Meshummed".

And one more consideration. We are told so much of a Jewish culture. Is in modern times the national element really the decisive factor in civilization? Is the Norwegian setting of Ibsen's dramas really the essential part of his art? Is he not nearer to Hauptmann, Rostand, Maeterlinck and Shaw than to Scandinavians of the seventeenth century. Would, therefore, a Jewish Ibsen of Palestine, placing his "Brandt" in the Lebanon, not be more of an Andreyev than of an Isaiah?

Forgive this long epistle, dear judge. It is a tribute of admiration and an expression of gratification at having men of your type, of the type of Justice Brandeis, Nathan Straus, etc., give their reputation, thought and energy to the question of Judaism's—or, if you will—Jewry's future.

AN "AHAD HA-AM".

SHECHITA IN SWITZERLAND.

An explanatory note issued in connection with the announcement of the removal of the prohibition of Shechita in Switzerland makes it plain that the concession is only a war measure. As a result of the scarcity of meat in the neighboring countries, these have prohibited the export of meat to Switzerland. Thus the Swiss Jews found themselves cut off from their former sources of supply of Kosher meat. The authorities therefore met the wishes of our brethren and temporarily suspended the regulations against Shechita.

Sketches of Modern Jewish History

Jews in Secular Literature.

Max Nordau said once in an address to a Zionist congress: "It has been the fate of the Jewish people that its Cincinnatuses ploughed other peoples' farms." He certainly is one of them. The number of Jews who since the end of the eighteenth century have won distinction in literature, art and science of all nations is considerable and a credit to the people from whom these men came. There is, however, also a tragedy in the loss which strictly Jewish activities suffered through the alienation of our best talents. It is the price which we had to pay for the removal of the gates of the physical ghetto, preceded by the gradual disappearance of our spiritual isolation. It may be symbolical to point to the fact that before the ghetto was abolished we hear in many places of a compromise with the medieval law which removed the gates of the Jewish stockade, although the restricted area of residence remained.

The isolation of the ghetto was never complete. The economic life took care of this. We find in Italy as early as the sixteenth century a Jewish opera company performing at the court of Modena; we find Jewish engravers and Jewish physicians even in half-barbarous countries, like Poland and Turkey. We find in Italy Jewish teachers of dancing so frequent that church authorities found themselves compelled to issue a prohibition against employing them. A text book of dancing in Italian, written by a Jew, is believed to be the first of its kind. We find occasionally Jewish poets who wrote in the vernacular of their country. At the dedication of the first synagogue of Amsterdam, 1624, an allegorical drama in the Portuguese language was produced. It was written by Reuel Jesurun, who had been brought up a Christian and, like many others, fled to Holland in order to be permitted to profess openly the religion of his ancestors. Among the amateur actors on this occasion, one, David Belmonte, is named, probably a member of the family to which the New York financiers —whose name, by the way, was never Schoenberg—belong. We have Antonio Jose da Silva, who died in the pyre at Lisbon, Oct. 19, 1739, a martyr of his loyalty to Judaism, just as his namesake, Francisco da Silva, had died for the same crime and in the same manner a century before at Lima, Peru, Jan. 22, 1639. Antonio da Silva has an honored place among the Portuguese dramatists. We have finally in the latter part of the eighteenth century the Italian poet, Solomon Fiorentino (1743-1815), and the German poet, Moses Ephraim Kuh (1731-1790). None of these, however, obtained a place among the classics of his nation. We have to go down to the nineteenth and the twentieth centuries before we meet Jews among the leading figures in literature, as Heinrich Heine, Berthold Auerbach, Arthur Schnitzler and Hugo von Hoffmannsthal on the German, Israel Zangwill on the English and Henri Bernstein on the French Paranassus.

The number of high talents is so great and the task of presenting their connection with Judaism often so difficult that we will do better to follow the advice, given in the Latin adage, "Multum, not Multa", and limit ourselves to the presentation of the most prominent Jewish celebrity in literature, Heinrich Heine.

The cultivation of biology in modern times, superseding the ancient notion of destiny and fate, has probably gone too far in its insistence on the racial element, while neglecting the historical forces in shaping man's character and underrating the individual expression of the racial property. It is a fact apt to somewhat reconcile us with Teitschke's Pan-Germanic race fanaticism, when we read that he sees in Heine the Rhinelander. The most favorite song of his, the "Loreley", owes its origin to the folklore of Rhine Valley with its long history of warfare from the days of Julius Caesar to the days of Napoleon. The romantic dream of the spruce tree longing for the palm in the distant sunny south may be traced to the emotions of people, seeing all around them ruins of old castles, of Roman palaces, of abbeys and cathedrals, whose history is connected with the pioneers of civilization, coming from the distant south, and which tell the stories of the land of sunshine, of palm trees and orange groves:

Ein Fichtenbaum steht einsam
Im Norden auf kahler Hoch',
Ihn schlaefert, mit weisser Decke
Umhuellen ihn Eis und Schnee.

Er traeumt von einer Palme,
Die fern im Morgenland
Einsam und schweigend trauert,
Auf brennender Felsenwand.

Equally strong, and probably even stronger than the impressions of the Rhine Valley, were the Jewish influences that made themselves felt in Heine's early youth. He was a boy when his native city was under French rule and he must have heard the stories of the persecutions of olden times, such as how his own grandfather could not enter the nearby city of Cologne without reporting to the police and asking for a guard who had to watch him until he left the city again. He was a boy growing into manhood, when with the battle of Waterloo many of the old restrictions were restored, and the best intelligence of the Jews was engaged in an energetic fight for the principles of democracy and liberty of conscience. The veneration of ancestors which is a Jewish heritage and usually colors the characters of the past with unconscious imagination was certainly not absent from the Heine household. He heard of the maternal grandfather who was a physician, and in the stories of the mother, became probably the greatest medical celebrity of the eighteenth century. He heard of this grandfather's brother who had graduated from the Yeshibah of Frankfort-on-the-Main with the title of Haber (bachelor degree) and had gone to Palestine. In the reports of the mother and her maiden sister this uncle, whose Bohemianism expressed itself in the life of a wandering dervish, became a paragon of learning and piety, and the presents that he made at family weddings from the gifts that he had received as a tribute to his piety became Aladdin treasures that he had found in King Solomon's grave.

It is therefore worth while to investigate Heinrich Heine's ancestry. The name Heine, often amplified into Heinemann, and still used among German Jews, is a convenient adaptation to German pronunciation of the frequent name Hayyim. Indeed, the name of Heinrich Heine's paternal grandfather was Hayyim Bueckeburg. He died in Hanover a few years before the grandson, who probably was named for him, was born. According to the testimony of the Hanover congregational records, Hayyim Bueckeburg was a pious Jew who never missed a service in the synagogue morning or evening and presided over the society of pietists who after the regular services remained in the synagogue to recite the Psalms. The poet, born in 1797, was named for the grandfather, but secularism had already taken hold of the Jews at that time, and so for official purposes he was called Harry, which at his baptism he changed into Heinrich. In the autobiographical sketch which he wrote when he applied for his degree of doctor of law, he converted even his father's name, Samson, into Sigmund, and made of him an army officer. The nearest that Samson Heine ever came to an army officer was his business as a camp follower, and he does not seem to have been very successful in this either, for the family depended largely on Samson's brother, Solomon, who by fortunate ventures as speculator in sugar, had become a millionaire and was one of Hamburg's wealthiest citizens, a liberal philanthropist and one of the patrons of the "Tempel", the first Reform congregation.

We see from the facts quoted that we cannot depend on Heine for correct notes on the history of his family. This refers not only to his remark on his paternal grandfather, of whom he merely tells us that all he learned from his father was: "Your grandfather was a little Jew with a big beard", but even to his mother's family, which, as Ezekiel Landau in his recommendation, given to Heine's grand uncle, Simon von Geldern, says, belonged to the aristocracy of German Judaism. Heine's mother, Peierche, or Betty, as she was afterwards called, was the daughter of a physician, Dr. Gottschalk von Geldern, who was among the first Jewish students of medicine in a German university, but does not seem to have been more than a practitioner of local reputation. His older brother, Simon, was a Bahur, who, caught in the mystic movement which in the middle of the eighteenth century, took a hold of the Jews of Europe, emigrated to Palestine. There was no way of making a livelihood in Palestine in those days, and Simon, like so many others, came from time to time to Europe, where his romantic appearance in the garb of an Oriental Jew and the merit of his piety secured him enough friends and promises to permit his return to Palestine. In Heine's reference this uncle was a merchant prince who came home from some mysterious country in the Far East, scattering mysterious treasures with a liberal hand. The brothers, Simon and Gottschalk von Geldern, were sons of a court Jew, one of the purveyors for one of the numerous small princes in Germany, who had married the daughter of another court Jew, the banker Simon Michael Presburger of Vienna. His own family on the mother's side was also connected with some of the richest Jews of Germany, the Oppenheimers, who were the Rothschilds of the seventeenth century, the family of Leffman Cohen of Hanover, the Goldschmidt family of Hamburg, known to us through that remarakble woman, Glueckel of Hameln, and through her with the Gomperz family of Cleve. Heine knew very little about this family history. He possessed no historic mind, and he did not care to say what he knew. In an autobiographical sketch, written in 1835 for the famous critic, Philarete Chasles, he makes the cynical remark: "Some of my enemies have made me an atheist, others a Saint Simonist (socialist), others again a Jew. I am sorry that I cannot always return the compliment." Heine was then 37 years old, his mother, who survived him, was living, numerous members of his family occupied a prominent position in Jewish society, some of them, as his cousin, Karl, the son of the philanthropist Solomon, were living in Paris, members of the Society for the Improvement of Jewish Affairs, with whom he was associated in Berlin, were living, some even in Paris. It is really strange that so brilliant a man should have been so small to conceal his Jewish birth and so stupid as to believe that he could succeed in doing it. We had a similar case lately in the journalist, Adolph von Blowitz, whose real name was Opper and who was a native of Blowitz in Bohemia. Herr von Blowitz—who might with greater right have called himself "Bluffitz"—has the effrontery to declare in his memoirs that he is sorry that he has to destroy the legend of his Jewish birth, but the Jews who possess so many celebrities can spare him. The truth, however, was that he was born in the chateau—which perhaps ought to read "ghetto"—of Blowitz as the son of a French emigrant family and was baptized on the day after his birth. The real truth of the matter is that Blowitz was born and raised as a Jew, and at the time when he wrote that "bluff" his sister was still living as a Jewess in Vienna.

I once heard a Russian preacher in his peculiar homely drawl which reminds one of the negro revivalist, contrast Moses, who, when he became great, went out to his brethren, with our present great men who go away from their brethren. Heine left his brethren. He was baptized in the Protestant church. He denied publicly, not only in the autobiographical sketch written for Chasles, but even still more foolishly in the Augsburger Allgemeine Zeitung, that he ever had been a Jew. Alfred Meissner, the Bohemian poet, tells us that when he referred to Heine's friends as not representing German but Jewish traits of character, Madame Mathilde said this was impossible, for one of them was "Henri's" cousin and surely could not be a Jew. Externally Heine denied his Judaism. He was so weak as to deny it to his wife, who surely could not claim any aristocracy, but he was a strong Jew in sentiment.

Of the larger works that show his Jewish character we may quote his "Hebrew Melodies", his tragedy "Almansor" and his fragment of a novel "The Rabbi of Bacharach". It has been often questioned whether this fragmentary novel had ever been finished. Heine claimed that the last part had been destroyed in the great Hamburg fire of 1842. His niece, the Italian Princess della Rocca, makes the same assertion, but she also is responsible for the stupid remark that some people have called her uncle a Jew, but while intelligent people do not pay any attention to such insignificant features of a man's life, the fact of the matter was that Uncle "Henri" was a Protestant. At the time, when the Principessa published this remark, "Henri's" sister, Charlotte Embden, her grandmother, was still living. She died as a Jewess nearly a hundred years old in 1899

No, it is not an insignificant feature in Heine's life that he was born a Jew. His "Rabbi von Bacharach" was intended as a confession of a man who was a Jew by birth, a Christian by official church affiliation and a "Greek"; i. e., a man who believes in beauty as life's supreme ideal, in religion. His "Almansor" is a picture of the tragedy of the man whom religious intolerance forces to profess a religion which hated and persecuted his ancestors, to whom he is still deeply attached in his heart. His "Hebraeische Melodien", while cynical and often displaying ignorance on things Jewish, show in the description of the Sabbath, in the appreciation of Judah Halevi as poet and in the biting satire on the fanatic friar's apology of the "religion of love" an almost devout Jewishness.

The greatest fault of Heine—and he had many—is that he destroys the effect of his best lyric poems by a self-persiflage which makes grimaces at his noblest emotions. In two poems, "Der Apollogott" and "Himmelsbraeute", he presents the tragedy of monastic life to which immature women have devoted themselves, being afterwards drawn irresistibly to the world of joy and beauty. In touching tones he sings of the nun who flees from the monastery to seek Apollo. People whom she asks whether they met the god of song and love shake their heads. They are of the Philistine type and know of no ideal beyond physical comfort. The poor woman must be out of her mind. Finally she meets a Jewish peddler. He saw Apollo in the guise of a Hazan who by his immoral and irreligious life lost his position and now is a hobo, wandering aimlessly through the country, singing at fairs in the company of women, outcasts like himself, who may be the Muses of whom the nun has heard.

"Eine Dicke ist darunter,
Die vorzueglich quickt und gruenzelt,
Ob dem grossen Lorberkopfputz
So nannt man sie die gruene Sau".

His Don Isaac Abrabanel in the "Rabbi von Bacharach" has no use for the Jews as a people; he hates their prosaic religion as much as he hates the asceticism of real Christianity, but he loves Jewish cooking. The Jewish kitchen, and especially the shalet, have strong attractions for him. In his obituary of Ludwig Boerne, which is one of the meanest and at the same time most brilliant essays which he has written, he poses as a benevolent outsider, studying the Frankfort ghetto. From the tone of his description one would infer that he never knew what shalet was before Boerne took him to the house of a friend, where he became its enthusiastic admirer. He regrets that the Christian church, which borrowed so many good things from Judaism, did not take over the shalet, too, but there is still time. When the cross and all other Christian symbols shall have lost their power of attraction, the shalet may bring back the lost sheep into the fold of the church. Still better known is his verse in the Tannhaeuser series:

"Zu Frankfurt kam ich am Schabbes an,
Und asz dort Schalet und Kloesse,
Ihr habt die beste Religion,
Auch Lieb' ich das Gaensegekroese."

The strongest expression of his cynicism is found in his "Reisebilder". There he presents a newly rich Hamburg Jew, originally called Gumpel, who bought a title of nobility and now calls himself Marchese Gumpelino. He poses as a devout Roman Catholic and an art connoisseur, affecting the manners of nobility. His valet is a former Hamburg lottery agent, named Hirsch, who, for motives similar to those of his master, calls himself Hyacinth. Hyacinth has no use for either the religion or the art enthusiasm of his master. The Catholic religion is too mystic and is not made for a business man. The Protestant religion is again of no value, at any rate not for a lottery agent. Hyacinth once attended a church, saw on the bulletin board the numbers of the hymns selected for the service. He bought lottery tickets with the same numbers and he did not win. Heine, always posing as the disinterested spectator, asks Hyacinth's opinion of Judaism. "This is no relgion at all", is Hyacinth's reply. "It is a misfortune". Similarly clever and equally cynic is his "Disputation" between a rabbi and a friar. The latter, beginning his argument, quotes Saint

THE PHILOSOPHY OF A PROLETARIAN

By a Peaceful Workman

Translated from the Yiddish by H. Eliassof

Life's Material and Moral Questions.

Our accounts in the world of the "International" must also be adjusted.

We have accounts there: the workmen among themselves and also the surrounding world; the question is somewhat entangled and we must try to emerge upon a clear path.

I will explain myself fully: the laborer's leaders reckon with the average will of workingmen, which means "high wages and short working hours", and strive to comply with this wish. I do not doubt their honesty when they promise us all the earthly fortunes.

But I will emphasize that the promises which are sufficient for Brother "Esau" cannot satisfy Brother "Jacob".

There is a reason for it: we behold in practical life that with the increase of free time and material means the animal propensities also increase. Passion is a beast whom we do not believe you are able to feed to the full, to satisfy its appetite. We can assume that as long as no way will be found by which the passions will be controlled, there is little hope for a better future.

We can, therefore, safely assert that it is not only a material, but much more a vital moral question of life.

The Universal Material and Ideal Fight for Principle.

It is a fight for principle lasting many years—here two worlds are meeting: the material and the ideal labor world, to speak more frankly: both contending parties really recognize the two things together, the materialism and the idealism, neither one permits itself to separate completely one from the other, still a constant fight is steadily in progress here.

It is a fight for the main principle and the supremacy: one side mainly places more importance upon materialism, the other aspires to something higher, something that cannot be touched by the hand, call it by any name you like.

The religious one calls it "the berakhot" (the blessings), the nationalist, [illegible]" (the primogenitureship). [illegible] celestial things, afterwards earthly fortune; to the second he gave material things with the first hand and with the second also heavenly blessing.

One Aim with Two Independent Ways.

Well, how will you close up these accounts? I think that it would be best for us to go at it in two separate ways.

We are two brothers, one stomach, possibly one language; the feelings are different; here is the confounding of the languages, the perceptions are mixed up; we are twins that are grown together and whose four feet are entangled.

The only thing we can do is: we shall become independent. In two ways we can come to one goal.

Two Historical Systems, the Heathen and the Jewish.

Just as in the world of ideals so also in the real world, I see two historical systems which part one from the other.

In the domain of religion we can recognize the "Jewish System" in opposition to the "Jesuitic". The purport of that one is: "The aim sanctifies the means", ours is just the opposite of this: "A good aim with good means".

In the territory of nationalism we find that it begins with self-love and ends with universal chauvinism; ours is the opposite of it: the beginning is "moral love", the final aim the striving for "universal peace".

Consequently, according to this measurement we can discover it also in the international movement.

We are all not satisfied with the bad order in the world, the question is about the means, how can we improve it?

Two Practical Methods: Negative and Positive.

I think that there are two practical methods:

We see in the market bad business men offering adulterated merchandise for sale; some think to drive them out with sticks in the hands; others say: the best thing would be to bring into this market more reliable wares and the bad articles will be pushed out by themselves.

I am of the opinion that we must adopt both ways: those that need the stick, let them beat each other; they shall continue the evolutionary procedure of the warring or might system, I call it the "goluth method".

I will recommend the second way: we shall begin the practice of peace and liberty, I call it the prophetic "Zion system" or Jewish historical method of freedom.

We all dream about a social revolution, the condition of all oppressed shall be improved. But the method of constraint is mostly practiced. The work in this direction is being carried on in a negative sense; I call it in the language of the prophets "the idea of justice".

The Positive Jewish System of Liberty.

I will propose that we shall begin with experiments in the practice of the Jewish system, which is a system of liberty in the positive sense; in the language of the prophets it is called: "the idea of righteousness".

We brought the divine or religious revolution into the world, we have destroyed the heathen worlds, not by means of coercion, but through exemplary work.

In our peculiar way we can also bring the human or social revolution, namely, through exemplary deeds: we must begin with better experiments in the practical world of labor.

Mankind is today too far materialized; our people are also influenced by the bad environment; an idealizing force is needed; I think it is time to make a beginning in this sense.

In the general "international" movement there are two elements: the universal national and the universal Jewish proletarian.

One part represents the "historical materialism".

We Jews represent in ourselves the "historical idealism".

It is possible that you cannot find the meaning of this in dead dictionaries; if you look for it in the living book you will discover it.

I will summon the children of our people to work in the midst of our brethren for the general human welfare to serve as an example for all the children of man.

We can also ask the brethren of other nationalities that they shall come to our aid.

For a long time we have helped you; [illegible] your disposal the best [illegible]th, who have sacrificed themselves [illegible] with the loftiest intentions [illegible] to serve the interests [illegible] entire humanity. [illegible] to think also about our oppressed people and its strivings for liberty. We ask of you that you shall assist us with less human sacrifice.

We shall not send you with revolvers against machines of hell, to stand up upon barricades against howitzers which means a sure death.

Our fighting forces are: "brother-love and exemplary action".

If you wish to go this way then you may compete with us; if you do not, we will not force you to it.

All that we ask is you shall not force your methods upon us, at least you shall not disturb us upon this way; we wish to practice peaceful methods, to work for the general liberation of humanity according to the ideals of our sublime prophets.

The Prophetic "Zion"—Thought and "Peace"—Idea.

The universal historical ideals which the prophets have fixed consist of two foundations, which are supplemental to each other: the "idea of righteousness and the idea of peace".

Before the peace idea comes the idea of righteousness, both united together, one is unthinkable without the other: where there is no righteousness peace is also excluded, where peace is missing, righteousness is also not enduring.

The peace which is brought into the world by means of force has no firm permanency.

If we do not wish to make fools of ourselves we must accept what our prophets have formulated; they say to all the children of man: "Better ye your ways and your deeds", your moral ways and practical methods.

The old system has broken down, something better must be begun.

Entire humanity must pass through a new "renaissance", it must be born anew.

Let every people and race create its "Zion", which means that it should become an example of moral perfection and of a high standard activity, each one upon its own historical ground.

The children of Israel should be the first-born and to our historical land belongs the first birthright, the first beginning should be made there, to spread a new stream of life upon the entire terrestrial globe, so our historical leaders, who pointed out the way to us, have formulated it.

We have two ways before us: either to hold on to the goluth chains of the deceitful, morally cirppled civilization and submit to the fate of unavoidable destruction, or to break the bonds of slavery.

We must declare ourselves before the whole world as free Jews, and demand of the rulers to give us free motion; the children of Israel shall not be annihilated upon the battlefields. It is our historical duty to make ourselves useful with better methods; we must seek to save our brethren, consequently also entire humanity through the ways which the prophets have previously appointed for us—the ways of peace and historical justice.

A Corner-stone for Colonization and Experimental Problems.

Now I will come to all parties and the entire body, which means the whole people.

If in some measure you also take our wishes into consideration and reckon also with the will of the poor brethren, the proletarians, then I will come to an understanding with you as to the way in which we could accomplish an adjustment.

We can only then find inner satisfaction when we will know beforehand that the social machinery assumes a position which shall lead in the direction of a better course of evolution.

We also do not think that everything can be changed at once, we only need to know positively that we are proceeding upon a safe line of march, that the way is not mined.

We cannot be satisfied with the business methods alone, something higher and better must be created.

A Thought-Design, a Plan.

I will propose a way to you with which we could be satisfied. Some will call me a phantastic person, or a dreamer, but you should also know that in sleep, before the day begins to dawn, one must be busy with dreams.

Also in the state of wakefulness when one wants to build something durable, the thought must first pass through a dream, then a drawing is made, a plan, at last we go to work; if at times things are done in a reversed order then buildings are created which shake and have no firm durability.

I will present to you a design after which a fundamental building can be created with which all parties shall be satisfied.

Outward and Inward Bases.

I take account of the forms of the outside world, we call it "civilization", or modern "artificial organs", and "productive forces", and I also reckon with the principles of our inner world which can be designated as "Israel's idea" or the "reign of Zion", which means the heart of our people, possibly also of the entire world.

There we must centralize all our forces, and from there we have to expect life-energy for all the scattered members.

Concerning "production" we must make use of modern machinery and industry; in regard to "ideal principles" we must practically employ the traditional system of the prophets which finds expression in "Sabbath", "Shemitah" and "Jobel".

We cannot yield to fashion, let it yield to us.

The Corporeal Construction of My Thought: The Material Organization.

My plan is that we shall begin industrial undertakings together with agriculture: to establish factories and shops, where a greater number of people shall find employment.

Things shall be arranged in such a manner that the workmen in the shops shall have one year vacation after six years of work in order to enjoy all the freedom of nature. A man shall not be a perpetual slave. At the discharge of a workman a separate compensation, as a part of the profit in which the men are participating, shall also be paid to him.

Concerning the agricultural workers, who are proportionately enjoying more natural freedom, they shall enter the factories once in seven years to keep up the industry and thereby also to improve their existence.

It shall be regulated in such a manner that there shall be no room for exploitation and oppression: the more intelligent forces shall not debase the weaker brethren, the workmen among themselves shall also not use violence; that means the free system of the prophets of Israel shall be practiced.

The Soul of My Thought: the Unity Idea.

With such an arrangement we could be satisfied in many respects: first, we would have an opportunity to remove all the stumbling blocks that stand in our way. Second, to unite all parties, which is only possible to do in the field where all work together in economic activity.

The religious people would have a chance to show their love of God less through ceremonies, which is a doubtful way, but more through matter of fact, which is true.

The radicals would have occasion to make themselves useful with their abilities and talents in the fields of social activity and historical groundwork.

The nationalists will surely not stand at a distance and also lend a hand.

The Morally Creative Power of Revolution.

In conclusion, our revolutionaries, the Jewish robbers, are also not as dreadful as others imagine; they are, after all, the noblest heroes we have; they are ready to sacrifice themselves for high ideas.

We do not know how to utilize them, others use them as ammunition; that is not their fault. They are far from us because they do not find a sufficient field for work in our midst. Their energy is used up in the interests of strangers, when we will show an example of free action and work devoted to the welfare of the people, then we will again have our nobility—all rejected brethren. The watchmen of strange vineyards will come back to us to help to cultivate our own vineyard. This means the return of the children to their borders in a nobler sense.

We are an idealistic people, our idealism shall not be made use of by strangers for aims of anarchy and works of destruction. We must know how to utilize it for constructive and creative purposes. With our ideals we can make ourselves useful for all our brethren, and serve as example for the whole world.

Taking in consideration the moral and historical obligations which we can use as the aim of our idealism, I think that I am justified to come before the public in the name of our Jewish proletarians, especially of the modest workmen, who have constantly worked in the fields of "Zion".

Not all will approve of it, and I am not seeking the sympathies of those who wish to retain the goluth system exclusively, for their shoulders the stick is ready; they will open their eyes when it will already be too late, but I think that the nobler parts of our people will take my appeal earnestly and do their best to help us to shake off our passivity and become more active historically.

I will call attention to the fact that today is a time when each group seeks self-activity and autonomy; they seek political, national also cultural autonomy, and so it is time that we should also come with our moral demands. We want to have ideal autonomy, which shall be based upon a joint thrifty, economical and historical activity.

When we will make such a beginning we can hope that a ray of light will appear in our dark sky, our wounds will become healed and we will have a prospect for a better and happier future.

WHAT THE IMMIGRANT HIMSELF CAN DO FOR AMERICANIZATION.

1. Learn the English language, the mother tongue of over seventy millions of our native and foreign-born.
2. Find out all you can about America, its history, its laws, its customs and its ideals. Plan to live in America permanently and buy a home.
3. Use your native advantages, background and culture for the advancement of America.
4. Respect and obey our laws. They are made by the people in the interest of all.
5. Take out your first papers and declare your intention to become a citizen of the country as soon as you can.
6. Don't leave your family, your house, your street, your community, to take care of itself, or for anybody else to take care of; do your own job and get others to do theirs.
7. See that your wife and children have an equal chance with you to know America, learn its language, become citizens and follow those ideals of social intercourse which belong to a democracy.
8. Enlist along with your American friend and neighbor. Do your "bit" at the front and win for your family a home stake and security stake in America in place of a mere job stake.
9. The flag is what you believe it to be. The stars and stripes are your dreams and your labors. You are the makers of the flag and it is well that you glory in the making.—The American Leader.

The sixty-sixth annual convention of District Grand Lodge No. 2 convened at Elks' Club, Akron, Ohio, on Sunday morning, May 26, 1918, with one hundred and twenty-five delegates in attendance.

The meeting was called to order by Bro. Henry D. Fuerst, past-president of Akron Lodge No. 719, and chairman of the Committee on Arrangements, who called upon Rabbi David Lefkovitz, of Dayton, Ohio, to offer prayer. The invocation was followed by the singing of the "Star Spangled Banner", after which Mayor Isaac S. Myers welcomed the delegates on behalf of the City of Akron. Mr. Frank A. Seiberling, president of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company, also extended a welcome on behalf of the Akron community, and he was followed by Bro. Samuel Friedman, president of Akron Lodge, who had just volunteered for service in the Federal Army. Bro. Joseph Selligman, of Louisville, Ky., first vice-president, responded for the District Grand Lodge. The convention was then turned over to the president, Bro. Louis J. Borinstein, of Indianapolis, whose annual message was listened to with most respectful attention and greeted with unbounded enthusiasm and applause.

The president's message was followed by the reading of reports of various standing committees, the report of the secretary and the report of the Covenant Endowment Fund. The convention was honored by the presence of Bro. Adolf Kraus, president of the Executive Committee of the Order, and of Bro. A. B. Seelenfreund, secretary of the Executive Committee of the Order. Brother Kraus presented informally and in detail the history of the negotiations leading up to the merger between the Order and the Jewish Board of Welfare Work, and his exposition was amplified by Bro. Harry Cutler, of Providence, past-president of District Grand Lodge No. 1, and chairman of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work. Brother Kraus read a most instructive and interesting resume of the remarkable achievements of the Order during the past thirteen years. The activities which he outlined and the accomplishments to which he referred thrilled the delegates with pride and renewed in them the resolve for still greater work.

Upon the adjournment of the morning session, the delegates were entertained at luncheon at the Elks' Club and the ladies were taken in automobiles to Stowe's Tavern. The delegates and ladies enjoyed automobile rides during the afternoon and were entertained at dinner in the homes of the members of the local lodge. In the evening the delegates were addressed at the Temple by Bro. Harry Cutler, whose discourse covered the activities of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work. It was a most illuminating address and gave inspiration to all who listened thereto. Bro. Rabbi A. Cronbach presided at the Temple meeting and musical numbers were furnished by Mrs. Dr. Tuholske and Mrs. Nathan M. Berk.

Monday Session.

On Monday there were two sessions of the Grand Lodge, one in the morning and one in the evening, both at the Elks' Club. The convention was busy with numerous reports and communications. The proposed amendments to the By-Laws of the Cleveland Jewish Orphan Asylum were debated at great length and both defeated. One of these amendments provided for an increase in the number of trustees from four to eight, and the other provided that officers of the asylum need not necessarily be members of the Grand Lodge.

Active debate was produced upon the question of the consent of the Grand Lodge to the merger between the Order and the Jewish Board for Welfare Work, but finally a motion to approve the amalgamation was carried, subject, however, to a ruling of the Court of Appeals upon a certain legal technicality.

Bro. Oscar Leonard, St. Louis, chairman of the Committee on Social Service, delivered a most interesting discourse, referring particularly to the reclamation of prisoners paroled and discharged from corrective institutions, and the convention voted an appropriation of five hundred dollars ($500) for his committee for the year 1918-19.

The matter of the purchase of additional Liberty Bonds and of further contributions to the Jewish War Relief Fund was left to the incoming General Committee.

Contributions were voted to The National Farm School, the Central Jewish Aid Society, of Denver, the Sheltering Home for Jewish Children of Denver, and the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital at Hot Springs. Bro. Rabbi Joseph Leiser addressed the convention on the subject of the B'nai B'rith Club, established at Chillicothe, Ohio, for the soldiers at Camp Sherman.

Tuesday Session.

Tuesday's session brought forth the report of all of the convention committees. Especial mention must be made of the Committee on National and International Questions, Bro. Sidney G. Kusworm, of Dayton, chairman. The report was particularly interesting in that it included the names of those of our coreligionists who are prominently active in the service of the Federal Government.

The delightful and numerous entertainments provided for the ladies were most lavish in character. Every moment of their time during the three days of the convention was arranged for by the Ladies' Entertainment Committee, of which Mrs. S. M. Levy was chairman. The program included visits to the plant of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company and the palatial home of its president, Mr. Frank A. Seiberling, who personally looked after the comfort of the delegates and their ladies during those visits.

Louisville, Ky., was unanimously agreed upon for the 1919 meeting place, after a cordial invitation had been extended by Bro. Joseph Selligman, first vice-president. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year:

President, Joseph Selligman, Louisville, Ky.

First vice-president, Sidney G. Kusworm, Dayton, Ohio.

Second vice-president, Alfred A. Benesch, Cleveland, Ohio.

Treasurer, William Ornstein, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Secretary, Victor Abraham, Cincinnati, Ohio.

General committee:
- Henry D. Fuerst, Akron, Ohio.
- Lou M. Frank, Toledo, Ohio.
- Edwin J. Schanfarber, Columbus, Ohio.
- Harry J. Levi, Cincinnati, Ohio.
- Adolph Biccard, Indianapolis, Ind.
- Judge Samuel Rosenfeld, St. Louis, Mo.
- Louis J. Borinstein, Indianapolis, Ind.

The report of the convention of District Grand Lodge No. 2 would be decidedly incomplete without some reference to the unfaltering devotion and the self-sacrificing activity of the retiring president, Bro. Louis J. Borinstein. The influence of his lovable and compelling personality infused into those who worked with him and for him a spirit of altruism and enthusiasm that was irresistible. The convention recommended that the incoming General Committee be authorized to present to Brother Borinstein an appropriate testimonial in grateful appreciation of his zeal, his devotion and his loyalty, and in recognition of his splendid personification of the exalted ideals of our fraternity.

Report of Committee on Resolutions.

With each succeeding year the problem of making adequate provision for the session of this Grand Lodge and for the reception of its delegates and ladies, becomes increasingly difficult. Every city is naturally anxious to emulate the example of its predecessor, and even to excel in courtesy and hospitality. We hold this annual convention in a time fraught with issues the like of which have never confronted our beloved country. Nevertheless, Akron has not been unmindful of the fact that, because District Grand Lodge No. 2 must play a part, however small and humble, in the solution of problems involving the people of our faith, both during the war and after its devoutly prayed for termination, this city, admitted by its modest but loyal citizenry to be the greatest in all the world, has performed both a pleasant duty and a patriotic service in providing so generously for our comfort, our convenience and our entertainment.

Akron Lodge No. 719, tenderly nurtured in the years of its infancy, watched over with anxious solicitude and often during times and serious misgivings, has justified the hopes and the ambitions of the stalwart few who predicted for it the success and the prominence which have been achieved. Three years ago, perhaps even two years ago, none would have been so presumptious as to forecast a session of the Grand Lodge in Akron in 1918. And yet, despite disappointments and discouragements, despite indifference and inactivity on the part of some of its members, so earnest have been the aspirations of its leaders, so enthusiastic their devotion to the ideals of the Order, and so intense their loyalty to the faith of their fathers, that Akron Lodge at first budded into being, then blossomed into life, and now flourishes with splendid vitality We were proud to convene here. We are proud of your magnificent record. We look forward with confidence to your growth from strength to strength.

In the language of our nation's chief executive, may we not express our grateful and generous appreciation of the gracious efforts, the tireless energy, and the constant attendance of Bro. Henry D. Fuerst, chairman of the Local Convention Committee? May we not, also, render abundant thanks to his faithful and thoughtful colleagues, whose kindly consideration and tactfulness have anticipated our every want? We have indeed been afforded every facility for the successful transaction of our important business.

Most cordially have we been welcomed by the Hon. Isaac S. Myers on behalf of this modest yet ambitious municipality, and by Mr. Frank A. Seiberling, one of Akron's and America's most public spirited citizens, whose fine hospitality will be cherished by our representatives and their ladies as a sweet memory. We are grateful to Bro. Samuel Friedman, president of the Akron Lodge, for the warmth of his reception. We are proud of his enlistment in the service of our loved country, proud, especially because his decision is typical of the mission of Israel, characteristic of the unquestioned patriotism of the members of our Order.

The convention expresses its thanks to Bro. Harry Cutler, of Providence, chairman of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work, and Past-President of District Grand Lodge No. 1, for his masterly and illuminating address of Sunday evening and for the inspiration which it gave to all who listened thereto. The convention is grateful as well to Bro. Rabbi Joseph Leiser, for his interesting resume of the activities of the B'nai B'rith Club of Camp Sherman, Chillicothe, Ohio.

We were honored by the presence at this convention of the Hon. Adolf Kraus, president of the Executive Committee of the Order, and Bro. A. B. Seelenfreund, secretary of the Executive Committee of the Order. The exposition given by Brother Kraus of the remarkable achievements of the Order during the past decade thrilled us with pride and renewed for us the resolve for greater accomplishments.

The delightful and numerous entertainments provided for the ladies have indeed been most lavish in character. We convey to Mrs. S. M. Levy, chairman of the Ladies' Entertainment Committee, and to her gracious associates assurances of our own profound obligation and that of the ladies whose good fortune it was to visit Akron with us.

It is a genuine pleasure to refer to the splendid manner in which the various hotels have cared for us. They have been uniformly painstaking and courteous in their efforts to fulfill our requirements. To the Elk's Club and to Mr. Lampson, its manager, we are grateful beyond measure for the numerous kindnesses shown to us. No meeting of the Grand Lodge has ever been held in a more delightful environment.

We appreciate and are grateful for the completeness and excellence of the reports of this session appearing in the Akron newspapers, and are confident that great good will accrue to the Order from the publicity thus given our deliberations. We thank the Jewish press throughout the District for its unremitting efforts in behalf of the cause we represent.

Thanks are due and with unstinted pleasure herewith tendered to the retiring officers of the District for the success and the glory of the administration now drawing to a close. Mere words of pen are hopelessly inadequate to express appreciation of their unflagging devotion and their self-sacrificing activities. Under their leadership District Grand Lodge No. 2 has borne the banner of light on high, unsullied and unstained, the pride of every member of the Order. And we should be derelict in our duty were we to omit at least passing reference to the distinguished services performed by the retiring president, Bro. Louis J. Borinstein. In season and out of season, he has worked and watched. The influence of his lovable and compelling personality infused into those who worked with him and for him a spirit of enthusiasm and altruism that was irresistible. His may well be the proud consciousness of noble duty, nobly performed. We recommend that the incoming General Committee be authorized to present to Brother Borinstein an appropriate testimonial in grateful appreciation of his zeal, his devotion, [illegible] alty, and in recognition of his [illegible] personification of the exalted [illegible] our fraternity.

Resolved, that a copy of this re[illegible] sent to the B'nai B'rith News for publication, and that copies thereof be transmitted to Akron Lodge, No. 719, to the Akron Times, the Akron Press, the Akron Beacon Journal and to the American Israelite, and be it further resolved that the secretary be requested to transmit to Mr. Frank A. Seiberling a letter of appreciation for the many courtesies shown us.

COMMUNICATED.

The following letter was received by Zion Lodge No. 62, I. O. B. B., of Columbus, Ohio, from a prisoner in the Ohio Penitentiary, which shows that they appreciate what the Welfare Committee under the auspices of District Grand Lodge No. 2 is doing in the matter of looking after the care, comfort and welfare of the Jewish inmates:

"It is cheering to see, in these days of all-absorbing materialistic interests, enough of idealism left in Israel to make possible a burial such as was given to Jack Nast, a Jewish inmate of the Ohio Penitentiary, as well as the interest taken in the welfare of the Jewish inmates by Rabbi Jashenosky and Jacob Myers.

"Unlike poor Heinrich Heine, who when in his last, forlorn, bed-ridden, pain-racked days, when deploring his having spurned his religion, his having separated himself from his people in the days of his ambition and frivolity without having gotten anything better or as good in their place gave utterance to his lamentation:

"Not a mass will be sung,
Not a kaddish will be said,
Nothing said and nothing sung,
Will be in my days of death.

"His love for his faith and his people came too late, but not so with Jack Nast, on his mattress grave he cried, that he was a Jew—proud of its history, proud of its achievements, having faith in its teachings, regretful that his life did not square with its exalted principles. His one wish was that he be buried in a Jewish cemetery, that he receive a burial as becoming one born in the House of Israel. His request was granted, Rabbi Jashenosky who was with him when he died, as was Mr. Jacob Myers, conducted the service at the cemetery, and Jack Nast's mortal remains were returned to Mother Earth as he wished they should be.

"Through the kindness of Warden Thomas, the Jewish inmates were permitted to contribute to a collection to help defray the expenses of the funeral after his rich relatives refused to contribute anything.

"Four inmates attended the services at the cemetery in citizens' clothes and listened to Rabbi Jashenosky's discourse. Although services are conducted every Sunday by Rabbi Jashenosky and Mr. Myers, never have the inmates listened to a more impressive sermon than that preached your rabbi on the death of this unfortunate man. Kaddish was said and will be said every week for him.

"May we not use a little space to acknowledge our gratitude to those who have made possible our holding Jewish service on each Sunday as well as on Jewish holidays? Fortunate indeed are we to have a man at the head of this institution who is mindful of all good that is in religion, who is broad-minded enough to allow men to worship as their conscience dictates, for it is through our warden that we are permitted to hold these services.

"In the efficient, painstaking, self-effacing manner in which the services are conducted by Rabbi Jashenosky and Jacob Myers, lay the secret of their success. Successful they are, since many, many Jewish men have left this institution better fitted morally to combat the evils of the world, whereas when they were received they were wholly lacking in precepts of Judaism and they who had bathed in crime a number of years previous to their incarceration leave this institution and attained success in the honorable way.

"It is the masterly self-consecration to their task that have made Rabbi Jashenosky and Jacob Myers loved and highly esteemed not only by the Jewish men, but by all of the inmates of the institution. May their good work continue.

(Signed),

INTERNATIONALISM AND NATIONALISM

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

Written for the B'nai B'rith News

The word "international" is most familiar to us in connetcion with "law", though when Jeremy Bentham wrote his "Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation" in the birth year of the French revolution, the combination was felt to be a novel one and in need of elucidation. Today we speak of international exhibitions, international congresses, and we are acquainted with the International Workingmens' Association, formed in 1864 and now practically a defunct organization, which is known for short as The International. International apparently means that which pertains to many nations, though when we speak of an international boundary line, as between Canada and the United States or between the United States and Mexico, we refer to something which involves two contiguous nations. Nations, whether two or many, are bound, it would seem, to have certain common possessions or interests which, far from obliterating national distinctions, rather presuppose them. Yet it cannot be denied that internationalism tends to transcend nationalism or to act as a check upon it. Just as the citizen of a state or the member of a nation has a narrower sphere of interests circumscribed by the family, so in the wider field of his activities he maintains relations with men of similar pursuits and like ideas who belong to other nations. For the time being and for the immediate object men of diverse races and nationalities submerge their differences and consider themselves not as citizens of particular states, but as fellow-workers reaching out hands across national divisions. Interstate regulations are not meant to do away with the existence of separate commonwealths, but in the nature of the case there must be a sort of cession of sovereignty, a willingness to recognize limitations to absolute self-control and self-sufficiency. We used to speak of the republic of letters, assuming that in the search after truth no other allegiance but that to reason and good manners was requisite and all other personal idiosyncracies might be abstracted from. In the realm of economics we see only too frequently how the isolation of political states is broken through: the shortage of crops or an untoward catastrophe or waste of material in one corner of the world affects distant countries. Not only man migrates, but also wealth; investments are made in foreign securities, and much of the soil and real estate and the natural resources of one country are held by foreigners whether resident or absent. Thus across and athwart the physical boundaries which separate nations there are reared invisible realms of common interest which tend to break down the barriers of nationality. International marriages, a quite common feature in the highest circles, call into being international families which, severed by political interests, are united by the tie of blood. Thought, above all, is customs free; its flight cannot be hampered by frontier sentinels.

It cannot be gainsaid that where the international interests are given ample scope far above the separate concerns of men dwelling apart and leading a more or less provincial life, internationalism savors of antinationalism. The best illustration is afforded by the Workingmen's International, the International. In the forefront of its movement stands the object of wresting from capital its dominion over labor. The conviction is uppermost that the conditions are not only pretty much alike all over the world, but that they are interrelated. If wars political, like the present gigantic struggle, are conditioned in national rivalries, the war between capital and labor is truly a world war. uniting the workingmen of the world and arraying them as a class against another class, the proletariat against plutocracy. If the International as an oragnization is almost non-existent, at any rate for the duration of the present war, it simply means that the assumption that national divisions could be swept aside rests on error and that facts are more potent than theories and abstractions. Nevertheless, the Russian Bolsheviki are just normal, orthodox internationals and again it makes no difference that their expectations of a general uprising of the proletarians of the whole world were not realized. The philosophy of the international movement remains the same and retains its force, albeit it is blind to the fundamental and instinctive nationalistic feelings inherent in man. Trotzki avows himself neither Jew nor Russian, but solely and simply international, a world citizen on Russian soil and by accident of birth of Jewish descent. His internationalism would ride roughshod over soil and birth and historical tradition. Suffice it to show that internationalism may become antinational. Trotzki's error is merely that he is an extremist, that is he believes in logic, whereas logic is far less dominant in the lives of nations than instinct.

All honor to the individual Socialists and laborites who in each of the belligerent countries acquitted themselves as full patriots. They simply committed a logical inconsistency which is to their credit. But the movement itself cannot be absolved from the charge of being hostile or at least indifferent to the idea of nationality. It is clearly important to differentiate between the organization and its members, between a movement carried to the extreme of its logic and its individual supporters. It would seem as if internationalism, which is on the lips and in the thoughts of many in peace times, dies away in times of war or national stress. The liberal politician still wedded to the ideas of the French revolution, the capitalist whose business interests are worldwide, the ultramontane who would see the Church restored to its medieval position of world dominance, all are found as individuals in the ranks of loyal patriots, and the doctrines of peace times are forgotten Nevertheless these doctrines constitute in a fashion a menace to a strong nationalism and are resented by the nationalists. The slogans of the opposing parties are only too well known. The pacifists of all shades are apt to designate the supersensitive patriot as a jingo or chauvinist. On the other hand the militarist party of northern Germany long ago inveighed against the four internationals, the red (Socialism), the black (ultramontane Jesuitism), the grey (liberalism), the golden (capitalism; in the language of anti-Semites, Judaism). The compliments, as we may notice, have been frequently exchanged. As in every slogan and party cry, there is much exaggeration. Nevertheless, with due regard to the illogic individual who simply refuses to go all the length of his party platform, there is no denying that the platform as such lays itself open to an antinational interpretation. The Chauvinist, as you may call him, perceives danger in any formula which by its avowal of supernational standards would at best result in a weakened patriotism. His cry is, My country, right or wrong.

Internationalism is one thing, and a League of Nations quite another. The one tends to destroy national units, the other merely federates them in the service of a higher unit without prejudice to their existence severally. The dream of the cessation of warfare among nations, of a united mankind devoting its energies to the works of peace, when swords shall be beaten into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks, is an ancient one, and we glory in the fact that the vision came to the seers of Israel. Plato is responsible for another utopia of the ideal state of the future. But all these visions, lofty and ideal, are for the distant future. Practical statesmen will operate with the attainable, guided by an insight into the workings of the actual world. Nationality will and must remain for a long time the mold of human culture. As conditions are, the international or the world citizen merely steps out of his own nationality into another, you simply cannot step out into the air. Mankind must be educated to a realization that the state is not the supreme arbiter of its own quarrels and misunderstandings with another. A League of Nations will curb the greed of an individual nation. But there must be no attempt to destroy the nation. There must not be a mongrelized humanity. National individualities, be they great or small, have a right to their existence. E pluribus unum, no more and no less. A United States of the World is an ideal. But even when realized it cannot in the nature of the case be as centralized as our own Union, which is based on the sameness of language and cultural possessions.

When, therefore, a newer school, in its organized opposition to Jewish nationalism so-called, that is, in its concrete form, to the foundation of a Jewish state in Palestine in accordance with the British declaration, places itself on record in favor of a Jewish international, it lays itself open to the anti-Semitic charge that the Jew everywhere allies itself with the forces that make at best for an attenuated nationalism. Remember, we are dealing merely with the logic of the position, not with the individual Jew who, be he orthodox or reformed or Zionist, cheerfully and willingly takes upon himself the burden of defending his native or adopted country along with the rest of his fellow-citizens. It is the platform we find fault with. It is meant to perpetuate the Jewish dispersion. These gentlemen would even help in the creation of a Palestinian settlement, provided it be one among many and the land of Israel be made part of the dispersion—a contradiction in terms. And so the formula is framed that the Jew was meant to remain scattered by a beneficent act of Providence. We have heard it said that it was even Providentially ordered that the Jew should engage in commercialism, commerce being the antidote to exaggerated nationalism and a means for accelerating the reign of internationalism. No, it is quite true that even after a creation of the Jewish state the Jews will remain scattered, even the great majority of them. They must then perforce enter fully, unreservedly into the cultures of their neighbors, even as they are doing it today, but without thought of being the disturbers among the nations, the protagonists of international movements, the enemies of jingoism or Chauvinism. Jewish patriotism, as it is, is often, though without justice, impugned. What shall be the outcry when leaders of Jewish thought openly align themselves with the internationals? Too many Jewish writers, most of them standing outside of all Jewish associations, are just now telling the world what the coming peace will be. The peace will be made by those that do the fighting, and it is our pride that the Jewish citizens are among them.

Preach, if you please, the advent of ultimate peace in the millennium. Indulge in pacifistic dreams of the future. Lend your aid to the business of the hour. There is no higher patriotism than love of country, of nation. Reject, if you please, the scheme of the Jewish state. But beware above all of the pitfalls of internationalism. You may find it difficult to understand the Jewish dispersion. To be sure, it is the work of God. But the designs of Providence are mysterious. The sequel will tell. Then it shall be known through whom God has truly spoken. Meanwhile, spare us the label of internationals.

THE JEWISH UNIVERSITY IN JERUSALEM.

"No more significant statement was made at the historic Conference of the English Zionist Federation, held at the beginning of this week, than that in which Dr. Weizmann made public the purchase of a site for the future Jewish University of Jerusalem. The history of the Jewish University Movement, when it comes to be recorded, will read like a romance—and not least in keeping with the poetic justice of the narrative is the fact that it has fallen to Dr. Weizmann, a veritable protagonist in the cause for the establishment of a World-Jewish Academic Center in Palestine, to proclaim the glad tidings of the acquisition of its home. It was an article by Mr. Benas on the subject of the University ('A Jewish University in Jerusalem'), contributed to the Jewish Review, in July, 1913, that first called the attention of the late Sir John Gray Hill to the matter, with the result that Sir John, upon what proved to be his last visit to his Jerusalem residence on the Mount of Olives, came into touch with leaders of the Jewish National Movement in Palestine, and the basis of the negotiations was then laid which ultimately led to a successful conclusion. The very day after the deliverance of Jerusalem, the necessarily interrupted thread of negotiations was resumed. Not tarrying for the peace, but within sound of the guns, Jewry asks His Majesty's Government (like Jochanan Ben Zaccai of old, who craved leave of Imperial Rome to build a school at Jabneh-Jamnia) to permit 'full investigation into the feasibility of the scheme for founding a Jewish University in Palestine, and, should military and political exigencies permit, to take steps for the initiation of the undertaking'. The British reply of God-speed is at once a tribute to the petitioned and to the petitioner. Is it not typical of the Jewish spirit to seek as the first foundation in its old-new land a home for things of the mind? Such a petition was to be expected from Jewry, with its age-long strongholds in its colleges. Such a reply was to be expected from Britain, which symbolized its works in the Sudan by a college in Khartoum. The following words of the late Sir John Gray Hill, contained in an address entitled 'Zionism, Jerusalem and the Holy Land', illustrate the manner in which the idea is envisaged by one not of the Jewish people—

"'. . . Do let it be a beautiful building. There is a great want of beautiful buildings in Jerusalem. . . . In the building of your University you might even rival the beauty of the Mosque of Omar. You have a great opportunity in this matter. Cannot you attract the attention of some very wealthy Jews to this great project? Whatever objections they have to Zionist projects generally, cannot possibly apply to this. What a noble monument it would be to a millionaire or a group of millionaires—those mighty kings of finance who are so powerful in Europe—to erect and endow a splendid University for the Hebrew race. If they were appealed to, they would, I think, listen. Surely they would not take for their motto the injunction addressed by the followers of Solomon to the Bride from Tyre; "Forget also thine own people and thy father's house". No, that cannot be: I think if the matter is properly represented to them a response will come. I believe also that a true and wise view of Zionism is growing in force. The cause is moving at last'.

"The opportunity, however, now presents itself to consider in more detail the purposes which the University is intended to serve. First—and we shall consider them chronologically as existent circumstances determine, there is the restoration of the country to its normal life. We have witnessed during the present world crisis the enormous part which the Universities have played in applying the arts and the sciences to the demands of war. At the Peace, and on its threshold, we shall be certain to behold the far-reaching claims which reconstruction will make, claims more intensive, more extensive. Palestine needs doctors, engineers, architects, biologists, chemists, botanists, geologists. Secondly, the work to be achieved by the University for the inhabitants of the Jewish national home has to be considered. Its part will be all-important. It will be both the reflective and directive force in the Jewish national life—bridging the various elements and co-ordinating the various kindred institutions. Thirdly, we may consider the effect of the University on Jewry in Diaspora. By the linking of the Re-settlement and the Diaspora, the University with its University Press and University extension system 'radiating its light and attracting its force from a Jewish environment', can revitalize Jewry the world over—raising a norm for Jewish education, creating a standard of the Hebrew language, and giving a sense of reality to the striving for the maintenance of Hebraism as a distinctive element. University extension centers will be established throughout the Jewries of the world, making of them living branches of the great Tree of Knowledge in Palestine, a Tree which will be both a Tree of Knowledge and a Tree of Life. Fourthly, there is to be considered the effect of the University upon the other nations of the world—whether indwellers in the Jewish national home or abroad. To them, Jewry, which signalized the restoration to its inheritance by the establishment of a Temple of Learning, will reappear in its natural light. No longer will Jewry be regarded as in the position of a negative attitude to the world. In the Occident, Jewry is too often envisaged as consisting of those not of Christendom—in the Near East as of those not of Islam. Jewish nationalism envisages Jewry as something positive—and the Jewish University will be the expression of that spirit of Jewish nationhood centered in the Jewish national home. It will be the center of Jewish humanism, which unites Jewry in fellowship with the free peoples of the world, in fellowship to enrich the civilization of mankind".

NEWS FROM LONDON

By Our Correspondent Dr. M. Epstein

London, May 15, 1918.

Tottenham Court Road is one of the main arteries of London traffic. About half way down, running at right angles, the visitor will come across Chenies Street, not a long road as London streets go. Towards the end farthest away from the main road a Jewish visitor would be attracted by a sign-post outside one of the house, on which in Hebrew letters the world is informed that here is the depot of the Jewish regiment, a unit of the Royal Fusiliers. Normally, it is a busy center. The various committees looking after the spiritual and material welfare of the Jewish soldiers hold their meetings there; the canteen provides meals at cheap rates to every Jewish soldier who cares to give it his patronage; here are collected the woolen comforts destined for the troops either while they are in camp or when abroad; and the office is busy all day long registering transfers of Jews from other units and fitting up new recruits before they are sent down to the base training camp. Major Schonefield, who has done for Jewish soldiers more than most people realize, is in command at Chenies Street, and his small staff just worship the ground he treads on. This week there were great doings at the Depot. American guests were expected, and it was desired that they should have a hearty welcome. They were brothers in arms; they came from a country whose friendship we are proud to possess; they were fellow-Jews; they had specially volunteered for service in Palestine. One hundred and fifty of them were coming up from Plymouth for a good time in London. It was decided to give them two meals at the Depot, to make provision for their obtaining a third at their own choice, and to provide some amusements for them. The committee ladies readily offered their services as cooks and waitresses, and many a Jewish mother from New York, had she been transplanted to London by a good fairy, would have rejoiced last Sunday afternoon to see even Mrs. Hertz, the chief Rabbi's wife, with a big apron on, dispensing tea from an enormous urn to the Jewish visitors from over the ocean. Next morning at seven the ladies were on the spot to provide breakfast to the guests, and one lady of our acquaintance calculated that she fried and cooked over 120 eggs.

Major Schonefield had arranged all the machinery for ensuring that each man should obtain his due. Tickets were issued to the visitors with coupons, which they gave up on receiving a meal. It appears that some of our Jewish friends lost their way on Sunday evening and had to sleep in the "Eagle Hut", a center for American soldiers. There they must have told their comrades of the gratis breakfast awaiting them at Chenies Street, for a number of "Sammies" turned up at the Depot and demanded breakfast. They went away sadder and wiser, for they had no coupons. If proof were needed of the excellence of Major Schonefield's arrangements, here it was.

During the approaching Festival of Shebuoth, parties of fifty are to be entertained at three or four London synagogues. Partly this week and partly next a number of ladies and gentlemen have volunteered to show London to the visitors, the end of whose stay will be crowned by a cinematograph exhibition. The men are very proud of the "Magen David" on their tunics, and their enthusiasm for the cause is good to see.

Meanwhile the first batches of men have reached the East, and perhaps by this time they may be in the actual battle line in Palestine. No definite news of their whereabouts has come through. The last we heard was that they were being feted in Cairo. On the other hand news has arrived of the Palestine Commission. We have been officially informed that the work of the Commission consists, among other things, of six main items: 1. To form a link between the British authorities and the Jewish population of Palestine. 2. To co-ordinate the relief work in Palestine and to assist in the repatriation of exiled and evacuated persons and refugees. 3. To assist in restoring and developing the colonies and in organizing the Jewish population in general. 4. To assist the Jewish organizations and institutions in Palestine in the resumption of their activities. 5. To collect information and report upon the possibilities of the further development of the Jewish settlement and of the country in general. 6. To enquire into the feasibility of the scheme of establishing a Jewish university.

In order to carry out the programme money is required, and Anglo-Jewry is being asked to contribute £40,000 (say $200,000) towards the total of £200,000 (say $1,000,000). Judging from the hearty response of the first call, it may be expected that this sum will be forthcoming. The Zionist organization in this country, which is handling the matter, has wisely suggested that in every synagogue during the Festival of Shebuoth, the Feast of First Fruits, a collection should be made towards what is termed the Palestine Reconstruction Fund. At a meeting last Sunday, of representatives of various synagogues, addressed by Nahum Sokolow, much enthusiasm was displayed for the proposal. It was at this meeting that the announcement was made that after France, Italy had also officially expressed its support of the British Government's Palestine policy as set forth in Mr. Balfour's letter. The three principal allies are now agreed on this subject; the support of the United States, though not yet officially pronounced, may be regarded as certain. That means in effect that the Allied Democracies will take up a very benevolent attitude to Palestine at the peace conference.

No doubt the Central powers will in due course attempt to win the sympathy of Jews in neutral countries by pointing to their magnificent stroke in emancipating the Rumanian Jews. Rumania was until recently a member of the Allied Confederation, but her treatment of her Jewish subjects was inexcusably cruel and harsh. Most men hoped that when the world is re-established on a peaceful footing and the fate of millions is settled once and for all, that Rumania would come into line with the Allied Democracies in her treatment of the Jews. That is a hope that may still be cherished. For though in the humiliating treaty forced upon Rumania by the Central Powers there is an article which enfranchises the Rumanian Jews, that enfranchisement is more apparent than real. On paper it sounds splendid. Jews who have fought in the war, and Jews resident in Rumania and born in Rumania of Jewish parents are to be naturalized. But let it not be forgotten that the vast majority of Jews who took part in the war have been killed, and their widows and children remain unnaturalized. The stipulation concerning the naturalization of Jewish residents born in Rumania of parents also born there is a subterfuge, as civil registration was only introduced in the 'eighties, and legal birth certificates in the majority of cases are almost impossible to obtain.

In the internal affairs of Anglo-Jewry only gentle ripples have broken the even surface of the waters, and those were caused by the gyrations of the League of British Jews; or as it is alternatively styled in some quarters, the League of British Flappers. Unable apparently to make the headway it expected within the community, the League has developed a journalistic activity outside the community which is worthy of a better cause. But the remarkable thing about this out-pouring of soul is that it does not testify to great courage on the part of the leaguers. Missionaries who are worth their salt should be ready to face even death; at least all the best missionaries in history were of this stamp. But the literary missionaries of the League of British Jews hide themselves under the cloak of anonymity. Their letters and articles in the press are, with one or two notable exceptions, nameless. One gets tired of reading first-rate anti-Jewish letters in the morning and evening papers from "a member of the League". It is whispered in some quarters that the real reason for the foundation of the League is that a number of title gentlemen are afraid that if Palestine becomes a center of Jewish life they might be deprived of their titles. If this conjecture is correct, it testifies to a mental and nervous state that is best left alone. The gentlemen in question do not appear to understand either British policy or Jewish history. There are certain axiomatic facts which they cannot or will not see. The Jews, like the Scotch, the Irish and the Welsh, are a separate race; they are none the less good British citizens, seeing that in modern free democraries, and in the British Empire in particular, race and citizenship are by no means identical terms. In India alone there are numerous races, there is more than one racial element in South Africa, and Egypt differs racially from the other British colonies in the dark continent. Yet the peoples concerned are subjects of the British crown, proud of the Pax Brittanica which combines progress with liberty. It is the strength of the British Empire that it contains so many races and creeds, all living side by side in amity. The League of British Jews gives an impression to the plain, ordinary man who uses his common sense, that it does not appreciate this fact. But in reality there is little to fear from the movement. Already it is doomed to failure; anyhow it is utterly fatuous. Only one request need be made to it—that when its members write to the press, either officially or in their private capacity, let them bravely publish their names so that the community may know who they are.

It is worthy of note that so far as religious progress is concerned, the only signs of activity come from the two communal extremes. The Liberal Jews are alert. They publish a journal; they arrange for interchange of views on topics of the day from the point of view of religion, such topics as education and social reform; they organize lectures on the religious aspect of re-construction. Quite recently, for instance, Dr. Israel Abrahams lectured on the place of Jews and Judaism in the world; Mr. Claude Montefiore on Judaism as a Universal Religion; and Mr. Mattuck on Judaism and Society. It is well that problems such as these should be dealt with. We want to know about them ourselves; we want the world to know about them. At the opposite pole we find the extreme orthodox Jews, headed by Dr. M. Jung, striving to win converts by modern methods. They use the printing press to catch souls; they believe, and rightly believe, that personal effort moves the world. So Dr. Jung has started the Sinai League, mostly for young people. It is as yet impossible to tell whether the League has the right kind of leaders—we mean leaders who possess the necessary magnetism which can lay hold of young people and lead them. Not that the Sinai League cannot boast of a certain measure of success. Its work, so far as it goes, is excellent, but it only touches a fringe of the problem. The same criticism applies to its organ, "The Sinaist", which is well printed. But whether its contents or its tone are likely to attract, let us say the young man at present in the army is, at least in some people's opinion, doubtful. Still, it is ungracious to cavil at any effort in the direction of improvement. Activity, and the consciousness that something needs to be done is a good sign. It is only the great middle section of Anglo-Jewry as represented by the United Synagogue that is quiescent. It just drifts. Its leaders regard the United Synagogue too much with the "city eye," and one well-known communal worker—a man with the kindest of heart and the narrowest of visions—has been heard to speak more than once at its meetings, inadvertently, of course, of this "company". With such a spirit to contend against the clergy, even if they were all able men would have an uphill task. The Chief Rabbi has his hands quite full with East End problems. It would really be a wise plan to have a chief ecclesiastic for the West End of London, too. The Reform Synagogue at Berkeley Street might do much in the direction of galvanizing West End London Jewry. But its two senior ministers are too old, and its junior minister too young. So we drift. But then most things drift today until the return of peace. The London Lodge, too, will only just be able to carry on. But when the war ends and a new world heaves in sight, there will be much to do for the Lodge—for Jewry and for Anglo-Jewry. For the London Lodge has one great recommendation—it is composed of a body of men in their best years—not too old and not too young.

THE JEWISH FORUM.

"Hermann Cohen as Philosopher and Jew" is the title of an article by Dr. Henry Slonimsky, a disciple of the great Kantian philosopher, appearing in the June issue of The Jewish Forum. In the same issue, Albert M. Hyamson writes on "The Effect of Political Emancipation on the Jews of England"; Mr. Abraham Shepper on "The Jew as Builder and Landlord"; Dr. Meyer Waxman on "The Present Position of Orthodox Judaism", with special emphasis on American conditions.

Dr. Henry Keller, a member of the editorial staff of The Jewish Forum, has enlisted for services in Palestine and is leaving with the Palestine Medical Unit. During his travels, Dr. Keller will send his impressions of the Orient and of Jewish conditions in Palestine to The Jewish Forum.

THE DROPSIE COLLEGE FOR HEBREW AND COGNATE LEARNING, PHILADELPHIA

The annual meeting of the Board of Governors of the Dropsie College was held on May 27.

The president's report showed that fifty students were in attendance during the year, that is from the summer term 1917 up to and including the spring term 1918 of whom thirty-seven were men and thirteen women, representing twenty-two institutions.

Four former students are now in the service: Lieutenant Harry S. Davidowitz, Chaplain-at-Large, Corporal Barnett Cohen, Isadore Schwarzman and Philip Landau. Isaac S. Feinstein, who had been library clerk for several years resigned to become one of the field workers of the Jewish Welfare Board.

Five hundred and nineteen volumes have been added to the library during the year; 149 through gift. Among the donors during the last quarter were the Pontificial-Bilical Institute at Rome, University of Upsala (Sweden), New York University, St. Louis University, College of the City of New York, University of Illinois, Muhlenberg College, Carnegie Foundation, American Bible Society, Smithsonian Institution, Misses Pollock, Prof. James A. Montgomery, Prof. Elihu Grant, Dr. K. Kohler, Rabbi Israel Goldfarb, Albert M. Hyamson of London, Dr. Harry Friedenwald, B. R. Robbins, Arthur A. Dembitz, Dr. Chas. Duschinsky of London, and the president of the College.

The total number of books in the library at the present time is 18,294.

The College possesses 225 manuscripts and twelve incunabula.

Prof. Margolis made an extended trip through the West and Southwest and delivered addresses before various Menorah Societies and Dr. Reider delivered lectures before the Menorah Societies of New York University and the University of Pittsburgh.

Reverend Powell H. Norton was reappointed Fellow in the Biblical Department, and Deborah M. Melamed, Fellow in the Department of Cognate Languages.

The hall was used by the Philadelphia branch of the Jewish Theological Seminary and the Jewish Publication Society for their annual meetings. Red Cross Auxiliary No. 172 continues to use the building for making surgical dressings on Tuesdays and Thursdays of each week.

Louis Gerstley and A. S. W. Rosenbach were re-elected governors for a period of three years. The following officers were re-elected for one year: President, Cyrus Adler; vice-president, Mayer Sulzberger; treasurer, Oscar B. Teller; secretary, Ephraim Lederer.

The summer term will extend from July 9 to Aug. 23. Among the courses given will be one in Hebrew Conversation by Prof. Malter, and in Historical Geography of Mesopotamia in the light of the present campaign by Dr. Hoschander.

THE FIGHTING JEW

Rights of the little nations have frequently been alluded to in President Wilson's official utterances.

We do not need to look farther than Holland and Belgium and Switzerland to see that the homeland is no less a homeland because it is small.

Somehow the very smallness of the little nation begets an intimacy which is reflected in a peculiarly strong attachment on the part of its people.

Judea is the little nation that was—and is to be. After nearly 2,000 years of dispersion and oppression the hearts of its people are thrilled today at the promise of its restoration. There is no more touching example of love of the home land; it is one of the strongest arguments for recognizing and protecting the rights of little nations.

Fired by the prospect of restoration, the descendants of the Old Judean stock are giving the lie to the tradition that the Jew will not fight. It is true that he has not been a fighting man because so many countries have denied him his rights as a citizen and human being; he had no opportunity or incentive to take up arms. But centuries of oppression have not broken his spirit; it is now responding to the call of the old homeland. Jewish battalions are already under arms; more are forming. There is a new Jew, the modern counterpart of such hardy fighters as Gideon and David and Judas Maccabaeus. The Zionist camel corps, wholly Jewish, has "showed itself fearless to a degree when under heavy fire" in recent operations around Jerusalem.

Yes, the Jew will fight. And his passionate devotion to the ancient homeland is one of the things before which kultur must stand confounded when it seeks to deny the rights of the little nation.—St. Paul Daily News.

OUR PART IN THE NATION'S TASK.

When the United States, over a year ago, declared war against Germany, though the steps leading to the final plunge succeeded each other swiftly, nonetheless the definitive decision had in it an element of suddenness. We had looked upon the struggle as a European concern; the government had mapped out for itself a course of neutrality in accordance with well-established international custom, and the President had expressly left the individual citizen free to take sides in an academic fashion with one or the other of the belligerents provided that no act was indulged in calculated to embroil the nation into a fight from which it sedulously strove to keep out. It is needless to hark back to the discussions and divisions antecedent to our entranec into the war. It is true, passions had been aroused which could not be allayed at a moment's notice; and leaders in and out of official life were short-sighted enough to misjudge the temper of the nation. But all that is a thing of the past now. We stand today a united nation grimly resolved to do our task speedily and effectively. No citizen need be troubled about what had been his position or leanings or sympathies. The supreme question is, Where do you stand today? And the answer cannot be but, On the side of the Stars and Stripes. All quibblings and all theorizings have been consigned to oblivion. The test of loyalty begins with our attitude today and not of yesterday. Never mind a few misguided pacifists or here and there an ignorant immigrant who had not yet learned the meaning of a free people rising to battle. As times go on, as day succeeds day, both classes of disturbers have learned a salutary lesson A few recalcitrant individuals, safe if needs be behind lock and bar, will not change the total aspect of a nation at one with its chief magistrate in the will to smite and to win out. We do not believe in shouting our patriotism from the housetops. Deeds are far more telling than protestations. The positive part which we Jews, a component portion of American citizenry, are taking in the nation's task is a test of which we have all reason to be proud. It is too early today to come before the public with figures and statistics. The data are being collected and will be shortly available. But even now we can tell that on our fighting force gathered together through the act of conscription, itself carried through the lofty patriotism and singular zeal of Julius Kahn, the men of Jewish persuasion constitute a percentage which rises above that of the Jewish population of the land. As the Hon. Walter M. Chandler, in a recent speech before the Town and Country Club at Washington, puts it:

"Of the general population of the country 10 per cent are capable of bearing arms, and 2 per cent are now actually under arms; that is, one-fifth of the possible levy is serving and four-fifths are not. But among the Jews of the United States only about 5 per cent are capable of bearing arms, and 2 per cent are already doing so. This means that while for the country at large only 20 per cent of the 'capables' are now in service, among the Jews fully 40 per cent have answered the call. The Jews of America have oversubscribed their allotment of man power by 100 per cent".

You meet Jews among the men and officers in all the camps. You meet them in the Aviation Corps. Khaki-clad Jewish youths are found in the officers' reserves. And the spirit that animates them all! Said many whom we have met throughout the country, we did not wait for the draft; we enlisted. And in the second line of defense you encounter the same whole-hearted willingness among men and women to give their time and their substance and their energy to the nation's cause. Think of all the drives, the Liberty Loan campaigns, the collections for the Red Cross, for Welfare Work in the service, and what not. Jewish men and Jewish women have given liberally, freely, unstintingly, the rich and the poor, those in high station and the meanest among the mean. And among the workers in house-to-house canvasses, in booths and stalls, on street corners, in railway stations, in public hostelries and office buildings, Jewish men and women have sought out the givers and wrested contributions from only too willing hands. Jewish sisterhoods, societies, council sections are teeming with busy workers admirably handled and efficiently organized. They are alive everywhere to the new devices. They all think nervously, yet clearly. New problems are propounded and new solutions are advanced. The scarcity of nurses is becoming alarming. Jewish women are lending their ear to the cry and many women of leisure and capacity are preparing to minister at the hospitals. Long before our own welfare work was started Jewish young men volunteered for work in Red Cross units and Young Men's Christian Associations. And our own Welfare work commands the services of volunteers all busy in steadying the men who will do the actual war service in the trenches and battle fields. Where, as in Columbus, O., and in several counties in the state of Pennsylvania, all the welfare forces of the country, as the Red Cross, the Christian associations, the Knights of Columbus, the various relief bodies, have pooled together for one general drive, Jews have been solicitors and givers. And how much have they given? They have trebled and quadrupled their former contributions to their own special relief agencies. And rightly so. In the face of the national task there should be neither Catholic nor Protestant, neither Jew nor Gentile. We are all Americans. We constitute the nation. The nation calls to all her sons alike. This is the time for unified, concentrated action. That alone begets enthusiasm, creates the morale which is the absolute condition of success. In Washington we find many Jews doing war work. Business men and professionals have relinquished their normal positions to serve the government, whether in the purchasing departments or in the ordnance departments, or at the right hand of the Secretary of War. Their names are known all over the country. Felix Frankfurter, director of all war labor; Albert Michelson, scientific adviser of the Army and Navy Departments; Leo S. Rowe, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury; A. C. Ratchesky, on the Board of Food Administration of Massachusetts; Louis E. Kirstein, charged with studying conditions in the government industry affecting the making of uniforms; Joseph Krauskopf, member of the Commission on Food Conservation Propaganda; Ferdinand Strauss, on board dealing with the prevention of social evils around military camps; Julius Rosenwald, chairman committee on supplies, Council of National Defense; Bernard Baruch, member of the same council; Julian W. Mack, who framed the soldiers' and sailors' allowance compensation and insurance act; Millard W. Mack, chairman of War Insurance Bureau in France; David A. Ellis, Fuel Administrator of Massachusetts; Albert Strauss, on the War Trade Board; Lee K. Frankel, member of executive committee for National Defense; Samuel J. Rosensohn, confidential assistant to the Secretary of War; Horace Stern, legal adviser in the Ordnance Department, and many more may readily be named.

The Jewish pulpit resounds with the call to national service. There is not a synagogue in this country that does not proudly wave its service flag with the shining stars pointing to so many boys valiantly battling for the nation. In all Jewish homes the soldier is befriended that the hardships of the training may be alleviated and that the high spirit of enthusiasm may be kept alive. And the Jewish press, whether in the English language or in a foreign tongue, is unanimously supporting the government in all of its efforts, disseminating intelligence, calling to sacrifice, kindling the flame of whole-hearted devotion to America and her allies. It is a record such as could not be otherwise, the record of the free Jew in free America, proud of the privilege of serving, without stint and without reservation, eagerly, willingly, thoughtfully, with brawn and brain, the old and the young, each according to his station, each ready to skimp and to suffer discomfort and privation that the resources of the land, to supply the needs of the fighting men whether in the American contingent or in the ranks of the allies, may be ample beyond peradventure, and all imbued with the seriousness of our task as a nation and the sacredness of the civic prerogative of doing our part therein with heart and soul and might.

And as we Jews of America have given and are giving daily and hourly proof of the love which unites us to this great country, and proud as we are of the privilege to do service in the national cause, even so it is a matter of satisfaction and pride that the Jews in the allied countries, long before they were joined by the United States, whether as soldiers in the ranks or as administrators and counselors, approved themselves as loyal, devoted and self-sacrificing citizens. And when the Jewish soldier of French or Belgian or Italian or English or American allegiance, along with his brothers in arms, meets the common foe, he will learn that the Jew of the Central Powers holds the same record for fidelity to the national cause. Whatever the bond that unites Jew to Jew, though the dying Jew of either camp surrenders his soul with the same religious profession, politically and as citizens we form distinct groups, everywhere we assume the responsibilities of devotion to state and country, everywhere we do our part in the task of the nation to which we belong.

THE DEEPENING OF FAITH.

Here and there the whisper is heard that the war is causing men to lose their faith in God. Can there be a holy and beneficent design in so much carnage, devastation, hatred? The economist of Malthusian persuasian and the biologist of Darwinian leanings may find verification for their theories of the incessant struggle and the ruthless necessity which trims population to the exigencies of the earth's feeding capacity, and the scientist and inventor may derive intellectual satisfaction from a long-range gun which does honor to exact mathematical calculation. But all that is small comfort to the ordinary mortal. And yet read the letters from the camps and cantonments and the trenches. Young boys, torn away from home, put to unwonted tasks, cast among strangers, are turning their thoughts to God. Life in our normal avocations is often a congeries of habits and conventionalities obstructing the path to that which is central. The soldier is brought face to face with realities. And so his eyes are opened to the great reality. Truth stands naked. And what is revealed? The innermost man. Yes, there is cunning there, and greed and lust; but also courage and devotion to duty and loving generosity. Man is not at all as bad as he is painted. Not the real man, far away from the make-believe of humdrum experience. When confronted with the supreme task, the true character is shown. Religion in all its depth comes home to us in a crisis, upon our high days of joy or grief. When Death knocks at the door, the shallow experiences count for naught; from the depths of our soul there come to our remembrance the few great events of our life, the few really great emotions. We are gripped by the great reality. We willingly commit our souls to the source of reality, to Him who is. His recognition of service well done counts, the reward which no earthly kind or ruler can bestow. Life in its core is a grim business. When in the hour of trial the sentimental embellishments are brushed off, we find indeed comfort in the thought that the Power that presides over the destinies of men and nations is the stern Judge who cannot be swayed from His world purpose. And so we resign ourselves into His keeping, not in despair, but in the spirit of deepened faith of which the heroic surrender to reality is the sole true gauge.

PUNISH SEDITION.

When the Lord caused the earth to open her mouth and swallow Korah, Dathan and Albirim, because they were guilty of sedition, some of their kin were saved, for we find names of a son and grandson of Korah recorded in the 9th Chapter of the Chronicles. We also find a few of their descendants scattered in this land. There are but few of them; they are easily recognized by characteristics for which their ancestor was punished.

Before a candidate for admission to the Order is accepted, he is told that the aims and objects of the Order are to unite Israelites in the work of promoting their highest interest and those of humanity; of inculcating the highest principles of philanthropy, honor and patriotism; alleviating the wants of the poor and needy; coming to the rescue of victims of persecution, and providing for, protecting and assisting the widows and orphans on the broadest principle of humanity. Each candidate before being accepted as a member promises to do his duty in that regard. But blood will tell. Korah's descendants do not keep their promise. They try to bring dissension and discord within the Order by belittling the efforts and aims of the Order; by trying to undermine its usefulness in order to ingratiate themselves with the leaders of some other organization, or avenging themselves for failure to attain prominent positions in the Order to which they had aspired, but for which, owing to their character and lack of ability they are not fitted. Those who so act, especially in these trying times, should be placed on trial for sedition and expelled. We ought not to permit enemies within our ranks.

LEHMAN AARONS.

The Jewish community of Milwaukee sustained a severe loss in the demise of one of its most active and prominent members, Lehman Aarons, who has been a resident of that city for almost half a century. Mr. Aarons was a man of rare gentleness, a liberal giver to all worthy causes, an active member of the B'nai B'rith and an unselfish worker in congregational affairs. Mr. Aarons was a gentleman in the best sense of the term, and his demise will be sincerely mourned by a large host of friends. The deceased left a widow and six children, among them Charles L. Aarons, Past President of District Grand Lodge No. 6.

MICHAEL FRANKEL.

Mr. Michael Frankel, a resident of St. Paul for the past thirty years, died on May 8, 1918. Mr. Frankel was prominently identified in all Jewish affairs of his home city and was well known in the business communities of the Twin Cities. He was a devoted member of the Order and held many offices in his home lodge. He was a good Jew and a good citizen and a gentleman in the best sense of the term, and his death is sincerely mourned by his many friends. The deceased left a widow and three children, among them Hiram D. Frankel, at present first vice-president of District Grand Lodge No. 6, I. O. B. B.

COMMUNICATED.

Louisville, Ky., May 15, 1918.

The Editor B'nai B'rith News.

Dear Sir: I readily concede that it is easier to be a critic than to be a successful practical reformer. Yet in the face of this truth I cannot forego the duty as I conceive it of calling attention to the fact that many of our most effective writers for the press who mold public opinion—Jewish opinion, if you please—thoughtlessly and inaptly use the term "Jewish soldier", thereby, in my opinion, doing violence to that which our modern American Jews prize highest and which with the best that is in them aim to keep untarnished—their unalloyed American citizenship!

"Jewish soldiers" in America are unthinkable. American soldiers of the Jewish faith is what is meant. No one speaks of Presbyterian soldiers or Methodist soldiers or Catholic soldiers.

When one speaks of a French soldier, or an English soldier, or an American soldier, the cause he serves is known. There are Jews in every arm now in the conflict. He fights for the land where he finds his home To speak of a Jewish soldier does not indicate the flag he supports. The description manifestly requires further explanation.

How would it sound, my dear Mr. Editor, if you would write of a Jewish general commanding an American brigade or a Jewish colonel at the head of an American regiment?

I am the proud father of two sons, each of whom, beyond draft age, left wife and children and important place and station in life to serve our country. Is it fair to call them "Jewish soldiers"? My sons are representatives of thousands of their co-religionists, as noble and patriotic Americans as ever drew breath. They feel deeply the debt they owe their fatherland, and if needs be, are willing to sacrifice their lives and their fortunes to repay it.

For the American Jewish press, though merely by careless form of expression, to stamp our boys as "Jewish soldiers", in my humble opinion, is a blunder, which, as has been well said, often is worse than a crime.

When the war will have ended we hope to live in a recreated world. The slate will be wiped clean of many prejudices and many wrongs. Our people, in common with many others, will be the beneficiaries in many ways. It is up to us to prepare for that day and get ready to face the refulgent rays of the new sun.

One of the chief acts that you and your co-laborers of the press should do is to cease stamping us in our secular relations as a peculiar people, differing in hopes, aspiration and vision from those of our fellow-citizens.

Sincerely,
ISAAC W. BERNHEIM.

JEWS AS CIVILIAN AIDS OF PERSHING.

Official reports from France show that an extraordinarily large percentage of Commissioned Officers with Pershing's army in France, who are specialists in various capacities, are Washington Jewish young men, many of whom had been active in local Jewish affairs. They are being retained by Pershing as civilian aids, rather than as combatants. Among them are I. Burt Lazarus, Solomon Gluck, Joe Stein, M. B. Rosenthal, L. Spiegler and others.

MORTIMER SCHIFF HONORED BY RUMANIAN GOVERNMENT.

News has reached Washington, through the Rumanian Legation, that Mortimer L. Schiff, of New York, was chosen honorary president of the Boy Scouts of Rumania. The Legation points with satisfaction to this high honor bestowed upon a Jew by the Rumanian Government. It may mean the beginning of a new era in the relations between Rumania and the Jews.

ROUMANIAN JEWS ASK AMERICAN INTERVENTION.

Zionists Asked to Present Wilson Facts Concerning New Jewish Legislation Contemplated in Roumania, Which They Fear Will Deprive Them of Their Few Remaining Rights in That Country.

The Jews of Roumania have cabled a request to the Provisional Zionist Committee to immediately petition President Wilson to bring his influence to bear against the enactment by the Parliament which will be convoked in June of contemplated laws which they say will result in depriving them of the few remaining rights which are still left to them in that country.

The proposed laws provide that naturalization shall be denied to any person, both of whose parents have not been born in Roumania. The Jews of Roumania point out that there were no vital statistics gathered in that country before 1866, and that even those that cover the period from that year to 1880 are still very defective. A number of lists were destroyed during the German invasion a year ago. All of these facts will conspire to prevent at least two thirds of the Jews of Roumania from receiving naturalization papers.

The proposed laws purport to give equality of rights to those Jews who were mobilized during the war. Restricting civil equality to only such Jews as were mobilized, will bar from the enjoyment of that privilege thousands of Jews who were legally exempted from military service, and such Jews whose physical condition or occupation excluded them from the army.

The despatch from the Jews of Roumania says:

"It is the holy duty of all civilized nations and governments to exert their full authority and influence upon Roumania to compel the Government to recognize the most primitive human rights, and to grant naturalization to all Roumanian Jews who are not foreign subjects".

THE NATIONAL DEMANDS OF THE AUSTRIAN JEWRY.

The Promise of the Government.

The Jewish Press Bureau in Stockholm communicates from Vienna:

A Jewish delegation consisting of Messrs. Dr. P. Straucher, Dr. Ad. Stand and B. Stricker—members of the Austrian Parliament—had lately had several conferences with Prime Minister Zeidler and Minister of the Interior Toggenberg on the Jewish question in Austria. The delegation, which represents the Zionist and nationalist wings of the Austrian Jewry, laid down before the government the claims of the Jews in connection with the coming constitutional reorganization of the Austrian empire. The Prime Minister gave his promise to support as much as possible the demand of the Jews.

The memorandum handed to him by the delegation brings forward the following program:

1. The acknowledgment of the Jewish nationality and the liberty of belonging to that nationality.
2. The rights of the Jews to have their own schools and to give their children an education in the Jewish spirit.
3. Representation of the Jews according to their numbers in the Reischrat, in the Landtags and the local self-administrations. As a means to it, the establishment of Jewish electoral curias and the adoption of the proportional system.
4. The Jews to be represented in the government through a special Secretary of State.
5. The immediate actual emancipation of the Jews in Austria according to the provisions of the constitution.
6. The organization of a Jewish Nationality through the creation of a Jewish National Chamber on the basis of general equal direct, secret suffrage.
7. The creation of a system of religious Jewish institutions through the establishment of a Union of Communes.

FIVE MORE JEWS IN THE POLISH PARLIAMENT.

Five more Jews were appointed to sit in the Polish Parliament. They are Rabbi Perlmutter, Nathanson, Eger, PPfeffer and Wagmeister. Nathanson is the same one against whose appointment to the city council many Jews protested recently in vain. Wagmeister is the leader of the Hasidic party. The three Jews formerly appointed are Prilutzky, Rosenblatt and Weissblatt.

ANOTHER JEW GENERAL IN FRANCE.

Colonel P. S. Grumbach, of the Infantry, has been promoted Brigadier-General. He is the sixth Jew in France who has been raised to the rank of General since the beginning of the war.

ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE

We meet with many attempts on the part of authors to slander the Jew, but at no time have we met with such a determined, systematic attempt to revile the Jew as we find in the articles written by Miss Olga von Marx, so called "Germany's Greatest Woman Spy". The story appears in installments in some of the leading newspapers in the country. Each installment seems to outdo the previous one in its attack upon the Jews. In the 29th installment Miss von Marx digresses enough to devote a large part of her article to an attack upon the Jews. The Anti-Defamation League succeeded in having the article withdrawn from publication in some of the papers carrying the story. Another paper, "The Davenport Democrat", not only discontinued the installments of the story, but saw fit to write the following editorial:

"Finis" for Miss Olga von Marx.

The Democrat, of course, does not accept responsibility for the opinions of outside contributors to its columns. Writers like John Balderston, Private Peat, Tom Marshall or Olga von Marx are conceded the right to have opinions of their own, but The Democrat has the privilege of disagreeing with them. It takes this opportunity of doing so most emphatically, in connection with statements which intruded into the narrative of Miss Marx, as published in Thursday's Democrat. And because they were so unfair and uncalled for, and utterly at variance with American sentiment both past and present, the publication of Miss Marx's memoirs has been discontinued and they will not be concluded in these columns.

Those who have been reading them will have noted that Miss Marx indulged, at this point, in abuse of the Jews as a people, asserting that because of their persecutions in Russia they had given that country a reputation which was not born out by the facts. Her further comments on the Jew were so unwarranted that it became evident that Miss Marx represented the class which, in Germany as well as Russia, has been behind the vicious anti-Semitic propaganda which has no place in America nor in the columns of The Democrat.

When her memoirs were bought by this paper they were incomplete. A reading of the first few installments showed their interesting nature. They came with the endorsement of a news bureau which would naturally have led to their acceptance without question. So their publication was commenced, and her objectionable utterances in a belated installment found their way into these columns by one of those regrettable oversights which could not have occurred in normal times, but which under the shortage of help and high pressure of these times will not be hard for the reader who is similarly embarrassed to understand.

The Democrat is glad to record here, as it has done from time to time in the past, its appreciation of the loyal and patriotic spirit of the American Jews. No people in this country are doing more for their suffering brethren in foreign lands, or to hold up the hands of the government in this country, than are they. They have not stinted in their giving, and the gifts of some of the more wealthy of them have been in millions. No movement such as those that they have suffered from in Europe could ever make progress in this country, nor should it have a spokesman here. Miss Marx, therefore, is dropped from the staff of Democrat contributors".

In a recent issue the News carried a story of an offensive song which was withdrawn from publication. Another song has appeared, and the League is happy to report that it has met with the same success in withdrawing it from publication. The W. A. Quincke Co. of Los Angeles published a song entitled "Yiddisha Army Blues," which spoke in no complimentary terms of the Jewish soldiers. The matter was taken up through our representative in Los Angeles, Maurice Salzman. Brother Salzman sent the following wire:

"One thousand professional copies beyond recall, two thousand others printed, one thousand distributed for sale California only; possibly three-quarters sold; those unsold to be immediately recalled and destroyed, together with remaining one thousand copies. Author and publisher here regret incident; acted courteously. If not satisfactory, advise".

The following reply was received by one of our representatives who addressed a letter to the Hearst Publiishing Co. protesting against an expression used in an article appearing in the June number of "Good Housekeeping":

"Your favor of June 3rd, addressed to Mr. Hearst, has been handed to me for reply.

"The magazines and newspapers published by Mr. Hearst have worked hard for years to discredit such expressions as the one to which you refer, and it really seems quite remarkable that a blunder of this kind could be made in our editorial department.

"However, I hope that you are familiar with our firmly established editorial attitude regarding this matter, and will therefore realize that this is simply a mistake which we regret very much indeed.

"I certainly desire to thank you very much for calling our attention to this regrettable blunder, and with best wishes, remain,

"Yours very truly,
"JOS. A. MOORE,
"Vice-President."

The Oakland Post carried an article referring to a neighborhood row between Sixth and Market St. Jews. The matter was called to the attention of the editors, who published the following apology:

Post Apologizes to Members of Jewish Faith for Blunder.

The editor of a daily has an unenviable role in life to play. He must be responsible not only for his own acts, but is held accountable by the public for all the mistakes made by others on the staff of his paper. In the old days the editor was "THE STAFF." He saw every line that went into the paper because he wrote every line, usually set the type and then read and corrected the proof.

The head of a modern daily newspaper is fortunate if he finds an opportunity to read his own paper even after it is printed. He cannot hope to see all that goes into its columns during the rush hours. And often he grieves as he later finds blunders and realizes that injustice has been done innocent persons through no fault of his own.

The editor of The Post went through such an experience late yesterday afternoon when he say a story on page one printed under the heading, "POLICE QUELL COURTROOM RIOT". The opening paragraph was like this: "A neighborhood row between Sixth and Market St. Jews was continued", etc.

The editor immediately started an investigation to place responsibility for this inexcusable insult to members of a great faith. He here wishes to apologize on the part of The Post for the blunder, and give assurance that such an injustice will not be repeated.

There was no more excuse for referring to these men in police court as "Jews" than there would have been for designating them as a "bunch of Catholics", or a "gang of Methodists", or a "crowd of Baptists", had they been affiliated with any of those religions.

War has caused a scarcity of everything in America but "ivory". There is an abundance of that left where brains are supposed to exist.

Newspapers often suffer because of this, for many of America's best newspapermen are now handling machine guns instead of typewriters. For this reason we ask our friends of the Jewish faith to overlook this plain injustice, assuring them that it was absolutely contrary to the policy of The Post.

EDWARD A. VANDEVENTER,
Editor and Publisher.

HORRIFYING JEWISH POGROMS IN TURKESTAN.

The Jewish Press Bureau in Stockholm reports the following communication from Petrograd:

News comes from Turkestan about cruel pogroms which have taken place there. In Kokand 300 Jews were murdered and thousands plundered, and assailing and plundering of Jews is reported upon from many other smaller places of Turkestan. In Samarkand one expects that a most horrible pogrom may break out at every moment. The Minister of Finance of the Turkestan republic, Mr. Herzfield, who also was the representative of the Zionist District Committee, was murdered in the most bestial way. The Jews of the whole country are driven into despair. Relief committees for the victims of the excesses are being formed.

In many localities of the Ukraine Jewish pogroms have taken place.

In the town Gluchow almost the entire Jewish population was put to death.

A MILLION AND A QUARTER FOR HUNGARIAN WAR ORPHANS.

The Director of the Budapest Hungarian Commercial Bank, Herr Leo Lunshi, in honor of his fiftieth birthday, has given a million and a quarter kronen for the establishment of a Sanatorium for Hungarian War Orphans.

BROTHERLY LOVE in ACTION

By OSCAR LEONARD

(Being the report of the Chairman of the Social Service Committee. District No. 2, I. O. B. B.)

Delivered at the convention of District No. 2, I. O. B. B., Akron, Ohio, May 27, 1918.

The greatest job in social service which interests us all at this time is to win the war which will make this world a safe place in which to live. It is a stupendous piece of service in which men and women are willing to pay the last measure of devotion that future generations may see the fulfillment of the dreams of the prophets. When one reads the words of our President, who like a seer sends forth message after message from Washington, one has a feeling as if the Hebrew prophets speak again to a world which languishes for their message. This war is of particular interest to us Jews because it is for the ideals of our prophets that the truly civilized part of humanity is fighting. Making the world safe for democracy, wiping war forever from this earth, hailing the new day, these are some of the better known ideals enunciated by President Wilson. They are ideals enunciated by Hebrew prophets and translated into modern terms by the man who sees the dawn of a new order.

Engaged as we are in this important venture, it appears rather futile at times to devote ourselves to the sort of service to which our Social Service Committee is committed. When thousands fall on the battlefield of Europe we are told that it is no time to try to save a wreck here or there. Yet, because men give their lives by the hundred thousand, human life becomes more precious and personal service acquires a new meaning. It is for this reason that we did not dare slack up our work. Furthermore, Europe has found that with the withdrawal of millions of men from civil life, a new problem of juvenile delinquency was brought about. The fathers were away. Homes were broken. It is the experience everywhere that the vast majority of all delinquency cases handled by juvenile courts come from broken homes.

The increasing cost of living, with its attendant malnutrition, the sudden changes of little towns into large industrial centers, the danger of overcrowding, of letting down of the bars, of large masses of men taken from their usual home influences, have made necessary wider and newer forms of social service. The B'nai B'rith has seen its duty and has engaged in welfare work for our Jewish soldiers. At first it appeared as if your Social Service Committee would have to help in this work. The chairman of the committee was ordered to Chicago to confer with the office of the Order, and certain plans were made. Subsequently as you know the work was merged with the Welfare Board.

Your Social Service Committee devoted itself to its usual work and attempted some newer activities. Our lodges were urged to create social service committees where there were none before. Attempts were made to strengthen the existing committees. Where possible emphasis was laid on work with boys so as to prevent a possible increase in juvenile delinquency. In Colorado, for instance, through Denver Lodge, No. 171, Big Brother work is carried on. Boy Scout work, social settlement activities, and similar constructive and preventive measures are carried on. The boys who have gotten into trouble are visited regularly in the state industrial school, helping the boys feel that they have friends ready to assist them in their efforts at leading better lives. In Toledo, the Big Brothers in addition to the usual work of furnishing recreations to the boys, went into more fundamental work. Finding that street vending makes for delinquency there, as everywhere else, they interested a number of civic organizations in an ordinance regulating street vending for children. After a bitter fight to have the ordinance passed, they unfortunately failed. They are determined, however, not to rest until an ordinance to this effect is enacted in their city. Let me urge other social service committees of our lodges to follow the example set by Toledo.

In St. Louis our two B'nai B'rith lodges in co-operation with the Jewish Educational Alliance conduct gymnasium clubs for boys and also look after the Big Brother work. We have lost a number of our best big brothers by enlistment and draft. Let me say that most of them enlisted voluntarily and are now officers in the American army.

Similar work is being done by our lodges all over the district, even though many have been too modest to send their reports to our office when we requested same. We do wish all lodges would report their work.

The problem of Jewish inmates in state eleemosynary and penal institutions has occupied the attention of your committee again and we have wrestled with the proposition of arranging for systematic visits where such visits are not made now. In places like Columbus, O., where Brother Jashcnowsky conducts services regularly in the penitentiary, or where Brothers Mayer and Goldbarth are regular visitors of the boys' Indus trial School, the problem is easily settled. These brothers' sacrifice of their time and means that they may bring sunshine into the lives of our unfortunate brethren. They deserve our gratitude.

In the Federal Prison in Leavenworth services are conducted regularly. It is an orthodox service, too. I never could have pictured to myself the service had I not taken part in one this month. I visited this prison in company of Brothers Abeles and Rosenfield of Leavenworth. On every hand I heard praise for Brother Abeles, who has seen to it not only that the prisoners have services, but that they have a regular synagogue. When I entered the library room where the services are conducted, I found an Ark of the Thorah and a Thorah. Everything was arranged like a regular synagogue. One of the men took the part of the "chazan" and while wearing his "talis" sang out the prayers in Hebrew. The congregation responded after the good old Orthodox fashion. It was a Shebuoth service, which was concluded with an address by your chairman. When the service was over, I interviewed the men personally, listening to their stories, and promising a number of them little services I could render. I assured them they could write to me and our committee would help them when possible. I pledged them our assistance after they leave the penitentiary.

I know there are those who look down upon the prisoners, feeling they get what they deserve. The fact remains, however, that whatever may be said about personal guilt there are social causes leading to crime.

> What do we know of life,
>   We who are housed and fed,
> What do we know of strife
>   Who are so gently led?
> Have we dwelt in the slime
>   Of Poverty's abode?
> Have we walked with the crime
>   Engendered by its load?
> Oh, have we ever known
>   Days of eternal care?
> When Hope is turned to stone
>   And broken by Despair?
> Or have we ever raced
>   And won and lost again?
> And have then with failure faced
>   The cruelty of men?

Every time I visit a penal institution I cannot help feeling that many of the men there have probably fought hard not to succumb, but failed because of some personal weakness or untoward circumstances. One of the men in Leavenworth prison in making the response of his comrades to my address, said: "Many of us are here because we took chances, as do other men. We failed, so we are here. Had we succeeded we would have been rich and respected. Men would have looked up to us and we would have had honors showered upon us by our communities". The man who spoke is a college man of good family. He is determined to make good when he leaves the house of bondage.

The men we find in these penal institutions are not all low-grade individuals. I came across an instance in our own state. I received a letter from our City Jail asking me to call. The letter was in a beautiful hand writing and was couched in fine English. When I visited I found a man of unusually fine manners and refinement. I learned that Mr. Davisky, as we shall call him here, was born and reared in England. Comes of fine family. Is a college man, having studied at Oxford, and is an engineer by profession. Investigation proved that we could not prevent his going to the penitentiary. I saw him next when I visited the Missouri penitentiary. He had not told the other Jewish inmates that he was one of us. I asked for him and found that he had posed as a non-Jew. He was at work in a little office fitted up for him by the prison officials, making plans for work in connection with the prison.

A few months later I read that "Count Davisky" had been paroled and placed in charge of building a large factory building for the state. He is now at work earning a salary and serving the state.

There are times when persons guilty of crime learn for themselves that the "game" does not pay. Men have told me that time and again. Here are the words of one of the boys as written to Brother Rothbarth: "Please except this letter as an apology for not writing sooner. When I left Lancaster I left with the determination of doing the most damage as possible and stealing as much as I could lay my hands upon, not caring what becomes of me or of the circumstances I would be in. I was out of Lancaster but four days when I broke my parole, but for a fight between a policeman and myself. I got away from him before he got me to a police station. I then left home and met a Lawrence D., who is at present at Lancaster, and him and I broke in and robbed houses and stores both in Chicago and Cleveland. When we went to Chicago we had over a hundred dollars and didn't stay there over 25 minutes, when I went into a store and bought a pair of shoes, after which I had just five cents in my pocket. I came outside but could not find D. So I bummed around Chicago and St. Louis four days and caught a train back to Chicago, and left Chicago for Cleveland without a cent in my pocket and it was 14 below zero.

I rode to Cleveland on the 20th Century Limited, hanging between the second and third cars until I got to Cleveland, just seven hours and twenty minutes, and I was nearly frozen. I went to the L. N. Bldg., a newspaper office, where D. and I had our headquarters and where all the bums and crooks have theirs, and the first thing I saw in a paper was the notice of the arrest of Lawrence Dinn and Frank Kegan. When he got arrested he told the police I was with him, and they went to Chicago after me. Well, I soon got another partner and we kept up the good work until we had a gang formed of sixteen first-class crooks. Well, to make a long story short, four are in Lancaster today, nine are in the Reformatory at Mansfield, and three was in the workhouse but are out now.

How I ever got off so easy, I don't know, but I got 30 days in the workhouse and I got out in 26. While at the workhouse I met N. R. and A. W. Us three were the lucky ones to get sent there while the rest are taking hell at Mansfield for two years and at Lancaster for about one and a half years. So, Mr. Rothbardt, I have at last found out that the crooked work does no good. I have worked hard every day since I got out of the workhouse, May 26, and I never felt better in my life when I draw my pay every 5th and 20th of each month, and my mother can tell you how she feels now that I am staying at home every night and working every day. Give my regards to all the boys, and for God's sake preach to them and tell them, explain to them that it is hell, that there is no place like home, and a man will never feel better than when he gets home at night after a hard day's work and can find a good supper waiting for him. Give my regards to all the boys and write soon. Your friend".

During the year the social service committee, in accord with the decision at the last convention, held a meeting. At the invitation of our president, the meeting was held in his home city, Indianapolis. In addition to your chairman there were present Brothers Mayers of Columbus, Strull of Louisville, Kaufman of Indianapolis, Alfred Benesch of Cleveland, Kussowrm of Dayton, representing the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League, Brother Biccard, and last but by no means least, our beloved president, Brother Borinstein, who with his good wife were most gracious hosts of the committee.

After earnest discussion of the problems before the committee, it was decided that a survey of the Jewish population in eleemosynary and penal institutions in our district be made. This the chairman did in co-operation with the state chairman. We found that in the 80 institutions which responded there is a total population of 64,456, of these 625 are Jewish inmates,—less than 1 per cent. Ohio has the largest institutional problem in our District, its institutional inmates totaling 23,633. with a Jewish population of 321. New Mexico has only two Jewish inmates in its penitentiary and none in the other institutions.

Wherever there are as many as ten Jewish inmates in an institution, penal or otherwise, it is the judgment of our committee that these inmates should be visited at regular intervals. In case of penal institutions there should be regular visits and religious services. It is one way of making our unfortunate people feel that they do have friends in the outside world when they have paid their price for their offenses they will find the hand of fellowship waiting for them and ready to help struggle out of the mire into which they had sunk.

Your committee found that our national institutions, like the two Denver hospitals for consumptives, the Leo Levy Memorial, the Jewish Orphan Asylum in Cleveland, could do more effective work with the aid of our Social Service Committee. We found that while the after care of those coming from these institutions is good in large cities, it may not be so in smaller centers. We arranged with these institutions to notify the office of your chairman every time an inmate is ready to be sent home. If the inmate goes to a large center where there is a regularly organized Jewish social agency, we know that proper after care will be given. In other cases we arrange for such after care, either through the local lodge or the nearest Jewish Social Service agency.

Your committee also urged lodges to suggest institutions that may be needed in particular localities in the District, so that our lodges may take the lead in their establishment where desirable and practical. We hope our lodges will bear this is mind. There is a great deal of service that we can and must render. We must not rest on our laurels. Our Order has justified its existence in the wonderful work that it has done in the past. The national institutions it has created are a credit to it. I hope they are not monuments. For our Order is not ready for monuments. It is alive and ready to continue to build.

It is the hope of the Committee that this convention will make the necessary appropriations so that prayer books, Bibles for Jewish boys may be provided in connection with our work in state institutions. Also that necessary traveling expenses be provided for regular visits to these institutions. Brother Kaufman of our committee suggests that state chairmen, or their co-workers, acquaint themselves with the inmates of those institutions and see what relatives may be interested in them, or befriend them, where there are no other friends. He also suggests that visiting be done at least six times a year, or every two months, and that all work be done in co-operation with existing agencies.

The Committee would respectfully suggest that appropriations for such work should be made not only by the District, but should be shared by the local lodges. After all the lodges in the respective states have certain responsibilities toward the unfortunates in their own vicinity. An arrangement whereby the District will appropriate as much as the combined lodges in the state should prove satisfactory. Except in case of Kansas where two federal prisons are located. In this case a special appropriation should be made by the District.

May I take the liberty of urging lodges in the District to send regular reports of their work. We have received reports from only half a dozen lodges in the entire District in the past year. Next in importance to doing the work comes that of reporting work done.

Your committee has a feeling that what it has done during the year is merely to study the problem and to indicate what may be done in the future. While we are engaged in a great war it is rather difficult to center attention in social service problems. Men who usually give their time to such efforts are now busy helping the Government. That is as it should be. As usual, our people are in the forefront of the working army which is holding the home trenches and keeping the home fire burning. We must realize more than ever that in days like these no one has a right to leisure. Millions of men are in the trenches working 24 hours a day, without rest and without food. We at home must match their devotion in serving those whom they left behind, those for whom they are ready to lay down their precious lives. These are the purposes of the B'nai B'rith as I understand them. If I could picture the B'nai B'rith as one man giving utterances to its ideals, I am sure this utterance would run somewhat as follows:

> "I want to build castles for children;
>   Airy castles in fairy skies.
>   I want to trade a stock of laughs
>   In exchange for woeful sighs.
>   I want to bring health to faces,
>   I want to make dull eyes shine;
>   With every day heaven to look at
>   And the practice of creeds devine.
> "I want to be 'square' to the underworld
>   And even a dog that is down.
>   I'd rather be a painter of smiles
>   Than to carve a gruesome frown.
>   Sit down by my bungalow
>   And we will enjoy the sky.
>   For brothers and sisters and pals of woe
>   You're just as immortal as I".

The Jewish Welfare Board: Its Work and Its Opportunity

Prepared for the National Conference of Jewish Charities, Kansas City, Mo., May 12-15, 1918, by Chester Jacob Teller, Executive Director Jewish Welfare Board

Primarily, the purpose of the Jewish Welfare Board is to help America win the war. Despite the basic American principle of a separate church and state, or, to be more exact, because of it, the American government in the first days of the war saw the necessity of calling into co-operation with it certain sectarian welfare agencies. It sought this co-operation because it recognized the value of morale in warfare and it knew how close was the relationship between morale and modern community ways of life. With a breadth of view and a degree of foresight perhaps never before equaled by any war administration of any other country, the government set itself to thinking out the war problems not only in terms of ships, guns, munitions and supplies. Health, decency, personal improvement of the men, contentment, esprit, all those elements that go to make up the concept of morale in its broadest implications—these, too, received the closest study and the most thorough-going application.

A special Commission on Training Camp Activities was created as a branch of the War Department, charged with the specific duties of making life in the new American camps and in the communities adjoining camps as normal as conditions of actual war and the problems of an unprecedented national emergency would permit. This commission sought to utilize the potential social resources of the country and it early brought to bear on the problem the whole strength of the Young Men's Christian Association, with its nation-wide organization so thoroughly alive to the needs of young men and so perfectly adapted to the nation's new work.

In the same spirit and for the same purposes the War Department, through this special Training Camp Commission—the Fosdick Commission, as it has come to be known—invited the large Catholic group in America to participate in the national welfare program, with the result that the Knights of Columbus was nominated by the Catholic Church and accepted by the American government as the authoritative Catholic agency for war purposes.

The selection of the third agency to represent what might be considered the third largest sectarian group in America, namely, the Jewish group, was fraught with new difficulties. It is a commentary upon Jewish life in America, and particularly upon its work of national organization and management, that with 260 years of history behind it, and with literally thousands of organizations, no single agency could be selected as representative of the organized Jewry of America. True, one or two of them seemed to have some special claim to such recognition, but by reason of their limited constitution or platform, or other reason, they failed to secure the indorsement of Jewry as a whole. The result was a meeting of representatives of some ten or more national Jewish organizations, at which it was decided that each organization present delegate certain power to a new agency. This was the beginning of the new organization which has since become known as the Jewish Welfare Board, and which early obtained the official recognition of the government, and, indeed, its mandate to contribute on behalf of the Jews of America to the national work of welfare among the nation's uniformed men.

As the officially recognized agency of the War Department and the Commission on Training Camp Activities, the Welfare Board has been called to undertake high tasks and responsibilities. It has been charged with the nomination and selection of the Jewish welfare workers in the camps and cantonments of this country and in the trenches and rest camps abroad. In these increasingly critical times, no task could be more exacting. The initial selection of the men, however, is but part of it. It is necessary that they be carefully apprised of their duties as quasi-public officials, that they know thoroughly their relation to the government, to its military establishment, to the Commission on Training Camp Activities and to the welfare agencies with which we have joined hands, namely the Y. M. C. A. and the K. of C. They must know the meaning of democracy in the American camp. They must know what Americanization comprises and what it is not. They must be inspired with the ideal of an army and navy selected from all races and creeds, to fight for the liberties of all peoples and the rights of all religions, under our flag and those of our allies. Our welfare workers must be trained to interpret these things to the soldiers and sailors, to bring group closer to group, and all men into clearer understanding of America's ideals and aims in this war. The welfare agencies are not invited to do separatist work. They are asked to join hands in fostering and promoting a joint welfare program.

As its contribution to this program, the Jewish Welfare Board has placed 120 workers in the American camps, and has sent in addition countless others—volunteers, who, as occasional or regular visitors in the camps, have preached the message of religion, have assisted in other ways at religious services, visited the sick in the hospitals, the men in difficulty in the guard houses, entertained men in groups and cheered and comforted them individually.

As its contribution to the physical resources of the camps, the Welfare Board is erecting sixteen buildings, not to overlap, not to duplicate, but to supplement the facilities created by other agencies, where such facilities were needed, either for the housing of our workers and the administration of their work, or for the general welfare needs of Jews and non-Jews alike. At Camp Upton, near New York, the Jewish Welfare Building, recently completed, is used as a service building by soldiers of every faith and national group. On the other hand, the Welfare Board makes use of a general church headquarters erected by the General War-Time Commission on the Churches, to the upkeep of which it contributes substantially.

We have assisted the American Library Association in its nation-wide campaign for books. We have encouraged the giving of comforts and gifts to the soldiers and sailors, regardless of creed. To draw creedal distinctions would be to violate the very ethics of the democracy we cherish. As official representatives of the government, we are called to minister to all men.

This is by no means to imply that sectarian work has no place in the American welfare program, or that the welfare agencies must reduce their efforts to that colorless, meaningless something which frequently goes by the name of non-sectarianism. On the contrary, the Jewish Welfare Board would not truly represent the American government unless it also represented the organized Jewry which created it. Indeed, these specialized ministrations of each group to its own men in the camps are implied in the very organization which the War Department created with the help of the commission on Training Camp Activities and the welfare agencies.

Thanks to this large view on the part of the government, we have in the Welfare Board for the first time in the history of America, an organization which not only has the official endorsement of the government, but, likewise, of organized American Jewry. What with those Jewish organizations that originally created the board, and such as have affiliated with it since its inception, the board counts among its affiliated societies today no less than fourteen, among which are the Agudath Ha-Rabbonim, Central Conference of American Rabbis, Council of Jewish Women, Council of Young Men's Hebrew and Kindred Association, Independent Order B'nai B'rith, Independent Order B'rith Abraham, Jewish Chautauqua Society, Jewish Publication Society of America, National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods, New York Board of Jewish Ministers, Order B'rith Abraham, Union of America, Hebrew Congregations, Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations and the United Synagogue of America.

The relationship between the board and its parent bodies, is for the most part steady and constructive. The rabbinical bodies have co-operated in the arrangement of an abridged text of the Prayer Book for the use of soldiers and sailors of our faith. Another constituent society, the Jewish Publication Society of America, acts as the publishing agency of the board, which has thus far placed orders with it for the publication of no less than eighty thousand of the Abridged Prayer Books and sixty thousand additional books, containing selections from the Scripture Readings, arranged with the help of the society's editors.

With the Agudath Ha-Rabbonim (the Federation of Orthodox Rabbis) the Welfare Board has been active in an inquiry as to the demand for Kosher food of the Jewish men in the camps and governmental sanction has been secured for the sale of Kosher non-perishable food products in the camps and cantonments wherever warranted by the demand.

A series of circuits for the conduct of lecture courses to soldiers and sailors throughout the spring and summer months is being arranged under the joint auspices of the Welfare Board and the Jewish Chautauqua Society.

To the town or community program of the Welfare Board, substantial contributions have been made by the Independent Order B'nai B'rith, which has organized some eight or nine community centers now operating as I. O. B. B. branches of the Welfare Board. While these branches of themselves constitute a material donation to our total assets, the I. O. B. B. as well as the Independent Order B'rith Abraham and other national Jewish fraternities are rendering large services of another kind through the campaigns for funds which they have furthered throughout their lodges and the moral backing and encouragement which they have lent from the beginning in unstinted measure.

The Young Men's Hebrew and Kindred Associations has acted as our special advisory body wherever we have needed the viewpoint of the specialist in the inauguration of soldier activities in conjunction with Y. M. H. A. work.

The American Jewish Relief Committee, though in no way a constituent or affiliated organization, has rendered our work an immeasurable service by relieving us almost entirely of the labor and responsibility for fund raising. Of the million or more dollars that have been contributed to welfare work to date, a very large part of this was secured in the special campaign of the American Jewish Relief Committee in New York City in December last, which brought together a fund of about five million dollars for the war sufferers and the Welfare Board conjointly and a large part of the balance of our total income to date has likewise been secured under the friendly auspices of this committee.

To the American Jewish Committee, under the leadership of Mr. Louis Marshall, we look for the adjudication of cases involving religious or other rights of Jewish men, and in turn we are helping the Bureau of Statistics of the American Jewish Committee in its special work of securing a compendium of the names of all Jews participating in the present war in the American military and naval forces.

We are extending assistance and hospitality to the Jewish Legionaires enlisting in America for service in Palestine, under the British flag, for which purposes we have made recent contributions through Zionist organizations.

Further mention might be made of several other groups of organized Jewry, both national and local, that are aiding the welfare work in its library collections and other ways, and still the list of our co-operating agencies would not be exhausted, but for the present purposes of illustrating our attachment and responsibility to the organized Jewry of America, it is probably not necessary to multiply examples.

From the foregoing it is probably but fair to say that the Jewish Welfare Board truly represents both the American government and American Jewry—at least so far as the organizations of American Jewry are concerned. Unprecedented as this is in the entire history of Jewish life in America, the Welfare Board lays no claim to any special distinction for this achievement, nor may the Jewish people. It is the crisis which confronts America—the crisis of the world war—that has brought this thing about and if it may be accounted an advantage from the point of view of our Jewish group life, it is an advantage for which we, as Jews, can assume no merit or distinction. We shall, on the other hand, merit sure rebuke and censure if, to the accomplishment created by these unlooked-for world conditions, we shall make no contribution of our own. We can neither truly speak for our government nor for the organized Jewry of America, unless we represent the unorganized Jewish people of America, and by this unorganized Jewish people we must understand the eighty thousand soldiers and sailors of Jewish faith, and the hundreds of thousands more whose interests are bound up with theirs. Moreover, in our conscientious attempt to represent the Jewish people, we must bear in mind not only the articulate groups, such as the official Reform element and the official Orthodox element; there are the vastly larger number of inarticulate Jews, who, at the present stage of development in Jewish life, have as yet developed no institutional methods of expression, but who probably constitute nevertheless the bulk and the mainstay of our American Jewish community. They are the American Jews in the making, to whom Reform and Orthodoxy are obsolete or perhaps obsolescent terms. Feeble though they may be in their present effort at self-expression, no movement truly representative of Jewish thought and life can afford to ignore them.

Difficult as it is to be true to the thoughts and sentiments of the Jewish people, the Welfare Board ardently desires to do so nevertheless. With this general attitude toward its work, it assumes to preach no special ism and it permits none to be preached. In its religious work, in the camps, it attempts to meet the needs of the men as these needs are ascertained. For Jews desiring an Orthodox service, it promotes Orthodox services. For sons of Reform Jews it supplies Reform services with the Union Prayer Book. For the preponderating group of soldiers of Orthodox Jewish families, whose requirements are best met by what is called Conservative Judaism, appropriate services are conducted accordingly. Without standardizing any doctrine of its own, the Welfare Board endorses all doctrines if Soldiers of Jewish faith uphold them. Without seeking to impose any ready-made program of its own, it gives encouragement to whatever the self-expression of the Jewish boys demand.

The board is cooperating with the American Library Association in supplying Yiddish books and other reading matter to Yiddish speaking men. It has prepared to date for distribution in the camps three pamphlets in Yiddish, one on government benefits, the other two on problems of social hygiene, and it has at the present time in contemplation several additional pamphlets for Yiddish-speaking men. For those who desire to conduct Jewish discussion circles, it has now in preparation several subject outlines for guidance and instruction in the conduct of such circles. With a donation from the Jewish Publication Society of a library of Jewish books in each of the camps and cantonments, foundations have been laid for a Jewish library, to which the board is making additions from week to week.

In addition to these group activities along religious or educational lines the welfare workers specialize in what has been called personal welfare work, and it may be said without exaggeration that no personal welfare work that is being carried on in the American camps is more intensive or constructive than that of the representatives of the Jewish Welfare Board. The personal problems that come before the welfare workers are of a vast variety of phases, including military and non-military problems of the men themselves, and problems involving the men and their families. Our workers are regular visitors at the hospitals and guardhouses; they assist and advise men in matters of transfer, leave and real or fancied discrimination. They advise them as to money and business matters; many of our representatives give legal advice, many are rabbis who perform individual religious ministrations of various kinds, particularly at the embarkation camps. In cases involving the families of men, it is our policy to refer to the American Red Cross, to whom the government has delegated these functions largely. A basis of co-operation has been established with the Red Cross, but, of necessity, it is a tentative basis only. The family difficulties of men in the service constitute a developing problem. It is a dynamic rather than a static situation that we are here dealing with, and the basis of co-operation between the welfare agencies and the Red Cross must of necessity be progressive rather than fixed, depending upon developing problems and experiences as well as changes in formulation of policy in the Red Cross itself and as between the Red Cross and the War Department.

The problem of the welfare worker is not confined to the camp, however. He follows the soldiers wherever they go. In the nearby communities the welfare worker makes the community welfare program, co-ordinating the hospitality activities, collecting and dispatching the comforts and gifts, managing the entertainments at the community center and assisting soldiers and sailors in utilizing the religious or other facilities of the town.

For the men overseas, a special group will be assigned, the first of which will set sail within the next fortnight. It will comprise a commission of two workers, one of whom will remain in Paris to direct the overseas work, the other of whom will return with a report based upon his survey of conditions.

Accompanying the commission will be a group of at least four men, trained in our American service, to initiate similar activities in the important posts in France, and to this group additions will be made from month to month, until at least fifty men will have been sent abroad. In addition to the welfare workers, the government contemplates sending army chaplains of the various faiths, to the extent of one for each eighteen hundred men. The Jewish chaplains will be selected by the government after endorsement by the Committee on Chaplains of the Welfare Board, which, since the beginning of the war, has acted as the government's advisory agency with reference to all Jewish chaplains.

Though ostensibly limited in its work to the men of the United States Army and Navy, the Welfare Board conceives its task broadly. Under the latest military rulings, American soldiers abroad are members of the army of the allies, and with this breaking down of national distinctions, the scope of our work is correspondingly enlarged. During the past month the Welfare Board purchased ten thousand copies of Chief Rabbi Hertz's publication for soldiers for distribution to the English-speaking soldiers of the allies. They include five thousand books of Psalms and five thousand books entitled, "Jewish Thoughts." These are presently being distributed through Chief Rabbi Levy of Paris and Chaplain Voorsanger, now with the American Expeditionary Forces. Indeed, in our gift to the Jewish recruits for Palestine we gave assistance to our comrades under the flag of our ally, Great Britain.

We have made a subvention to the Jewish community of Washington for welfare work among civilian workers, including women as well as men, and we are about to make a study of conditions among Jewish girls in New York as a result of revelations recently made with respect to places frequented by soldiers and sailors.

Whether in all this work we represent the sentiments and viewpoints of the Jewish people, or whether we fail to represent it it is difficult to say. Indeed, our Jewry of America is of such a composite nature and the forces that play upon it are so varied and deep-rooted in their origin, that it is difficult even to know what these sentiments and viewpoints are. So far as the articulate groups are concerned, we know that we have been criticized, now for being too Jewish and again for being not Jewish enough; now for advocating what has been called "segregation" and again for being exponents of what has been called the melting pot theory; now for making martyrs of the Jewish men with the colors, because we have failed to furnish them with Kosher food, and again for making martyrs of them in our sympathy with those who desire such dietary restrictions; now for permitting Yiddish books to be circulated in the camps, and again for not providing enough of them. So far as the inarticulate Jews are concerned, however, we believe that it is not unlikely that we express their views, though only time will give opportunity adequately to translate them into acts.

Of one other important department of the welfare work scant mention has as yet been made—the work of our local Jewries. We believe that our purpose is unfulfilled, that we cannot truly represent either the government or nationally organized Jewry, unless and until we also represent the locally organized Jewry, or, to put it in other language, the local Jewish communities. It is from local communities that the soldiers have come. It is to these communities that they will return. Indeed, in ten or a score of years from now these eighty or hundred thousand, or possibly one hundred and fifty thousand, Jews of our national Army and Navy will be the Jewish citizens, the upholders of our Jewish communities, the leaders and workers of our local Jewries. If we would have them remain steadfast to these communities through all the tragic days through which they must presently pass, they must feel the spiritual forces of these communities behind them. They must know that this force is with them wherever they may be. Apart from this, the National Jewish Welfare Board is in the truest sense the child of the local communities, as well as of the national Jewish organizations. It is to the local communities that we turn for both moral and financial support. We look to them, moreover, for definite service in addition. We expect each community to send its Jewish boys into the service with a formal expression of its belief in them, so that each man may feel the power and strength of his community behind him. We expect each community to follow its soldiers with gifts, by correspondence and other aid, and by visitation to their families. We expect each community, meanwhile, to prepare for the return of these young men, for their readjustment to civil life, for the rehabilitation of their families, and the new adjustments in the work of the social agencies of each town, that these changes imply.

It was in the thoughts of all this that the Welfare Board, unlike the Knights of Columbus and the Y. M. C. A., incorporated in its platform a program of town work, as well as the camp work program. For the past six months it has worked incessantly in the organization of what it calls local branches. At the present day eighty-five Jewish communities have organized themselves as J. W. B. branches. Twenty more are in process of organization. Before the end of this year the Welfare Board plans to have organized no less than two hundred local Jewries as Welfare Board branches.

The results of this policy have already proven the wisdom of it. It has stimulated widespread interest in soldier and sailor work. This is particularly true of those centers of Jewish life which are more remote from large encampments. In the camp cities, or camp towns, the presence of uniformed men has of itself stimulated this interest, and it may be truly said that the real welfare workers are the Jews and Jewesses of these camp cities. Long before the organization of the Welfare Board they were giving up their time and energies and of their means to the entertainment of men on leave, to visitation of the sick and comfort to the lonely and dejected. But in the towns more remote from the camps —and these are the large cities for the most part—this stimulation of interest has been provided by the organization of the Welfare Branch, on the basis of which efforts have been inaugurated for the furtherance of our national plans and projects.

The fiscal policy of the Welfare Board was determined several months ago when its Executive Committee voted in favor of a central collection and disbursement of funds under which all moneys raised for and in behalf of the Welfare Board became payable to the national treasurer, the national body making itself responsible in turn for promoting and financing welfare work in the towns and cities as well as in the American and overseas camps. It was felt that though this fund was procured from the local Jewries of the country, authority to spend it should proceed from the central office, which by reason of its national and international perspective could best decide as to the wisdom of expenditures and thus guarantee to the local Jewries the best possible administration of the funds that they themselves had created. Any other policy would have been fatal. It would have made each community the collector and dispenser of its own welfare fund. It would have led to excessive outlays for town hospitality, much of which is not only of no social value, but of a negative social value. It would have left without adequate resources the more immediately important work in the camps. It would have left the overseas program without moral or financial support. Indeed it would have made impossible a truly responsible administration of the fund, such as the War Department justly expects of the agency which it has nominated as the authoritative functioning body for the Jewish group.

This statement is not made by way of apology. It is made in the interests of the large majority of communities in every section of the United States that have responded to the suggestions of the National Jewish Welfare Board with disinterested zeal and for the instruction of those few communities where intense local pride has made local needs and local interests seem paramount. This sense of local or sectional pride has been particularly unfortunate, not because of the dollars and cents that it may have cost either by way of excessive demands for local purposes, or by way of inadequate contributions from local sources. The real misfortune in such instances lies in this—that it gives too much importance to the fiscal relation between the branch and the national body, making the spiritual relation seem subordinate to it, when as a matter of principle it is the fiscal relation that should be subordinated. The National Jewish Welfare Board desires itself to be in the truest sense the representative of local Jewries. It is the local communities organized, combined and raised to national self-consciousness. In this view of the case the national office is but the visible expression of a covenant or pact between all the local communities of America, each of which desires to serve the most by serving all the rest.

The national office furnishes to each community under this pact the advantages of a broad perspective. It provides a means of contact with the federal government, to which it is acredited by the Jews of America. It has today an organization of one hundred and twenty welfare workers in the American camps (in addition to some thirty-five or forty members of the central office force) for the purpose of carrying on the welfare work of the associated communities of the country. It provides to these communities a school in which each month a new group of some twenty-five or more men from every section are being trained as community servants—men who give themselves now to Jewish war work and will not fail the community when called upon later for the even more trying problems of the post-war period. It places at the disposition of all local communities a research department for the study of the war-aspects of community problems as they change and develop under the impact of the world struggle.

Has not an organization like this, created in an emergency, representing the American government, organized Jewry, the plain Jewish people and the local communities of America, a unique opportunity? And shall not we Jews avail ourselves of it by rising now as never before to a truly national consciousness of our community?

THE PEACE AND THE JEWISH QUESTION IN RUMANIA.

An outcry of indignation will come from the entire Jewish world. The preliminary peace concluded between the Central Powers and Rumania contains no word on the Jewish question. Germany, Austria and Turkey belong to the signatory powers to the Treaty of Berlin, which promised the Jews of Rumania complete equality withheld from them by the Rumanian Olygarchiy for more than 40 years with absolute impunity. But at present the Central Powers consider the Jewish question in Rumania as an interior Rumanian question and thus take upon them the co-responsibility for the criminal policy of the Rumanian government towards the Jewish population of that country. Or is it perhaps possible to introduce new stipulations for securing the rights of the hundreds of thousands of the Jewish population at the final negotiations on peace? Anyway, it is to be hoped that the Social-Democratic parties of the Quadruple Alliance will at the last moment induce their government to make use of this possibility.

The substantial aspects of the Jewish question in Rumania are quite clear. Article 44 of the Treaty of Berlin reads as follows:

> "In Roumania the difference of religious creeds and confessions shall not be alleged against any person as a ground for exclusion or incapacity in matters relating to the enjoyment of civil and political rights, admission to public employments, functions, and honors, or the exercise of the various professions and industries in any locality whatsoever.
> "The freedom and outward exercise of all forms of worship shall be assured to all persons belonging to the Rumanian State, as well as to foreigners, and no hindrance shall be offered either to the hierarchical organization of the different communions, or to their relations with their spiritual chiefs.
> "The subjects and citizens of all the Powers, traders or others, shall be treated in Rumania, without distinction of creed, on a footing of perfect equality".

The signatory Powers, Great Britain, Germany, Austria-Hungary, France, Italy, Russia and Turkey, have stipulated that the submission to Article 44 of the Treaty of Berlin should be a condition for the acknowledgment of Rumania's independence. The chief impose of introducing this article in the Treaty of Berlin was the necessity of securing equal civil and political rights for the Jewish population of Rumania. The Rumanian government availed itself of the circumstance that the Jews are not expressly mentioned in the Treaty of Berlin in order to trample under foot their rights in the most imprudent way. All Jews are put in a position of aliens and naturalization can be given by acts of both Houses of Parliament on every individual case. From 1878 to 1912 only a few hundreds of Jews were given by the Parliament the rights of citizenship. During the Balkan wars the Rumanian government promised all the Jewish soldiers and all the Dobrudsha Jews equal civil rights. The fact that at the beginning of the present war there were in all about 2200 naturalized Jews only shows how the Rumanian government had kept their promise.

The Rumanian government was not, however, satisfied, with this summary disabilities of the Jewish masses which existed before and in 1878. To these disabilities a long series of new disabilities were added with the only purpose of rendering the economic and political life of the Jews in Rumania impossible and of forcing them to emigrate. As "aliens" the Jews have no active or passive rights to participate in the elections for the legislative and other communal institutions. The acquisition of landed property and residence in country places is prohibited to the Jews. Permissions already granted for residence in the country can be withdrawn at a moment's notice. These restrictions first introduced in 1868 were reiterated with more emphasis and with additional details in 1880 and 1887, when many towns were converted into villages from which the Jews were mercilessly expelled. But even in the towns they are never sure that by some arbitrary order of some official they would not be expelled. A large number of occupations and professions are completely barred to them; thus they are totally excluded from the legal profession, from the druggist-commerce, tobacco industry and many other industries and professions. To public schools the Jewish children are admitted with heavy restrictions and the establishment of schools of their own is by the administration rendered almost impossible. The Jews are excluded from Chambers of Commerce and from Artisan Corporations. Jewish workmen in the factories must not exceed one-third of the whole personnel.

Notwithstanding all these disabilities the Jews are eligible for military service and have to bear of all other responsibilities of citizens. According to the law, only subjects of other states are free from military service, but the Jews are "aliens under no state's law" and must, therefore, fight for the greatness of the "Fatherland".

The Jewish question in Rumania was, in 1878, by all parties to the Treaty of Berlin acknowledged as an international one. The 40 years long experience has shown that the guarantees stipulated by the Treaty of 1878, concerning the emancipation of the Jews were by no means adequate. It is hardly possible to find in the world any other group of population which as badly as the Rumanian Jews want international protection against their own government. It is hardly possible to find a man with a developed sense of justice who would not think it an evident necessity to establish firm and actual guarantees for the final solution of the Jewish question.

It is to be assumed that Rumania, with the tacit consent of the Quadruple Alliance, will try to remunerate itself on Russia's account for the loss of the Dobrudscha through the annexation of certain districts of Bessarabia. In this way the Jewish population of Rumania will be increased by new hundreds of thousands of souls. This Jewish population which has suffered so much under the old regime in Russia has been, together with the rest of the Russian Jewry liberated and given equal rights as citizens and as a nationality. The change of sovereignty opens for the Bessarabian Jews a sad perspective of relapsing into a regime of oppression worse than that under which they labored during the domination of the Russian Tsar Autocracy.

The Jews of all countries regardless of political ideas and party affiliating demand a regulation of the Jewish question in Rumania in such a way that the breaking of the stipulations of the treaties should become impossible. A possibly short time term should be stipulated for the general naturalization of the Rumania Jews to be carried through the necessary legal barriers. A paragraph must also be introduced in the Rumanian Constitution which should unequivocally guarantee to the Jews complete civil and political equality with other citizens of Rumania.

They must also be given the right autonomously to administer their own national affairs. Some international institution must be created to which also the Rumanian Jews could apply in case their government will try again to nullify their Treaty rights.

At this saddest moment of the history of the Jews in Rumania the Jewish people, and especially the Jewish proletariat, hope for the active assistance of the international proletariat. The German Imperialists and the Rumanian Boyars may conclude a peace on account of the human rights of the Jews, but the general peace ought to and will not fail to root out all this horror. (Jewish press bureau, Stockholm.)

BULGARIAN PREMIER ON BRAVERY OF JEWS.

The Bulgarian Premier, M. Radoslavoff, in addressing the Sobranje (Parliament) at Sofia stated that the Bulgarian Jews had demonstrated their bravery and patriotism during the war. The Bulgarians, he declared, had always accorded equal rights to the Jews. He promised that during the negotiations with Rumania the Government would support the claims of Jews to equality.

HUNTINGTON LODGE, HUNTINGTON, W. VA.

By Sam Abrahams.

On Tuesday, May 14, Huntington Lodge, No. 795, I. O. B. B., held a banquet and a dance in its own club rooms. The occasion was to commemorate its second anniversary, and to simultaneously give a farewell greeting to a number of its members who were leaving for the training camps. Marcus Feuchtwanger, the Grand President of our District, came specially to Huntington for the occasion. It is concided by all who were present that this was the largest assemblage of Jewish people that was ever held in the city of Huntington.

The Huntington Lodge has had a phenomenal growth. Starting with a membership of about 20, it is now over the 100 mark, and is as active a lodge as you will find in any district. Several attempts were made by the propaganda committee to establish a lodge here, but only met with discouragement and failure. Once a lodge was actually organized, but there was no enthusiasm, and it was short lived. Then some time later there came to our city, Bro. Ed Hemple, of Pittsburgh, now of Philadelphia, as Grand Secretary, and his efforts were the must successful, but in order to make a good start, Rabbi Silver, formerly of Wheeling, and Isadore Sobel, of Erie, Pa., came down, and at a mass meeting the "little acorn" was planted, and now it is considered by the Grand Lodge officials as a mighty oak. Brother Hemple especially takes pride in the growth and development of this lodge, and he has good reason to.

The first thing our organization did was to rent suitable club and lodge rooms. We obtained this in the downtown section of the city. A board of governors was created, whose business it was to provide special social occasions. We commenced by having weekly dances. At once it was observed that the B'nai B'rith Lodge was giving the Jews of Huntington something that it was in need of—the opportunity of the Jews of all denominations to assemble, and this was taken advantage of by both the Reformed and Orthodox Jews. Our club rooms are now used by every Jewish organization in the city. We don't charge anything for the use of this. Marriages are held here and frequent lectures take place. The B'nai B'rith headquarters is now the recognized social center for the Jews of Huntington and vicinity.

To give you an idea of how enthusiastic the members and officers are in their endeavors, we boast of having the only president who goes through the ceremony of initiation without the use of the ritual. This is Bro. Albert Schlossburg who has made an excellent official during his term of office.

When Brother Feuchtwanger was here for our anniversary he spoke of the necessity for all Jews, regardless of denomination, to be united, and that every Jew in Huntington should be a member of our lodge. So appealing was his talk that we obtained, right at the meeting, seventeen (17) applications for membership.

At this meeting, too, a gold watch was presented by Bro. Dez Schonthal to Bro. E. Biern, for his untiring efforts in the interests of the lodge. Brother Biern is a member of the order for over fifty years, is a member in the Cincinnati Lodge and an honorary member in ours. Brother Biern has "only" taken in forty members. He could get them when others failed. Brother Biern is one of our oldest citizens and one of the most respected and popular Jews in Huntington.

SAN BERNARDINO, CAL.

The forty-sixth anniversary of Paradise Lodge was celebrated on Sunday evening, May 18, in the true sense of benevolence and patriotism.

Over 100 of the Jewish residents assembled for the social given by the lodge for the purpose of raising funds for the Jewish War Relief. Much enthusiasm was displayed at the affair and as a result of auctioning off boxes, the sum of $535.00 was realized. Following the auction sale a pleasing program was rendered during which refreshments were served.

EUREKA LODGE, WACO, TEXAS.

Eureka Lodge, No. 198, was organized in 1873 under the jurisdiction of District Grand Lodge No. 2. The lodge has now a membership of over a hundred and stands for what is best in the community. It fosters religion, education and charity and tends to educate its members to the highest possible standard of citizenship. The members of Eureka Lodge were the founders of the subscription fund for the Synagogue and are still actively and enthusiastically aiding its growth.

Co-operating with the Committee of Fifty for the success of the affair are members of the Women's Committee of the B'nai B'rith.

Golden Gate Lodge No. 129 held a most interesting meeting on June 5, 1918. Initiation of candidates was held, the Ritual being exemplified by the new degree team of the lodge. A membership campaign was inaugurated at the meeting, and it is hoped to materially increase the strength of the lodge. The War Savings Club No. 2 was organized, and the families of all the members have been solicited to join the club and to aid in the growth of this Thrift Savings Society.

The social committee of the lodge has made unusual efforts to bring into reunion all the old members of the lodge. Along the lines with this effort an entertainment was given by the committee on behalf of the lodge on the evening of May 15, which was largely attended.

B'nai B'rith Juniors, accompanied by a member of the Order, Bro. Dick Lowey, as leader, made a cross-country walk to a big lagoon. The outing proved agreeable and stimulating.

An earnest appeal for new members for the B'nai B'rith of San Francisco has been sent throughout District No. 4 by Mr. Richard E. Gutstadt, President of the District Grand Lodge.

The Ladies' Committee, representing the three San Francisco Auxiliaries of the B'nai B'rith, held a whist party on Wednesday evening, May 29, 1918, in the B'nai B'rith building. Many participated in the affair and a number of pretty prizes were awarded.

PITTSFIELD, MA[illegible]

At the meeting of Adullam [illegible] 326, of Pittsfield, held on M[illegible] ing, May 7, 1918, under the [illegible] of the Intellectual Advancement Committee and which meeting was open to the public and was attended by the Young Men's Hebrew Association as the guests of the lodge, Rabbi Samuel Price of Springfield delivered an address on "Modern Problems of Jews".

Rabbi Price dwelt particularly on three topics—service, organization and peace. He said that service is the watchword of the hour. In other lands such as Russia and Roumania, the Jew has not been regarded as a citizen, with a citizen's rights and responsibilities. America was the first nation to welcome the Jew as a citizen. With the rights of citizenship go its duties, the duty, especially of serving the state. Military service is one of those duties or rather one of the privileges of citizenship, as everywhere the right to bear arms is regarded as a mark of distinction. Among civilians in time of war, service consists in supporting the soldiers, and in relieving those suffering from the effects of war. Filling the war chest is the means by which we who stay at home render service to the nation at this time.

"To accomplish results, whether in times of war or peace, is religion or politics, organization is necessary. Ten men banded together are worth 100 acting as individuals. From now on, the Allies advised by one single council, that of Versailles, and acting under concentrated leadership, that of General Foch, will be able to remedy the weaknesses developed under the previous system of mere common purpose without united forces. The progress of Zionism, too, exemplifies the powers of organization, as the power of the international organization originated by Herzl seems in the way of obtaining what individual prayer for 1900 years had yearned for in vain.

"But what is the end and aim of all this organized purpose? It is peace. Peace has been the one and only watchword and word of greeting and congratulation among Jews since their history began, not the peace of oppression or cowardice, but the peace of goodwill and justice, resting upon the rights of all nations. To obtain this type of peace, we must make war with all our might until the force of Prussian autocracy is overthrown, as between autocracy and democracy there can be no more lasting peace than between good and evil".

SERVICE FLAG IS PRESENTED TO B'NAI B'RITH.

Pleasing Service of New Castle Lodge Held on May 5, 1918.

Before a large crowd a service flag containing seventeen stars was presented to New Castle Lodge, No. 609, of New Castle, Pa., and the services marking this interesting milestone in the history of the lodge were truly impressive.

Attorney B. A. Winternitz was chairman of the meeting and it was in the main due to his leadership and points that the affair proved one of the most patriotic and inspiring held there in a long time.

Mr. Winternitz was introduced as chairman of the meeting by Jos. M. Ehrlich, president of the lodge. In a masterful address he then presented the service flag with the seventeen stars representing the seventeen Jewish youths who have entered the service from this city. Secretary Abe Levine, of the lodge, then read the names of those honored, after which Dr. B. M. Berger accepted the flag in behalf of the lodge. Rabbi Murray Alstedt of McKeesport then spoke interestingly on war topics. He was followed by George A. Dickson, superintendent of schools and chairman of the Lawrence county public safety committee who in an able manner pleased the large gathering. Attorney James A. Chambers next was called upon and acquitted himself in a creditable manner, as did also District Attorney George Muse who followed him. Marcus Feuchtwanger, president of the District, was then called upon. One of the features of the meeting was a violin solo by Abe Levine, accompanied by Earl Carbaugh, as was also a piano solo by Mrs. Jack Holesinger.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

DISTRICT NO. 1 AND THE JEWISH FARMER.

At the February meeting of the General Committee a letter was received from Bro. Gabriel Davidson, President of Manhattan-Washington Lodge and manager of the Jewish Agricultural and Industrial Aid Society, outlining a plan for service of an educational and cultural character among the Jewish farming communities of District No. 1. The letter set forth in substance that though the industry and perseverance of the Jew in agricultural work is of great importance to the Jews at large and to the country in general at this vital time in our history, little or no thought has been given to the need for lessening the rigors and tedium of farm life or bringing to the farmers and their families those opportunities for social diversion and intellectual development which abound in the cities and which constitute the most powerful element in drawing the farming population, especially the young men and women, to city life. The plan proposed was in brief to have our District remedy these conditions to the extent of its power within its own jurisdiction by arranging suitable social or semi-social functions, lectures, addresses on current topics, children's clubs, etc., in the farming communities themselves, our B'nai B'rith Lodges in the various towns and cities to be centers of such activity for the surrounding farming districts.

The General Committee has considered the plan carefully in its many ramifications and has approved it provisionally until a definite experiment can be tried.

Bro. Gabriel Davidson has mapped out the territory with relation to the location of our lodges, railroad communication and other aspects of the situation, and after several conferences with President Maurice P. Davidson and other members of the General Committee has evolved a definite course of action.

The first venture in this new field will be in the vicinity of Bridgeport, Conn., and Sunday, June 2, 1918, is the day set for the launching of the idea. On the afternoon of that day a meeting will be held in Bridgeport at which Bro. Gabriel Davidson, Bro. Charles H. Shapiro, First Vice-President of the District, and Bro. Joseph H. Ullman, member of the General Committee, will be present. The meeting will be under the auspices of Harmony Lodge of Bridgeport, but will be open to the public and may well prove to be the starting point of a vigorous and decidedly necessary and helpful movement. Plans will be presented and discussed for local work in the country thereabout within a radius of 20 to 30 miles, and a body of volunteers will be formed to carry the plan into effect.

In the evening of the same day a meeting will be held at a farmhouse in one of the Jewish farming communities near Bridgeport, to which all the farmers of the region will be invited, and the details of the program will then be worked out.

Springfield Lodge, of Springfield, Mass., has added its name to the list of B'nai B'rith lodges which have demonstrated their industry, generosity, and patriotism by purchasing and presenting to the Red Cross ambulances to be used in the service of our troops.

On May 2, 1918, Springfield Lodge stepped into the limelight literally as well as figuratively by presenting at the Court Square Theatre, in Springfield, an amateur performance of the musical comedy, "Her Soldier Boy." The able cast consisted of seventy-five persons, chiefly members of the lodge, and their relatives. The performance was unanimously voted a brilliant success.

NO JEWISH SOVIET IN RUSSIA.

Russian Jewry has refused to countenance the scheme of the Bolshevik Government for creating a Jewish Soviet to take charge of Jewish affairs. The intention of the Government was to introduce the Soviet system into Jewish life and attempt to win over Jewish public opinion to Bolsheviki methods. The project failed so flatly that it had to be abandoned by the Government.

BOLSHEVIKI CLOSE JEWISH NEWSPAPERS.

All the Yiddish and Hebrew periodicals in Russia were forced to stop pubilcation. The Bolsheviki government regards the Jewish press as inimical to its policies and therefore does not trust the press at the present time. Some of the editors of these papers have been placed under arrest. Among these is also the well-known journalist, M. Kreinin, who was chairman of the committee for the convocation of a Jewish Congress.

ANTI-SEMITIC ARTICLE IN THE ARGENTINE PRESS.

Of late further articles of an anti-Semitic nature have appeared in the Argentine Press. The Jewish social workers of Buenos Aires have decided to organize a definite campaign against this anti-Semitic attack.

SKETCHES OF MODERN JEWISH HISTORY.

Thomas as proof that the Jews are hyenas, wolves, jackals, hogs, baboons, rhinoceroses, crocodiles, vampires, rattlesnakes, vipers, etc. The rabbi remains calm at this "dumping of manure for the sake of fertilizing his sterile mind", and in the course of his counter-argument quotes from the "Tausves-Jontof". As the only refutation the friar replies: "Let the Tausves-Jontof go to the devil". Here the rabbi loses his composure. Such blasphemy cannot go unpunished:

> "Denn der Tausves-Jontof, Gott,
> Das bist Du. Und an dem frechen
> Tausves-Jontof—Leugner musst du > Deines Namens Ehre raechen."

The opinion which the poet has of the claims of both religions is clearly expressed in the closing words, which he puts into the mouth of the queen, who is asked of her opinion on the question which side has the better of the controversy. She replies:

> "Welcher Recht hat, weiss ich nicht—
> Doch es will mich schier beduenken,
> Dass der Rabbi und der Moench
> Dass sie alle Beide stinken."

Little as Heine thought of the Jewish religion, he felt deeply for the Jewish people and the terrible wrongs that it had suffered for centuries. To the presentation of this claim of recognition his "Rabbi von Bacharach" was to be devoted. It is a pity that by his subsequent baptism he lost interest in the subject which is almost certainly the reason why it remained a fragment.

The sentiment that guided him is beautifully expressed in the verse which is said to have been intended as a motto for the "Rabbi von Bacharach":

An Edom.

"Ein' Jahrtausend schon und laegner
Dulden wir uns bruederlich,
Du, du duldest, dass ich athme,
Dass du rasest, dulde ich.

"Manchmal nur, in dunkeln Zeiten
Ward dir wunderlich zu Muth,
Und die liebefrommen Taetzchen
Faerbtest du mit deinem Blut.

"Jetzt wird unsre Freundschaft fester,
Und noch taeglich nimmt sie zu,
Denn ich selbst begann zu rasen,
Und ich werde fast wie du."

THE METAMORPHOSIS OF AN ORGANIZATION.

Interesting and instructive as may be the study and observation of individuals, still more interesting and far more instructive are the study and observation of organizations. The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith was organized three quarters of a century ago with the strict understanding and under a binding obligation to exclude from its deliberations and discussions religious subjects. Hence, the religious ties that bound the members of the Order to one another in the past were weak and almost imperceptible. Today, however, religion is a most pronounced incentive in bringing men to the Order and the most prominent factor in its aims and objects. The synagogue, which was ignored or hardly noticed by the Order in the past, now seriously and sincerely reckoned with, while the rabbinate, whose interests in the lodge was at best but lukewarm, is today most ardent and zealous in its service to the Order and its co-operation with the lodge.

In some instances, strange to say, the B'nai B'rith has even gone farther of late than has the synagogue to safeguard the religious interests of our people. Thus, while the synagogue has not yet had the courage or the power to exclude from membership those of our people who are attempting to serve God and Baal at the same time and are retaining their Jewish affiliations on the one hand and allowing themselves to be caught in the web of Mrs. Eddy's mysteries on the other, the B'nai B'rith has made a strong and serious effort to exclude all such hybrid members. Similarly, while the synagogue has only feebly and reluctantly expressed its unqualified condemnation of intermarriage, one of the District Grand Lodges of the B'nai B'rith has recently had to take to the Court of Appeals a case in which a non-Jew, who had married a Jewess and had been accepted into the faith, but who had not complied with one of the traditional requirements of conversion, applied for membership in the Order.

Indeed, the metamorphosis that has taken place in the B'nai B'rith is as interesting and instructive as it is gratifying.—The Jewish Ledger.

A HISTORICAL SKETCH

The 13th of October, 1843, was the birthday of the Order. On that day, in the city of New York, the first formal session was held, and steps were taken for the establishment of a Jewish Fraternal Order, patterned after the many friendly societies in this country, but with a distinct purpose of its own. Whether or not alleged discrimination against Jews in certain lodges led to the foundation of a Jewish Order for Jews, is immaterial; as a matter of fact, some of the very founders of the Order had been admitted to the Masonic Lodge. But it stands to reason that not all of the immigrants from Germany possessed the same degree of education and of adaptability to new surroundings, and that most of them were happiest in associating with their own kind. What actuated the twelve men who first met in an Essex Street saloon, differ as they might in education and mentality, was the unanimous conviction that something ought to be done for the elevation of the social, moral and intellectual condition of the Jews in this country. In the New York Jewry of those days the Portuguese kept to themselves and "hardly recognized other Jews as their equals"; and these were split up into English Jews and German Jews and Polish Jews and Dutch Jews. They all brought with them their home customs and particularly their home ritual or minhag. Petty rivalries among the congregations and strife and brawls and lack of decorum within made of the synagogue a dividing rather than a uniting factor, and the thoughtful were obliged to look for an organization such as a fraternal Order might prove to be to act as a unifying and civilizing agency. The expectations of that early group of founders were destined to be realized in the sequel, and judged by the results the initial and timely act was nothing short of an inspiration. The leading spirit in the organization and consolidation of the Order was the man who is entitled to being considered as the real founder, Henry Jones, a machinist by trade, who, though not blessed with worldly goods, by the sheer forcefulness of his character, had lifted himself to an honorable place in the community and was determined to raise along with himself his brothers in faith. The others who attended the first formal meeting were William Renau, Isaac Rosenberg, Isaac Dittenhoefer, Michael Schwab, R. M. Rodacher, Henry Kling, Valentine Koon, Samuel Schaefer, Jonas Hecht, H. Heineman and M. Anspacher. On the 21st of October, a Constitution and By-Laws were adopted, together with the "Ritual" for initiation and instruction. The name, Bundes Bruder (Brothers of the Covenant), with the Hebrew title B'nai B'rith, and the motto, "Benevolence, Brotherly Love, and Harmony", then chosen, have remained to this day. The element of secrecy, then likewise introduced, was subjected to criticism, but its defenders emphasized its emotional appeal to the less educated and were able to cite its potencies for good in similar organizations. The supreme power was vested in the "Constitution Grand Lodge," under whose jurisdiction societies should be formed, and whose members were to consist of the founders and of all past presidents of subordinate lodges; a "General" or Executive Committee was to be made up of the Grand Nasi Ab, or President, and the Grand Zekenim, or Elders, chosen by the Grand Lodge. Isaac Dittenhoefer, the first President, had seen occasion, in Feb. 11, 1844, to install Zion Lodge No. 2 in New York City, and among those who were admitted to membership therein none stood out as prominently as Dr. Merzbacher, who proved zealous in the up-building of the Order, fructifying the institution with his ideas and conceptions. The men who were his lodge-brothers aided their teacher in founding the Cultus-Verein, which soon thereafter developed into the Congregation Temple Emanuel, now recognized as the foremost Jewish congregation in the land. Thus indirectly the Order, as its founders hoped it would, helped realize a decorous and dignified mode of worship in the synagogue.

Lodges were soon formed in other cities; in Cincinnati in quick succession two were installed, the second being the first lodge of the Order in which the English language was used, the German elsewhere naturally being employed at first. The year 1848 brought to this country a large number of Jews who had taken part in the struggle for liberty. Conspicuous among them was Isidor Bush, who immediately joined the ranks of the Order; aided by his previous journalistic experience, he undertook to publish a Jewish paper ("Israel's Herald"), the first in the German language in this country, in which articles appeared setting forth the aims of the Order; but the publication was discontinued after a three months' trial. Bush soon removed to St. Louis, where he became largely instrumental in promoting and developing the principles and purposes of the Order. In 1850, the question of the admission of non-Jews to membership in the Order was decided in the negative. New lodges were being formed. and when in 1851 the Constitution Grand Lodge met, in conformity with the new Constitution a charter was granted for a District Grand Lodge to be known by the name of District Grand Lodge No. 1, located in the City of New York, and for a District Grand Lodge No. 2, to be located in Cincinnati. The Constitution Grand Lodge became the highest tribunal of the Order, communicating only with District Grand Lodges; Henry Jones was elected President ("Grand Saar"). The first anual report named twelve lodges in existence, with 1,202 members, and $19,134.23 of aggregate funds; $1,100 had been disbursed during that year for the support of the sick and needy. In 1852, District Grand Lodge No. 3 was instituted at Philadelphia. Thus, after seven years of existence, the Order entered upon its second epoch, during which it spread rapidly.

In New York City four lodges united in erecting a building, "Covenant Hall", which was completed in 1852; we find among the participants in the foundation and dedication ceremonies Dr. E. M. Friedlein, who subsequently earned for himself the designation of "The Nestor of the Order", Dr. Merzbacher and Dr. Max Lilienthal. Through the instrumentality of Dr. Maurice Mayer the Maimonides Reading Institution and Library was organized; it was located in Covenant Hall and opened in 1852. A course of lectures was instituted and the services of many eminent lecturers were enlisted, among whom we find Julius Bien, Dr. S. Waterman, Dr. B. Stegnitz, Dr. Max Lilienthal, Dr. E. M. Friedlein, J. M. Cohen, Dr. Maurice Mayer Thus the educational activities of the Order were unfolded. Many other plans for "academic education" were taken in hand, but the time was not ripe. At any rate it is the merit of the Order that at an early date it realized the supreme need of American Jewry along educational lines, and Dr. S. Waterman and Dr. James Mitchel may be singled out among the propagators of scholastic schemes. The Order enjoyed the confidence of both wings, and conservatives and the progressives; Isaac Leeser, Raphael, S. M. Isaacs, Isaac M. Wise, David Einborn were active members. When at the Cleveland Synod in 1855 the conservatives won out, the Order remained neutral. At the annual meeting of the Constitution Grand Lodge which met in the same year at Cincinnati and which placed Mosely Ezekiel in the supreme office, the record showed twenty lodges with 2,218 members and a capital of $55,300; two years later, when Julius Bien was made Grand Saar, there were 2,889 members with an accumulated capital of $78,000. Like New York, Cincinnati had its educational center in the Mendelssohn Library, which was opened in 1858. Of early political activities we may mention the effort in 1857-8, at a time when the renewal of a treaty was pending between this country and Switzerland, to safeguard the rights of Jewish citizens against whom there were discriminatory laws. It was the earnest of greater and more successful activity in that direction in the years that were to come.

Still more phenomenal was the growth of the Order in the following ten years. Three new Grand Lodges were instituted: No. 4 in San Francisco, Cal. (1863); No. 5 in Baltimore, Md. (1867); and No. 6 in Chicago, Ill. (1868). In 1868 there were above 20,000 members. In that year a convention was held in the city of New York, composed of representatives of each lodge, and the present constitution was adopted. Accordingly, the supreme authority was vested in a president, to hold office for five years, and in an executive committee and a court of appeal, each of which was composed of one representative from each district, elected for five years. The first president was Julius Bien, who had been the master mind of the new constitution. He held the office until 1900, when he declined re-election because of his advanced years. For upward of thirty years he stood at the helm, guiding the Order amidst ever-changing conditions of Jewish life in this country and abroad, singularly alive to the potencies of the Order to educate, to elevate, to civilize, and to advance the race, brushing aside the imputation of secrecy which does not exist in the ordinary sense of the word, emphasizing fidelity to Judaism and the Jewish cause which need not and never did mean taking a hand in the theological or ecclesiastical squabbles, and making it in every way clear that the mission of the Order was to unite and not to disrupt the Jewish people.

The unique appointment of Bro. Benjamin F. Peixotto in 1870 as U. S. Consul at Bucharest for the express purpose of securing an amelioration of the condition of the shockingly persecuted Jews in Roumania, was in pursuance of suggestions made by the Order, and the negotiations were carried on chiefly by Bro. Simon Wolf, who on that occasion, as on many others, acted on behalf of the Order at Washington. But the appointment carried with it no salary, and for a period of years the lodges of the Order provided the funds for the maintenance of the Roumanian mission. Peixotto interested himself not merely in the political welfare of Roumanian Jewry; he laid foundations for improved Jewish education throughout Roumania, and in 1871 he organized the Order Zion in affiliation with our Order, which carried the educational programme into practice. Thus the Order not only evinced its interest in our persecuted co-religionists abroad, but it began to transplant to the other side of the ocean its beneficent educational organization. At home, in 1873, another new Grand Lodge No. 7, with jurisdiction over the Southern states, was instituted. As a mark of the love which American Jewry bore for the country of their birth or adoption, revealing how they thoroughly identified themselves with its civic life and how they valued its blessed institutions which afforded freedom of conscience to all citizens alike, the Order entrusted in 1874 the sculptor Moses Ezekiel with the execution in marble of a statue representing "Religious Liberty", and it was unveiled two years later on the grounds of the Centennial Exhibition commemorating the signing of the Declaration of Independence, at Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, where it remains as an everlasting tribute by the Jew to America.

A new sphere opened for the Order in 1882, when Moritz Ellinger, acting on behalf of the Executive Committee, instituted the first lodge in Berlin, Germany. Within three years a sufficient number of lodges had been founded to warrant a visit to them by President Bien. Enthusiastically received, he installed on June 21, 1885, Grand Lodge No. 8 for Germany. Grand Lodges No. 9 for Roumania and No. 10 for Austria followed in quick succession, and branches of the Order, which saw the light in the New World, were set up in Europe, and in the adjoining two continents of the Old World. The Order thus became truly international, and enabled to do its benevolent work, which extended to all abodes of Jewry efficaciously, never meddling with the internal affairs of the various countries, always ready to take up the cause of the downtrodden and persecuted co-religionist. The Order planted itself squarely upon the position that the Jew was, and where unjust laws militated against him, ought to be, an integral part of the land in which he resided and which he loved as his fatherland, and that true liberty, as in this country, could only mean an incentive to the Jew to remain loyal to his inherited faith and tradition, which naturally and only within these limits linked him to other Jews the world over. The Order inculcated the highest conception of true patriotism, which cheerfully accepts every sacrifice. It is the supreme merit of the Order that it never countenanced a provincial Judaism. So long as a brother Jew suffers injury for no other reason that that he is a Jew, it is the Order's duty and privilege to exert all its legitimate efforts to ameliorate his condition.

Deep interest in the purposes, aspirations and activities of the Order marked the semi-centennial celebration of the Order's existence in October, 1893. At the central office in New York City messages of congratulations and good wishes were received from such men as Leroy-Baulieu, President Cleveland, Andrew D. White, then representative of the United States at the Court of Russia, governors of the states of New York. Massachusetts, Mississippi, Kansas. A three days' festival was held in the Grand Central Palace of Industry in the city of New York. In the presence of a vast concourse of people President Bien narrated the story of the Order's marvelous progress revealed in its count of nine Grand Lodges, 400 lodges with nearly 30,000 members and its record of benevolent and educational institutions in this country and abroad. Bro. A. L. Sanger summed up the Order's achievements along the lines of philanthropy by pointing out how by means of endowments and by liberal contributions substantial aid had been afforded to the sick and distressed; how in every instance of great public calamity it had been at the front of the army of workers, giving with a free and unstinted bounty to all sufferers without regard to creed or nationality; he showed how the Order steadily increased its charitable work by the erection of buildings devoted to benevolent purposes: the Home for Aged and Infirm Hebrews at Yonkers and the Maimonides Library in New York City, in District No. 1; the Cleveland Orphan Asylum in District No. 2; the Foster Home in Philadelphia in District No. 3; Covenant Hall at San Francisco in District No. 4; the Atlanta Hebrew Orphan Asylum in District No. 5, established through the untiring energy of Bro. Simon Wolf; the Chicago Manual Training School in District No. 6, and the New Orleans Orphan Asylum in District No. 7.

The activities of the Order during the next twenty-five years are within the memory of almost every member now connected with any of its lodges. The old grooves were not forsaken. The endowment and insurance feature had to be dropped. The Order had clearly outgrown serving as a mutual insurance society. The members had learned that the Order was called upon to devote its energy and time and means to matters affecting the larger household of Israel or humanity. With the growth of anti-Semitism in the cultured lands of Europe, translating itself in countries of a lower level of civilization into legal and economic discriminations and often enough into bloody massacres, with the forced exile of our persecuted and harassed co-religionists from eastern Europe and the increased flux of immigration to this country, new lines of work presented themselves to which the best minds in the Order addressed themselves. The Order had its inception in the needs of the second wave of Jewish immigration to this country; and these German Jews in America and their descendants, trained in the lodges of the Order to the wider outlook and to the conviction that all Jews were brethren, came nobly to the rescue of the hapless arrivals in the eighties and nineties.

Foremost in pointing out the duty of the Order in this direction were Bros. Victor Abraham and the late Judge M. S. Isaacs. There was work at home and abroad. The international character of the Order, enhanced by President Bien's triumphal journey through Europe in 1897, placed it in a position to undertake measures of relief or protection on the largest scale. In 1900, at the convention in Chicago a commission was appointed to invite the co-operation of all European and American kindred associations in instituting measures for concerted relief of the lamentable conditions of our co-religionists in Galacia through the introduction of industries, agricultural employments and educational facilities. It was at that convention that President Bien declined re-election as president of the Executive Committee, and Leo N. Levi was elected to the highest position in the Order. Short as his tenure of office was, cut short by his premature death at the age of 47 years on Jan. 13, 1904, within this period measures were taken and activities unfolded which served to widen the influence of the organization and to bring it into prominence as one of international import. President Levi interested himself in the welfare of the immigrants of a decade ago who stood in need of Americanization; a brotherly hand was extended to them, and lodges were organized among them, as, for example, in the East Side in New York City, whereby the Russian Jew in America at the close of the century could slowly raise himself to the eminent position which was enjoyed by those who had gone through the schooling afforded by the Order since its foundation in the forties.

But there were also fresh immigrants, refugees from Russia and Roumania. Within four months after the call issued by President Levi homes had been afforded in widely separated parts of the country to over a thousand refugees. The work of placing them and finding employment for them was done most effectively through the individual lodges. On a larger scale was the organization, known as the Industrial Removal Office, instituted through the initiative of President Levi, and then given over in charge of a joint committee designated as the Industrial Removal Committee of the Jewish Agricultural and Aid Society. At the meeting of the Executive Committee in Atlantic City in July, 1902, plans were formulated for conducting a bureau for the placing out of orphan children, and to District No. 1 was entrusted the business of trying the experiment. But the crowning achievement of President Levi's administration was his prompt action after the Kishineff massacre, April, 1903, which had stirred the heart of the Jew, as of all fair-minded people, to its very depth. The Order associated itself with all other Jewish bodies in collecting a large relief fund to be sent to our destitute co-religionists in the Bessarabian capital for immediate needs and such rehabilitation as money could buy.

What, however, brought the Order into deserved world-wide prominence was the petition drafted by its Executive Committee and submitted to the government of the United States for transmission to the Czar. Twelve thousand five hundred and forty-four signatures were affixed to that document, containing names of persons of prominence in all ranks of American society. It matters little that the imperial government of Russia declined to receive the petition; it had ample cognizance of it, and the effect on the civilized world was momentous. Russia stood condemned before the high court of civilized public opinion. Steps were taken at the end of the same year to ascertain that the rumors of a new uprising in Kishineff were unfounded, the Order acting in co-operation with the Anglo-Jewish Association in London and the Alliance Israelite Universelle at Paris. Mention must also be made of President Levi's prompt action in collecting a fund of $27,000 for the relief of the Jewish sufferers in the Galveston storm in 1900, which action was on a line with previous ones in the history of the Order, as on the occasion of the Chicago fire in 1870.

Leo N. Levi was succeeded in the presidency by that indefatigable and zealous protector of his people, Bro. Simon Wolf of Washington, D. C. He held office until the Quinquennial Convention of the Constitution Grand Lodge, which was held in New Orleans on March 19, 1905, when Bro. Adolf Kraus of Chicago was elected to head the organization. Under his leadership the Order has gained in power and prestige. Today the Order boasts of a membership exceeding 40,000 in 422 lodges through 11 districts. The number of institutions maintained by the Order has likewise increased. In these thirteen years the Executive Committee took part in all measures looking toward the safety and welfare of our brethren at home and abroad.

Momentous events have followed fast, one upon the top of another, culminating in the world war which is now raging. We need only mention the pogroms which succeeded the Kishineff massacre, the Beilis affair, the Immigration Law making for restriction, the Passport question and the abrogation of the treaty between the United States and Russia, the Relief of the War Sufferers, the agitation for an American Jewish Congress. In all these events the Order took an eminent part; it showed itself ready to co-operate with other organizations, but it just as well proceeded on its own initiative, relieving distress, protecting the rights of the Jew as citizen here and abroad. It created the Anti-Defamation League and thus set itself resolutely against any and every calumny or misrepresentation tending to injure the Jewish reputation. It has a department for social work, realizing wisely the need of caring for Jewish delinquents. Above all, it has acted as the peace-maker in American Jewry. Certain of its own position, of its record of a beneficent activity spreading over seventy-five years, the Order can afford to put its own private interests, if it has any, aside and on all occasions to seek not glory for itself, but the welfare of the house of Israel.

True to its traditions, so soon as this great American nation entered into the war the Order made clear its unequivocal position on the side of the sacred duty and privilege of patriotism. It set into motion an organization for attending to the needs of the Jewish soldier and salior. For the time being, the ties that unite Israel, and so also our Order, throughout the world are necessarily severed. When the time for reconstruction arrives the organization of the Order will step into the breach, to heal and restore, to minimize the after effects of this world catastrophe, to watch over the fate of our brethren in all lands where their civic status in antebellum days was unsatisfactory, and to help in the solution of many a problem which will present itself.

As at the beginning of its career, so today, on reaching the seventy-fifth anniversary of its birth, the Order knows no other cause than the welfare of Israel for the sake of humanity; it sides neither with conservative nor with radical, neither with Zion nor with anti-Zionist; it welcomes them all to its ranks, as brothers in a common cause, as professors of the same ancient faith.

OUTLIVED VIEWPOINTS

By DR. MAX HELLER

There is a German phrase which has the merit of terse clearness and which cannot be fully rendered into English, the phrase: Ueberwundener Standpunkt. We have no word which corresponds completely to the German Standpunkt. It signifies not merely a point of view, but an attitude towards life, a stand one has taken in the presence of vital problems; nor is it easy to render the full force of the struggle with which one gives up cherished, paramount views, as that struggle, that victory over one's stubborn self, are pictured in the German adjective. To call such mileposts on the road of our spiritual growth "Outlived Viewpoints" is to do violence to English phrasing, and yet only to have approached the content and the force of the German idiom.

All the same, it is interesting to pass review of a number of "outlived viewpoints" which modern Jewdom has to register in its evolution of the last few decades. The most striking of them, to my feeling, is our frank and fearless use, in public writing and speaking, of the words Jew and Jewish. Three or four decades ago it was not only the Gentile who feared to offend us by speaking of us as "Jews", but many of our own people, and not by any means only the timid and the squeamish among us went purposely out of the way of employing what seemed to them a name of scorn. Those were the days when the respectful Gentile pursed his lips with deferential caution to call us Israelites, and when the fashionable, cultured Jew liked to hear himself spoken of as an American Hebrew. Look through the polite literature, the better class of periodicals, the formal oratory of those days, and you will find that the words "Jew" and "Jewish" are skilfully fought shy of, as if they were infected with some sort of taint; it is "Hebrew" melodies, the "Hebrew" maiden or the modern Israelite and the Israelitish faith that are always referred to.

It may be boldly asserted that this particular ailment of verbal shyness and overnice camouflage can be traced, more or less, in all civilized languages; in Germany "Mosaic Faith" was a favorite bit of shame-faced daintiness; in French the Jewish heart was "le couer Israelite"; without an atom of positive knowledge along these lines, I boldly venture the assertion that the Russian and the Italian Jew, the Hungarian and the Polish Jew, in their turns, had their sensitive feelings spared by corresponding tender devices of elegant circumscription, in their respective vernaculars.

It took some time to make American press and American literature (as well as American public in general) understand that we do not regard the words Jew and Jewish as offensive terms, except when they are used in offensive ways (Jew girl, Jew Peddler, Jew tricks, to Jew down); but it was our own awakening to manliness, our own repudiation of discreditable veilings and cowardly euphemisms which brought about the change in ourselves first, and then in the habits and language of our fellow citizens.

There are other spiritual skin-sheddings, perhaps not as striking and conspicuous, because not of a surface character, which may be noted by the painstaking observer, as he scans prevailing notes and tendencies in the journalistic output, in sermon, lecture and conversation. Not so many years ago, in the hey-day of unbridled radicalism, we were treated to all sorts of iridescent theories which sounded marvelously liberal and delighted the lover of positive doctrine and airy phrase with the fascinations of their cocksure audacity.

Such a fine-spun theory was that of the daring phrase hero who put forth the seductive assertion that Judaism was a religion, and nothing else. Thence it followed, inevitably, that a Jew must be such in faith, and in nothing else. In all other, especially in all outward things, it must be his highest aspiration to be utterly undistinguishable from any other kind of American; such, of course, was the sacred and inviolable gospel of complete assimilation. I can speak of this particular bit of psychological absurdity from personal experience; some two and a half decades ago I was one of the sinners, black on white, in this very direction.

There was another class of fanciful spellbinders who declaimed, as intemperately and as blindly, in the opposite direction. According to them, Judaism was not a religion at all, it was a bundle of individualisms. The favorite paradox of these court interpreters of the Jewish dream was somewhat to this effect: They would solemnly avow that there was infinitely more in common between themselves and their Unitarian neighbors than with the Russian Jew in his grimy ghetto. On the surface, that was strikingly true, the very sort of shallow, glistening, specious fallacy to fling out to an unthinking mob of hearers or readers; but, as applied, not to a shifting present, but to a stupendous past and a speeding future, what dishonest standards of measurement, how false a reading of eternal values! When we must remember that we share, with our Russian brother a matchless history and the boldest of ideals, we having emerged from the conditions under which he is languishing, and he fighting his way to the opportunities we are enjoying! And then to say that we are nearer to the faith which evolved out of Christianity, and is proud to call itself Christian! After the pogroms and Zionism and the strides of the Russian Jew in our midst, who could be found nowadays to repeat such puerilities?

In an age of blossoming orators and the despotism of fine language it is natural that assertions, especially of the picturesque and astounding variety, should pass muster upon the strength of their rhetorical glamor, without being subjected to any sobering verifications by the light of historical fact and palpable reality, not to say of the unalterable laws of stubborn psychology. Such glittering assertions, which in their day tempted many of us to fall, assertions the garish luster of which has largely died out of them, are all of a class; they represent Jew and Judaism as setting at defiance the most fundamental laws of human soul life.

In religion, for instance, they insist on having the kernel without a protecting shell; a living faith without the symbolism, the expression, the constant practice of ceremonial observances; in the ghetto ages they claim to discern the miracle of a national soul living on for centuries without a national body (as if organization and cohesion along any other but geographical, political, linguistic lines could not constitute a bond just as strong, if not stronger); finally these same believers in a superman psychology used to be in the habit of declaiming (they have unlearned it for some time) that Israel had emerged from the ghetto, as had the three men from Nebuchadnezzar's furnace, without a smell of the burning on his garments.

Alas for the pitiless prose of disillusioning fact and immovable law! Israel and his faith, to be sure, are unique phenomena; but they must range themselves under the sway of nature's limitations; the kernel of ideas and sentiments needs the protecting shell of living habit and reverential expression, else it dies of the anemia of its abstractness, of its lack of touch with life. No soul of faith and ideal could have held a people together without that body of communal organization, of the sense of brotherhood, of shared experience and common interests and a whole world of customs and practices, all of which constitute the essence of the national bond; nor is it humanly possible to emerge out of centuries of dungeon life without bowed back, pale face and shaken nerves. All such acrobatics of dishonest self-exaltation in the teeth of grim reality only distort our sense of proportion and render our self-orientation in the modern life more difficult.

It will be said, with justice, that some of these "outlived viewpoints" are not yet as completely behind us as they should be; that, like the "outlived viewpoints" of other ages, they tend to linger. They are, all of them, more or less involved in another viewpoint which, entangled as it is with the most vehement of our partisan wrangles, seems far as yet from having been "outlived"; our unwillingness to admit that national elements are inextricably interwoven with our religion from its very origin, that every religion draws a great part of its strength from memories, associations, traditions and bonds of a distinctly national character; that, furthermore, the Jew of eastern Europe, having remained a distinct national entity amid his uncongenial, semi-barbarous surroundings, is entitled to rise to the dignity of a full-blown national existence; lastly, that out of the soil of nationality, reinforced by the power of sacred memories and lofty ideals, there may arise an actualization of political and social visions which will culminate in the sublimities of a spiritual faith, the redeeming pattern, to all mankind, of what it is in man, under a favoring social environment, to achieve.

The prejudice against nationalism and nationality we have still to outlive; our coolness towards Jerusalem, as something belonging to the dead past and a wretched present, most of us have not yet gotten over; we iterate and reiterate our pointless mouthings against animal sacrifices which no one dreams of restoring, or the Temple on Moriah, which no one thinks of rebuilding; to gather the dispersed of Israel is still, to us, a crime against those who prefer not to be gathered in; caught in the narrow grooves of our provincialism, we refuse to measure a world-wide question otherwise than with the yardstick of domestic interests.

Meantime, as if providentially, the last forty years have witnessed the hugest of all Jewish diasporas, that of the Russian Jew; recent immigrant that he is, in South Africa as in Siberia, in Japan as in Canada, in Paris as in New England, he bids fair to cement the Jewish world in wider plans of co-operation founded upon a deeper insight into underlying factors and abiding truths.

THE HISTORY OF ORGANIZATION IN JUDAISM

By Gotthard Deutsch

An Introduction Into the History of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith

(Part of 1st Chapter of History of I. O. B. B.)

Even the most primitive people who came under the observation of a student of economy or history possessed some kind of association. This was no accident. Let us present to ourselves a people that knows neither agriculture nor industry. Its members live exclusively on the results of fishing and hunting and of what the soil furnishes without cultivation, like berries, mushrooms and herbs. They will soon find out that even in spearing a big fish and in disposing of a deer "two are better than one". If they proceed to the beginnings of agriculture, they will find that at harvest season work in common proceeds more quickly. Agriculture is bound to produce a technical skill which not everybody possesses. Even the most primitive plow or harness, the most awkward cart, an ax, an arrow head and a hut require a certain skill which becomes a more prominent factor, the more accumulated experience develops.

So our Jewish communal organization goes back beyond the oldest documents that we possess. Long before Abraham pitched his tents the art of spinning and weaving had been invented, and when Joshua crossed the Jordan, his hosts found fortified cities which possessed a municipal government. Modern research in Egypt and Babylonia and excavations in Palestine have demonstrated beyond doubt that the skeptics of the old school, who declared the Biblical records to be myths, because such complex organization as they report could not have existed 2,400 years ago, were guided by narrower prejudice than the traditionalists whom they denounced.

The destruction of the Jewish commonwealth and the scattering of the Jews over distant parts of the universe required an adjustment of tradition, but could not obliterate it. We, therefore, had undoubtedly in Alexandria, in Rome, in Tripoli and on the banks of the Tigris groups of Jews organized into communities and within these communities constituent organizations created for certain specific purposes of communal life. Unfortunately our sources are meager and unsystematic even in the small quantity of facts which they contain. It could not be otherwise. Everywhere our ancestors were persecuted. Mobs, storming a synagogue had no great respect for history. People who have to wander about, not knowing where their weary feet shall find a resting place, will not carry excess baggage, and last, but not least, historic interest must be founded on a feeling of buoyancy which is not at home where worry over tonight's lodging and over tomorrow's bread is straining all mental and physical energies

The oldest organizations of which we have any record seem to have been those that took care of the burial of the dead. Naturally so. There was the ancient longing to be united in death with one's beloved. The pyramids in Egypt and the stories of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob testify to this fact. Only a few could like Abraham take the hint of Ephron that a plot of ground, worth 400 shekel, was a small matter between friends. Most people had to use a common burying ground which had to be acquired, laid out and kept by some kind of an organization. It further could not fail that in many instances the relicts of the dead were by tender age, sickness, as in case of epidemics, and finally by mental depression incapacitated from performing their duty. Those who had seen such cases would not wait for the emergency, but would organize in order to meet it, should it arise.

Talmudic literature is mostly concerned with law and delights in figuring out the most subtle complications. The rabbis discuss very seriously the case of a funeral which must have taken such a long time that those who carried the stretcher had to miss their prayers. The Talmud speaks of relays and decides which relay is bound to recite the prayer and which is absolved from this duty, but the rabbis did not find it necessary to tell us anything about the organization of these "bearers of the litter". (Berakot, Mishnah, III, 1). We possess a little more information from a later period. Rabbi Hamnuna, who lived in the fourth or fifth century in Babylonia, tells a story how he came to a city and heard that somebody had died, but found to his great astonishment that the people followed their avocations as usual. In his own town on such an occasion all work was suspended until the dead was buried. He was informed that this place had a special society that took care of every burial, and this satisfied him (Moed Katan, 27b). In another passage in the Talmud (Yer. Berakot, III, 1) we are told that the family must fast from the moment a death occurs in the house until they return from the funeral, but if there is an organization which takes care of the burial the fast is not required.

We have in these, as in most other cases, the law, but not the data about the organization. Even the law would not be quite intelligible, could we not supplement it from knowledge of still existing primitive conditions. In the Orient and in Eastern Europe a funeral is at once arranged when the person expires. Aaron Friedman, a descendant of the dynasty of the miracle-working rabbis of Sadagora, died Sept. 30, 1912, at 2 o'clock in the morning. No sooner had he expired when the sexton went through the town, waking everybody up with the wail: "The 'Rebbe' has died". Everybody rushed to the cemetery, the grave was dug, and the body buried, as soon as the ritual ablutions and the prescribed dressing were finished. In Jerusalem today, when a Haham dies, the beedle of the Bet Din goes through the street, announcing: "Stop all labor". We can easily understand that only through an organization such an order could have been carried out. Yet we know nothing about the constitution and the by-laws of such an organization. Moses ben Nahman, who was rabbi in Barcelona in the thirteenth century and the greatest authority in his section of the country, gives us the fact of a regular organization taking care of the burial in every community, but even he fails to inform us on the details of its constitution. Half a century after him, Nissim ben Reuben of Barcelona mentions a society, "Kebarim" (graves), among others, like "Maor" (light), evidently established for the purpose of providing the light for the synagogue. There may have existed earlier organizations of a similar kind, for the Talmud (Sabbath, 106 a) records the rule that if a member of the society (Haburah) dies, all members shall mourn for him. In this case, however, the "Haburah" is probably an organization of strict observers of the law of purity and a remnant of the Essenes, therefore more a sect than a social organization. An old prayer of uncertain origin, but probably dating back to the seventh century, still retained in our ritual, speaks of the "holy associations" (Haburata Kaddishata) of Babylonia and Palestine. In this case the word "Habura" stands probably for what we call congregations and the epithet "Holy" means religious.

The examples cited show the difficulty with which the student of the subject has to contend who is completely in the dark as to the meaning of the terms used and the date of his sources. In other instances, writers, exaggerating the importance of a find, are misled by their desire to give greater antiquity to their discovery. Gerson Wolf (1823-1892), who did some valuable work for Jewish history in Austria, especially in Vienna, claims to have discovered an invitation to an annual banquet of the Hebra Kaddisha in Vienna, dated 1320. The script and the names clearly show that the real date of the document is 1720. While the sources differ as to detail, we may take it for granted that the organization of special societies for the care of the sick and for the arrangement of burials which we find all over the Jewish world under the name of "Hebra Kaddisha", usually with a sub-title, such as "True Benevolence" (Hesed shel Emeth, Gemiluth, Hasadim, Gomele Hesed, etc.), began in the sixteenth century. David Gans, the Jewish historian, a native of Westfalia, who died in Prague, 1613, makes Akiba Frankfurter, who died in 1593, the originator of the societies (Kuppah). Other authors of the same period refer to the famous rabbi of Prague, Loewe ben Bezalel (c. 1530-1609), as the originator of the Hebra Kaddisha of that city Again other sources assign this organization to Eliezer Treves, Loewe's predecessor, who died as rabbi of Frankfort in 1563, and Elijah Spira, also rabbi of Prague, who died in 1712, gives 1609 as the date of the foundation of the Hebra Kaddisha of this city.

These instances show the difficulty of the subject clearly. David Gans calls charitable and religious organizations "Kuppah". In Fuerth and in Frankfort the burial organizations are still called "Kippe". In other old congregations we find the same name used for study circles, so in Worms, 1655, and in Mayence, 1713. In the parlance of the German Jews today the word is still being used for partnership in business, and from this it passed into the argot of crooks, who absorbed quite a number of Hebrew words, for a scheme to practice fraud. A trial of a band of counterfeiters held in Saxony in 1763, created the term "Kipper und Wipperzeit", and the archives of Hildesheim preserve the documents of a case against the Christian Otto Dittmann and his Jewish accomplice, Selcke Schay, under the title "Acta betreffend die Inquisition . . . wegen Kipperei, 1621-1623". Thus the meaning of certain terms is in constant flux, and not even always identical at the same time in various environments. One should also imagine that David Gans, who lived in Prague at the same time as Loewe ben Bezalel and speaks highly of him, would not have deprived the rabbi whom he admired, of the credit due to him for an important communal activity, and would not have ascribed this merit to Loewe's teacher, Akiba of Frankfort. On the other hand, in a document of unquestioned authenticity, the elders of the congregation of Prague in a petition to the government, speak of Eliezer Treves as the author of their communal constitution. Finally, Elijah Spira, while living more than a century later, was a careful collector of everything that pertained to the tradition of the venerable "Kehillah" to which his family had given a number of prominent rabbis for over two centuries.

We can therefore merely say that the evidence, while conflicting in detail, points with fair unanimity to the fact that the regular organization of burial societies dates back to the latter part of the sixteenth century. The society "Gemiluth Hasadim" of Verona celebrated its tercentenary in 1899, and it may be presumed that his was done on the ground of documents. The congregation of Amsterdam, established by fugitives from the Spanish and Portuguese Inquisition towards the end of the sixteenth century, had its Bikkur Holim society in 1609. Hamburg also established by fugitives from the Inquisition somewhat later had a similar society in 1652. Juspe Hahn, who did for Frankfort what Elijah Spira did for Prague, collecting carefully all religious practices of his native city, speaks of such a society as an established institution, and as he died in 1636 as an old man, this society must have dated back to the sixteenth century. Rome had a society, "Hayyim wa-Hesed" (Charitable Life), in 1656, and Moses Galante and Yom Tob Zahalon, who lived in Italy during the latter part of the sixteenth and the earlier part of the seventeenth centuries, discuss in their decisions of legal cases bequests made to such institutions called as in medieval Spain "Hebrat Kebarim". Finally we possess publications dealing with the ritual used at deathbed and graves, printed in Italy in the beginning of the seventeenth century. A copy of such a book, entitled "Balm for the Soul", printed in Mantua, 1619, contains on the flyleaf the list of members with the turn of their duty. The cabbalist, Aaron Berechiah Modena, published in Mantua, 1626, a ritual to be used at the bedside of the dying and at a burial called "Crossing the Jabbok", which with some alterations is still widely being used. It contains, as may be noted right here for curiosity's sake, a ritual for the dedication of a new cemetery which requires that a rooster be killed over the first open grave. This ceremony was still practiced by Rabbi Bernard Illowy (1814-1874), then in Syracuse, N. Y., in 1857. I know the fact only through a polemical article in Einhorn's Sinai, where a report in the Deborah is given as source, but the volume of the Deborah, in which the original correspondence and Rabbi Illowy's justification of his decision were published, is nowhere to be had, another case of the difficulties which a Jewish historian will constantly experience.

While the duty of the living to the dead occupies an important part in Jewish communal institutions, it naturally does not monopolize their activity. This duty is in some respect considered foremost, for in legal casuistry the burial of the dead (Meth Mizwah) precedes all other religious functions, and we of the older generation, brought up in small towns, where there was no newspaper, remember the sexton passing through the ghetto and calling out in a doleful drawl: "Mays Mizvo", which was the announcement that the funeral was about to start. Yet the Talmud (Mishnah, Peah, I, 7) gives to the study of the Torah the highest rank among all religious acts. This appreciation carries with it the provision for the teaching of the Torah. Expressions of the [illegible] of teaching and notes on regular [illegible]tions for the education of the [illegible] are very numerous in rabbinical literature. The experience that from the children of the poor the Torah shall go forth, occasional anecdotes, though legendary, of poor students who overcame all difficulties and obstacles and finally rose to prominence, of some who worked as rail splitters in order to be able to pay for their tuition, show that there were organizations for the instruction of the poor, which as "Talmud Torahs", maintained partly [illegible] funds and partly by assessments on the well to do, have survived to this day.

A systematic effort for the care of the dependent, as the aged and the orphans, seems to date from a much later period. At any rate the oldest documentary evidence which I was able to discover in spite of diligent research, does not go beyond the eighteenth century. Special religious obligations, like providing light for the synagogue, seem to be very old. They are mentioned in an ancient prayer, again unfortunately of very uncertain date, which asks for God's blessing for those "who donate oil for the light, wine for the Sabbath service, bread for the strangers, and gifts for the poor". It is not said, however, that this was done by organized societies. We know, however, from the beginning of the seventeenth century, when mysticism took a strong hold of the people, leading to the Messianic delirium of the Sahabbetai Zebi movement in 1666, of numerous societies in Italy and in Germany, calling themselves "awakers of the morning" or "waiters for the morning" and who asseembled before daybreak in the synagogue. or in a study room, where they studied Cabbala or recited mystic prayers. There is one organization which fortunately we have outlived. It existed in the large seaports, like Venice, Leghorn and Amsterdam, where pirates brought the prisoners whom they had captured to sell them into slavery or where the first news came of prisoners, made by armies engaged in regular warfare. The wars between Turkey and Venice were responsible for many cases of emergency relief. I remember with a feeling of awe how I stood in front of the iron gate of the old cemetery of Malta, acquired by the society for the redemption of captives in Leghorn. The island was in the possession of the Knights of St. John. No Jew was permitted to set his foot on this sacred soil, unless he was brought there as a good prize and held, until through his family or friends, or in case of poor people, through charitable organizations, the arbitrarily exacted ransom was paid. The law which could prohibit Jews from living on the island could not prevent them from dying before ransom had been paid. It was a lot, more dreaded than prison, to be thrown into the sea after death or to be buried in a place where the carcasses of animals were interred. The Hebra "Pidyon Shebuyim" of Leghorn finally obtained from the Knights the privilege to acquire a cemetery, where these dead should find their resting place. It is a touching illustration of the pathos of Jewish history and at the same time a noble testimony to the idealism of the poor victims of a tyranny which scorned Judaism as a religion of empty formalities, while its followers, when fasting and doing penance, proclaimed as the object of their penance "to loose the fetters of wickedness, and to let the oppressed go free, to deal the bread out to the hungry and to bring the outcast into the house, to cover the naked and not to hide thyself from thy own flesh".

ITALY AND THE JEWS OF ROUMANIA

Protests Against Discriminations in Treaty of Bucharest and Pledges Itself to Secure for Jews of Roumania Permanent Position of Equality

Mr. Nahum Sokolow, in London, has received from the Italian ambassador, acting on the instructions of Foreign Minister Sonino, a communication in which the following passage appears:

"The Italian Government recognizing that the provisions contained in the Treaty of Bucharest of May 7th, 1918, between Roumania and the Central Powers relating to religious equality in Roumania, are, so far as the Jews are concerned, less liberal than those which the Roumanian Government itself had spontaneously promised to grant, now declares that at the final settlement of the Roumanian question it will use its best endeavors to secure for the Jews in Roumania a settlement which will definitely assure them a permanent position of equality."

Similar official declarations with regard to securing full equality for the Jews of Roumania have been made by Great Britain and France.

The Ten General Conventions of the I. O. B. B.

By Hon. Simon Wolf

In 1868 the General Convention was substituted for the Annual Convention, which had up to that time been the chief governing body of the Order. Mr. Julius Bien summarized the causes which brought about the change as follows:

"A General Convention of the Order had become a necessity in order to harmonize the different interests as manifested in the various Districts, to make such changes in the organic law as to adapt it to the great expansion which the Order had assumed, and to give a wider scope to its development by imposing as little restraint as possible on the various Districts.

The growth of the Order was so rapid and unexpected that the laws, passed from time to time for its direction and regulation, could not keep pace with it. In its incipient state it was guided and directed by the men who had been most active in its organization, and it needed the supervision of these men and their co-laborers to insure for it a straight and steady course.

"Its government, therefore, breathed a spirit of centralization, placed the direction of its affairs into the hands of a few representatives, entrusted the shaping of its policy and its principles to a small number of men to whom the members looked, deservedly, with confidence and trust, and whose counsels they were ever ready to follow. The more the supreme power was confined to a few directing spirits, the better the Order could be controlled and its course marked out.

"With the establishment of new District Lodges, however, and the spread of the Order into more distant regions, a change in the form of government became necessary. Men had come forward and taken an active interest in the affairs of the Order, to whom the reverence and the glory that clung around the original founders and fathers of the Order were known as traditions of the past only, and the spirit of democracy, or the government of the people by the people, on which the government and the society of this country is based, made itself manifest in various Districts. People were averse to obey laws in the making of which they had not been consulted, to be ruled by persons no matter how great their merits and how acknowledged their wisdom and disinterestedness, in whose election they had no part. They did not desire a central directory, passing laws, rules and regulations which interfered with the internal affairs of Districts or Lodges; they were willing to work in one common spirit, for one common good, but insisted on retaining their liberty in the management of their local affairs and their freedom in the choice of the means to carry out the common object. They were well satisfied to comply with laws which would embody the general principles underlying the order, and which would promote its growth and extension, leaving such limited powers only to an executive department as would be necessary to constitute a cohesive and uniform organization. It was believed that with fewer laws and with less general direction on the part of an executive head a larger field for independent development would be given and greater usefulness be obtained.

"Contention, strife and discord prevailed frequently in the councils of the constituent assemblies; the views of the representatives of one section of the country were often diametrically opposed to those of another section, and the opposition manifested in their assemblies bore often that irreconcilable party character which endangered the very existence of the Order. It could not be otherwise, as long as men representing the views and tendencies of the Lodges in one part of the country were called upon to legislate for the other part, and direct the internal affairs of Districts that entertained entirely different ideas.

"The diversity of opinions manifested in the meetings of the Constitution Grand Lodge were carried by the representatives to their various localities, and instead of harmony, good feeling and brotherly love, there was created prejudice, jealousy and party spirit.

"The General Convention was called with a view to infuse new life into the Order, to reconcile existing differences by abrogating all laws which interfered with the free action of the various Districts and brought into conflict the interests of one District with those of the others, as far as their local affairs were concerned. The system of centralization, prevalent in the Order until then, should give place to one of decentralization; little or no power to be entrusted to a central administration, and the internal development of the various Districts be left in the hands of their own representatives to be guided and shaped according to the wants and requirements of each particular section, and the Lodges be sovereign within their own Lodge room.

"In short, the government of the Order, which had retained the character of an autocratic power, was to be transformed into a purely representative one in which the people, the members of the Order, possessed all the power, and the bodies that were looked upon until then as standing outside and above the people, would be the mere exponents of their will, the representatives of their sovereignty".

"First Constitution Convention"

On June 19, 1868, the first General Convention was held in the city of New York. One hundred and four delegates, elected one from each Lodge, responded to the call. Each Lodge was entitled to one representative. The representatives could be elected from any lodge of the Order, thus I was the choice of Poughkeepsie Lodge of New York. It was a notable gathering of Jewish leaders and the rivalry to preside was worthy of the Order and gave promise of great and useful work. After a heated campaign Mr. Adolph Moses of Chicago was elected permanent Chairman. He filled the post with ability. The first important action taken was the adoption of a motion by Mr. Henry Greenbaum to reconsider the law which made a delegate eligible only if he had served as President of a Lodge. Thus I was admitted as a delegate to the Convention, although I had not served as President of a Lodge. Then the law was reenacted. It was my advent into the General Conventions, and I am the only living member of every Convention since.

The Preamble and the Constitution were framed in that Convention by the master mind of Julius Bien, providing for the complete government of the Order, without trespassing on the rights of the District Grand Lodges. Two important bodies were created by the Convention, namely, the Executive Committee of the Order and the Court of Appeals.

District Grand Lodge No. 6 was created at that Convention. The dedication of the Cleveland Orphan Asylum had preceded the Convention, and that magnificent Home was heartily endorsed.

"Second Constitution Convention"

The second Convention of the Order met in Chicago in 1874. I was elected presiding officer by acclamation.

The right of a Grand Lodge to enact laws creating an endowment fund was declared to form one of the legitimate objects and within the scope of the Order, the Roumanian Mission was endorsed, the "Statue of Religious Liberty" was authorized and a Gold Medal for heroic services at Memphis during the Yellow Fever epidemic was presented to Brother A. E. Frankland.

The integrity of the Order was seriously threatened by differences between Districts Nos. 2 and 6. So acrimonious did the debate become that the entire delegation of No. 6, reinforced by Brother E. M. Friedlein of New York, arose and were about leaving the hall. Brother Philip Stein of Chicago (thank Heaven, still with us) and Brother Aaron Haas of Atlanta (lately deceased) wrote on my seventieth birthday that I had saved the Order and that by my skill as Chairman I swayed the Convention into enthusiasm and harmony.

It was the last time that Rev. Dr. Isaac M. Wise and Rabbi S. H. Sonnenshein were seen in Conventions of the Order. Dr. Wise was deeply and sincerely interested to get the Order to pay an annual stipend to educate orphan boys in the Union College. Brother Bien opposed the measure on the ground of "Church and State". These differences led to an estrangement of these great leaders, which in due course of time grew more bitter; both men hit hard, as men of conviction always do. Time, which heals all things, brought again a reconciliation, which is more fully described in the Sixth Convention, held in Cincinnati.

"Third Constitution Convention"

On Jan. 26, 1879, the Third Convention of the Order met in Philadelphia. There was a great deal of rivalry who should be elected Chairman. They finally agreed that, inasmuch as I had done so well in 1874, that they re-elect me, and so, without desiring it, I was again chosen. The "Statue of Religious Liberty" which had been dedicated in 1876, was visited speeches made and all felt proud of this patriotic work of the Order. There had been great trouble to raise the money to pay the sculptor, some of the Lodges opposing the erecting as being contrary to Orthodox Judaism. I had as a last resort to make a tour of the Lodges, and finally succeeded.

The ritual was again modified. Representation by proxy in the meetings of the Constitution Grand Lodge was abolished, meetings of the Court of Appeals were provided for, and the mode of enforcing the laws by the Executive Committee determined. The Convention declared in favor of the publication of a History of the Order.

"Fourth Constitution Convention"

The Fourth General Convention was held in the city of New York, on March 1, 1885. Again the election of a presiding officer took up much time. Able men were contending. Finally Brother Philip Stein of Chicago was elected, and no one displayed more ability than our gifted brother, who is still here to guide our Order. The Convention was attended by 254 delegates, and as it proved rather an unyielding body, a law was enacted to restrict representatives.

The Preamble to the Constitution was modified. A method for amending the Constitution by direct vote of the Lodges was adopted. District Courts were established. The Convention resolved as one of the purposes of the Order to aid persecuted co-religionists in all parts of the world and to further the interests of Judaism at large. District Grand Lodge No. 8 was created.

"Fifth Constitution Convention"

For the first time in the history of the Order, the Convention met on southern soil in the city of Richmond, Va., on the first day of June, 1890. It was by common consent that the Hon. William Lovenstein, a State Senator of the Commonwealth, should preside, and this selection was in every way justified. Mr. Lovenstein stood high as an American and as a Jew. It may be said that this Convention gathered a more representative body of Jews than any other gathering of the Order up to that time.

This Convention closed forever the activities of Brother Benj. F. Peixotto. Each and every one felt that the end of a great and beneficent career had come. His closing speech, full of pathos and eloquence, still lingers in memory. A noble American, a devout Jew, an unselfish brother of the Order, a few months later he crossed the Bar.

"Sixth Constitution Convention"

The Sixth General Convention was held in Cincinnati, Ohio, April 28, 1895. Brother W. A. Gans of New York was elected Chairman. He made a record for prompt and impartial decision. It was in this Convention that Brother Adolf Kraus became prominent as a leader, debater and diplomat—a position he has filled ever since. The feud between Dr. Wise and Brother Bien still existed. Few know that the attacks on Bien and the Order had driven Bien to have papers drawn up to arrest Dr. Wise for libel. My love and affection for these great men caused me to bring them together, and it was a remarkable scene when they clasped hands. A characteristic incident occurred. We called at the doctor's house; we waited for him. Directly he came, and he said, with that wonderful play of humor, "There has been so much dirty linen washed that I had to put on a clean shirt", worthy of Sidney Smith. Dr. Wise was a constructive force, his foresight in taking orphan boys from B'nai B'rith homes led to enriching the American pulpit, and these men in turn became advocates and leaders in and of the Order.

"Seventh Constitution Convention"

After twenty-six years' interval, the Convention again met in Chicago on April 29, 1900. Mr. Victor Abraham, worthy son of Joseph Abraham, was chosen Chairman, and he proved his mettle in every way.

It was a memorable Convention. The younger element was clamorous and dominant for leadership, and Julius Bien, a scholar and scientist, after thirty-two years of active service for God and man, was elected Chancellor of the Order, a position of honor, and Leo N. Levi was Chosen President. In speaking of the work of that Convention, Brother Levi said: "Every proposition looking to the advancement of the Jews was considered with the utmost care, debated in the most fraternal spirit and acted upon with the fullest sense of responsibility. The most prominent sentiment that found expression was the determination to further every effort in the interest of the Jews without regard to where the credit of success should be lodged".

Mr. Levi, in making a pronouncement of B'nai B'rith principles and policy at that Convention, said, among other things:

"It has been said that we are entering upon a new era in the destiny of the Jew. I believe that, I believe it firmly. I stated years ago that I believed that the salvation of Judaism was the American-born Jew. I have traveled over this land, and I find our young men and our young women, unversed as they are in the old traditional forms and ceremonies, strangers to the ritual around which cling so many tender memories in the minds of our older people, yet animated, inspired and uplifted by the quickening love which they bear to the old ancestral faith and craving for media of expression for that feeling. They seek it in good works, in charitable deeds, in the amelioration of the condition of our fellowmen; and I believe that when we bring to them the mission which has sustained us so long, when we make apparent to them that here is the field for their activity, we will gain from them that co-operation in the need of which we so sorely stand. But we must carry our wares to them, we must inspire them with the courage that has sustained us, and with the infusion of new spirit and new energy and new aspiration create a new epoch, not for ourselves but for the people for whom this Order stands. And it does stand for the people—the greatest organization among the Jews known in the history of the world, spread over all the world, conducted by its representative men, it stands for the Jew and for Judaism".

Brief as the official career of Leo N. Levi was, it was filled with ability, and his record will forever stand as unsurpassed. He died universally lamented, and is at this hour an inspiration. His monument should have the legend, "Kishineff and Removal Work".

I was vice-president in 1900, and many of my friends wanted me to be chosen president, but the stock argument was "too old", but, nevertheless, after Brother Levi's untimely death, the Executive Committee elected me to fill the unexpired term. It is not for me to say how I discharged the duty imposed. One thing is sure, I gave no evidence of age or senility, a lack of which, by the grace of God, I can still claim.

"Eighth Constitution Convention"

On March 19, 1905, the Eighth General Convention met in the City of New Orleans, La. As a tribute to the memory of Brother Leo N. Levi, his brother Godcheaux was elected President of the Convention, and aside from this tribute for a great leader, his brother dignified the position and proved to be a fine parliamentarian. I had definitely stated that I would not accept an election as president of the Order. Caucuses were held and many names canvassed, and finally Brother Adolf Kraus was persuaded to accept, and he was elected. A humorous incident in connection with this election happened. To induce Brother Jacob Furth to accept the position, Mr. Kraus tried all of his tact. Finally Furth said: "Why, Kraus, if I was to accept I would not live a year; you accept". (Great laughter.) And then there came to leadership the wise counselor, the conservative yet firm and resolute Adolf Kraus, who has so far filled and, let us hope will yet fill for many years, this post of honor. The advent of Brother Kraus brought a Secretary of the Executive Committee, A. B. Seelenfreund, whose wonderful ability has strengthened and encouraged the Order at home and abroad. One of the most affecting scenes of the Convention was the speech of Brother Thalmessinger of New York, a giant physically and mentally. He swayed his audience to laughter and to tears, and not many months after he passed to eternal rest. The reception at the home of Mr. Isidore Newman was a memorable function. Brother Bien was not at this Convention; illness prevented. All missed the genial companionship of the eminent brother and that of his charming wife. Brother Bien did not live to see the Convention of 1910. It was my privilege and honor to pay a loving tribute to his great character. He was a tower of strength. Aside from his great services nationally, his fame rests with the founding of the Order internationally. In the various departments of the government at Washington his name and work stands foremost among all of his competitors. The Order owes eternal recognition to Brother Bien.

"Ninth Constitution Convention"

The Ninth General Convention met in April, 1910, in the nation's capital city, Washington, D. C. I had promised, "old as I was", to meet the brethren and to see to it that they had a royal time. I am sure I was there to greet them, and I hope they had a good and royal time.

NEWS FROM LONDON

By Our Correspondent Dr. M. Epstein

London, Aug. 14, 1918.

Since the last London letter was printed on this page we have had the pleasure of welcoming in our midst two groups of visitors from the United States, who were given a right royal welcome. The one was the American Zionist Medical Unit, the other was the latest contingent of American recruits for the Judaean regiment. The first could not but seize on the imagination of all thinking men and women. These members of the Medical Unit were going to Palestine, that ancient country which was being reborn. From the extreme West they were proceding to the East; from the land of unlimited practical possibilities, where modern capitalism and all that it denotes has developed to a high state of perfection, they were turning to the dream-land of the Lebanon, with its thousand-year-old mysteries. And what was the object of their mission? To bring relief to those who suffer, to bind up wounds, to help to rebuild human bodies that threatened to decay; in a word, to be ministering angels where assistance was most necessary. Be it noted that the Medical Unit has dedicated itself to work among the civil population in Palestine.

All this was much, but it does not exhaust the reasons for the very hearty welcome accorded to the visitors. They came from the great Jewish community across the ocean, representing as it were a mighty link binding the Jewries of England and America in a fast bond of friendship. The sincerity of the first welcome given to the doctors and the nurses was convincing proof that we in London were really moved by these men and women, and by their prospective work in Palestine. The women Zionists arranged for a reception at the Savoy Hotel, and our American friends were made to feel that they were deeply appreciated. Mr. Herbert Samuel spoke in his usual finished fashion, voicing the feelings of everybody present, and the Chief Rabbi, who spoke later in the evening, was also at his best. It seemed as though the occasion brought out the noblest sentiments, making the visitors feel that the labor and the hardships in front of them were all worth while.

If the Jewish community was warm in its reception of these visitors, no less cordial was the greeting they received outside. They had the honor of being received by Mr. Arthur Balfour, who is not unknown in America, and in his address to them our foreign secretary declared that "the influence of that great national revival known as Zionism, would be felt not only by those Jews who would settle in Palestine, but also by Jewery in every country of the world, and even by the other nations of humanity, for though Palestine was but a small country, the good which it had done for mankind was immeasurable".

It is needless to add that the members of the unit were deeply moved by these words of the great statesman. But he did not overlook the practical side of the problem. "The destruction of Judea that occurred nineteen centuries ago was one of the great wrongs which the Allied Powers were trying to redress", Mr. Balfour added. Coming from this source, the statement is of first-rate importance. The Allies were striving to redress old wrongs; the Central Powers were doing all they could to heap up fresh wrongs. "Righteousness exalteth a nation". The British Empire has always stood for righteousness and fair play, and justice were things which an Englishman understood and practiced. War tries the nerves and patience of the most stolid of peoples. There may be newspaper "stunts", as they are called, which mark out the Jew for unfair treatment, as other "stunts" mete out unfair treatment to other sections of the population. But these are temporary hysterics on the part of people with short tempers and irritable nerves. Deep down in the consciousness of the British people the sense of right still lives; the shouters are blinded for the moment by a groundless fear, of which, when sanity returns, they will themselves be ashamed; and Mr. Balfour's declaration outweighs the silly barks of the agitated men and women who are afraid of shadows. The onenities make a loud noise. Mr. Balfour's statement is a declaration of policy on which the world may rely.

Nor was Mr. Balfour's the only welcome accorded to the Medical Unit. A second time there was a demonstration at the London Opera House, and the enthusiasm which characterized this was not one whit less than on the first occasion, an impression of which appeared in these columns some months back. Again the magnificent hall was packed from ceiling to floor; again the crowds were moved by an enthusiasm which only great causes can engender; again the speeches contained sentiments which live. There were many speakers on the platform who supported Lord Rothschild, the chairman of the gathering; the "star" speaker was the Rt. Hon. G. N. Barnes, Member of Parliament and of the War Cabinet. Himself a labor man, Mr. Barnes could not but sympathize with the rebirth of Palestine. But he stated that he brought to that meeting the greetings of the War Cabinet, and his words are therefore worth repeating:

"Irrespective of race or religion", Mr. Barnes said, "we look to Palestine as the Holy Land. From it there came those great moral inspirations which still guide the life and conduct of half the world. From it there issued forth those wondrous influcnces of which the mind of man can scarcely yet conceive the full meaning. It has been the inestimable privilege of the Allies in this war to have rescued this land, consecrated by religion and history, from the sacrilegious hands of the German and the Turk, who have slain and enslaved the people. It will be their greater privilege to rebuild the holy places, to create conditions under which opportunities will be given to all peoples to live together in tolerance and mutual help. It will be the aim of Zionism once more to make Palestine a fountain of knowledge and idealism, and by the creating of places of knowledge and education, open to all, again to clothe ancient truths in modern garb. The British government proclaimed its policy of Zionism because it believes that Zionism was identified with the policy and aims for which good men and women are struggling everywhere. (Cheers.) That policy is the policy of the Allies in this war. It is the policy to which we are pledged; it is the policy which we believe accords with the wishes of vast numbers of the Jewish people, many of whom have cast wistful eyes to Palestine as again destined to be their national home".

If the Medical Unit is going to Palestine to relieve suffering, the American Judaeans are going there to reduce suffering to a minimum. For they are going to fight for Palestine, and when the land has been rescued, we hope it will be placed under tolerable government. The American Judaeans were therefore also sure of a welcome. Not only were they present at the opera house demonstration, but they were given a special luncheon (a repetition of the arrangements made in the case of the first batch), and a number of synagogues afforded them hospitality, not only for spiritual but also for bodily refreshment. The most noteworthy example is that of the Berkeley Street Synagogue, the congregation of British Jews. It is a sign of the times, a welcome sign, that the "Reformed" wing of the community should thus publicly bear witness to its interest in Palestine. It only demonstrates, if proof were needed, that the country has a marvelous hold on all those, Jews or Gentiles alike, who have a heart and a mind to realize all that it connotes.

And this leads us to a remark made by that wise philosopher, Achad Ha'am, at a recent Zionist festivity. He asked Jews not to lose their heads over Palestine. Achad Ha'am is among the keenist Zionists and the great lovers of the Holy Land. There was no disappointment within him when he uttered those words. But his meaning is plain Amid the declarations and the welcomes, all very necessary, very agreeable, and very encouraging, let not the wood be overlooked for the trees. In the first place, the Palestinian revival will be difficult. Those who put their shoulders to the wheel will have to work hard before the foundations are laid for a worthy life in the country A worthy life—a life worth while—both materially and spiritually. Materially that will be comparatively easy. But spiritually! What a task is there before the pioneers. A Jewish life in Palestine, worthy of Jewish ideals. in accord with Jewish traditions, will be something new in the world, something unique, a model and a meteyard of a great society. For generations thinkers have striven to describe the model society. From Plato and Aristotle right through the ages to Graham Wallas in our own days, fine ideals have been set forth only to be regretted in actual life. Modern states can hardly be said to satisfy the best that these thinkers have set up as ideals. In Palestine there will be an opportunity to establish a truly great society founded on Justice, that Jewish ideal which has seldom been meted out to the Jew. There are some philosophers who declare that in spite of the Christian veneer, modern civilization is heathen at heart. If this indictment is true, there is much for the Jew to do in Palestine. Not the heathen, but the Jewish spirit must predominate there. Many fine and delicate questions will call for solution. What will be the attitude of the great society in Palestine towards art and music and literature, much of which is an expression of heathen ideals and sentiments? The question need not be faced in fear and trembling. All the world will necessarily have to take stock of the past, and lay down solid foundations for the future. We want to make the world "safe for democracy". We want to banish war and the fear of war from off the face of the earth. We want to set up a keener sense of the brotherhood of man, a doctrine preached in a thousand churches on Sundays and dishonored in the hurley-burley of the every-day life during the rest of the week. We want to root out the germ of militarism from modern life. Will the Jewish commonwealth in Palestine have anything to teach the world on all these questions? The world has been glad enough to learn from Jews before; it will receive what Jews can offer now. The prophets are not numerous; and the voice of Justice and religion is not particularly strong. What Jews make of Palestine will therefore be of the utmost consequence for the world. And when Achad Ha'am bids Jews retain their mental outlook, he is probably thinking of these deeper questions, which are higher than the mere physical resettlement. Perhaps he himself will be ready to give utterance to words of wisdom at the right moment.

Before we leave the subject of Palestine one most interesting fact must be recorded. Recruitment for the British Army has been opened in Palestine for the native Jews, who were most anxious to join the forces. In a very short time after the office was opened, a satisfactory number of Jews, Bokharan, Arabian, Palestinian, took the oath of allegiance with apparent pleasure and satisfaction, and are now in training. Not only the men themselves but their women-kind were very anxious for their association with the British army, and if any testimony were required of the excellence of British rule in occupied Palestine or of the satisfaction of the population, surely this incident would be convincing.

In Anglo-Jewry the only news of any import during the summer months has been the adventures of Dr. Gaster with his congregation. It may not be generally known in the States that the ecclesiastical organization of Anglo-Jewry rests upon three pillars. The broadest and strongest is represented by the United Synagogue; the oldest by the Sephardi congregation; and the youngest by the "Reform" Synagogue at Berkeley Street. Over the first the Chief Rabbi presides; the third has its own religious heads; and the second is shepherded by the Haham or Chief Rabbi of its own, an office held for the last generation by Dr. Moses Gaster. Dr. Gaster is too well known among Jews the world over to need an introduction. But in reality there were two Dr. Gasters. One was the Very Rev. Dr. Gaster, Haham, the clergyman; the other was just Dr. Gaster, the man of affairs, the scholar, the orator, the folklorist. A charming personality united these two characters, which if they had possessed only good qualities would have dominated Anglo-Jewry. But we are none of us perfect, and the Haham somehow did not quite hit it off with his flock. It is difficult to explain the fact, but fact it is. We can see it now. The flock has resolved, no doubt after much searching of heart, to sever its connection with its shepherd, and with the commencement of 1919 the Very Rev. Dr. Gaster, Haham, will in all probability have ceased to exist. But fortunately the other Dr. Gaster will still be with us, Dr. Gaster, the man of affairs, the scholar, the orator, the folklorist, and the charming personality will continue to make all these qualities supremely attractive. As a Brother of the Order, as a Past President of the First Lodge of England, as an active member still, we cannot refrain from expressing the hope that Dr. Gaster will continue for many and many a year to adorn all things to which he puts his hand, to labor as before in the cause of mankind and of Jewry, and to contribute to sound learning the same quality of work as his pen has already produced.

Meanwhile the ancient congregation of Spanish and Portuguese Jews [illegible] dates its origin to the time of [illegible] II and bases its just pride on an ancestry going back to the [illegible] of Jewish history when the [illegible] race was settled in the Iberian Peninsula—the congregation is likely to be without a spiritual chief. Whether it will amalgamate with the larger wing of Jewry is doubtful, despite the obvious economy in finance and nerves which such a process would inevitably bring with it. The post-bellum period will doubtless be one of retrenchment, and it would appear that synagogue retrenchment will be a necessity. Here then is an opportunity. The needs of the day point out a clear path; only the pride of generations is in the other scale. If the occasion were seized we might have a united Jewish flock in the British realms, and one Chief Rabbi would guide its destinies, blessed by unity and true fraternity. The old Sephardi tunes, which somehow respond to something deep within every Jew, need not be sacrificed; indeed, it might be an advantage if the non-Sephardi wing of the community gradually adopted them. But all this is speculation; the solid fact remains, and it is the dominating piece of news which the summer has brought forth in London that Dr. Gaster will be placed on the ecclesiastical retired list, leaving him ample leisure for literary, political and other work, to the benefit of all his brethren. His large heart has many brethren.

The First Lodge of England has necessarily had to curtail its activities. owing to the war. Many of the brethren are serving their country in the army, many are active in the nation's work in London. But all are greatly occupied, and the lodge has been forced to slacken its pace. But we shall pull through until the peace, and then when a new era of blessing opens on mankind, the lodge will not be backward in cultivating its little plot. Many urgent problems will have to be faced and a helping hand stretched out in many quarters. We shall be ready when the time comes. Meanwhile we are carrying on.

In the same book, already mentioned, "The Presidents I Have Known", a full account of the great banquet and other functions are mentioned in the sketch of President Taft. Mr. Martin A. Marks of Cleveland, Ohio, was elected President of the Convention, and as in his whole life, so Brother Marks in this, bore himself as a gentleman, a man of great resources. He, too, has passed to the immortals, leaving, as Secretary of War Baker said, "a record unsurpassed".

The Convention honored itself by reelecting Brother Kraus, whose message forms a historical document worthy of the Order and the civilizing forces the Order has inspired. After a most important session, whose influence is still potent, we adjourned to meet in San Francisco in 1915.

"Tenth Constitution Convention"

The Tenth General Convention met in the City of the Golden Gate, San Francisco, Cal., May 2, 1915. We had looked forward with great expectations to the brethren's hospitality, but the reality surpassed it. Brother Abraham Lowenthal of Cleveland, Ohio, was elected chairman, and, as is well remembered, made a record for ability and fairness. The Convention made one notable change in the laws of the Order. The president of the Order is to preside at future conventions, doing away with more or less political methods of electing a chairman. A wise step and much bitterness would have been avoided had that law existed prior to the meeting in San Francisco.

While enjoying our outing on the 7th of May on Mt. Tamalpais the newsboys cried, "The Lusitania has been sunk". A feeling of unspeakable horror overcame us. Hon. Julius Kahn, the great American Congressman, said, "This means war; the sooner the better". Pity that this statement was not at once carried into action.

Who can ever forget the glorious journey from Chicago to San Francisco under the genial guide of Brother Seelenfreund. Every step was marked with pleasure, and all regretted the brevity of the trip. Brother Kraus was reelected. His second message surpassed, if possible, his first.

We adjourned to meet in Cleveland in 1920, and the man who was "too old" will be there to greet his brethren in his old home.

I have thus briefly sketched the Ten General Conventions, and thank God for His mercy in having permitted me to be a link in the great chain of universal brotherhood.

How Old is Anti-Semitism?

By Dr. S. N. Deinard

In his book, "Anti-Semitism, Its History and Causes", Bernard Lazarre, who, though himself a Jew, avers that he is neither an anti-Semite nor a philo-Semite, but an impartial student of history and sociology, still maintains that anti-Semitism "has flourished in all countries and in all ages, before and after the Christian era, at Alexandria, Rome and Antioch, in Arabia and in Persia, . . . in all parts of the world wherever there are or have been Jews". "Wherever the Jews settled after ceasing to be a nation", he says, in another paragraph, "ready to defend its liberty and independence, one observes the development of anti-Semitism, or, rather, anti-Judaism".

Werner Sombart, the well-known German economist, another would-be impartial, scientific investigator, in his work on "The Jews and Modern Capitalism", says: "The same spectacle confronts us ever since the Jews came into contact with other peoples. Everywhere there was opposition, persecution and ill-treatment. To begin with, the Egyptians 'they abhorred the Children of Israel' (Ex. I:12) (a total misunderstanding of the verse). Paul of Tarsus went so far as to say that the Jews 'were contrary to all men' (I Thess. II:15). In the Hellenistic period, in imperial Rome, the same story of hate and plunder and death. Philo and Josephus both record dreadful Jewish pogroms in Alexandria in the first century of our era; 'hatred of the Jew and ill-treatment of him are as old as the Diaspora itself' (Mommsen). Under the Caesars their lot was no different. 'I am just sick of these filthy, noisy Jews', said Marcus Arelius. Then in the time of Theodoric massacres and wholesale plundering were the order of the day, as later in the seventh century under the Longobards. And the East was like the West. The sixth century in Babylon was as dark as the seventh in northern Italy. Even in the Pyrenean peninsula, where they enjoyed much that was good, the end was bitter: Christian and Moslem both laid hands upon them".

Even so fair and sympathetic a writer as G. F. Abbot in his "Israel in Europe" says: "We have followed the fortunes of the Jewish people from the moment of its first contact with the nations of the West to the last quarter of the 19th century. We have seen that this contact was from the beginning marked by mutual antipathy, enfeebled at times, invigorated at others, always present" (p. 404).

The logical inference drawn is that there is something wrong with the Jew. Hated everywhere and at all times! It must be the Jew's own fault, in a large measure, at last. And that is the actual conclusion of these and a host of other writers on the subject. In the words of Lazarre: "It must needs be that the general causes of anti-Semitism have always resided in Israel itself and not in those who antagonized it". And these causes are enumerated by him and the writers who take the same view of the premordial origin and ubiquity of anti-Jewishness. Even Hebrew writers like Smolenskin and Sokolov (Sin'ath Olam l'Am Olam—Eternal Hatred for the Eternal People) have defended this thesis.

Yet history shows nothing of the kind. Anti-Semitism, or, to drop this high-sounding Renanesque phrase, Jew-hatred, the opposition to the Jew as Jew in the western world is co-eval with Christianity. The church and its theology and traditions, as reflected in its earliest documents, the New Testament, have laden the Jew with a curse that made him until recently the despised and oppressed of the world. That is the beginning and the end of anti-Jewishness.

Our own Graetz, who has had many critics but so far no equals, emphasizes this fact again and again. "The only point of interest is the manner in which the Jews settled in the European states and lived unmolested in friendly intercourse with their neighbors until Christianity gradually encompassed them and deprived them of the very breath of life, etc.". (Graetz's History of the Jews, Eng. Transl., Vol. III: 24.) "In Gaul and Spain before the advent of Catholicism the Jews lived in peace and security" (Ibid, p. 34; ff). "When compelled to flee from the Byzantine Empire, under Leo the Isaurian, they settled in the Crimea, Caucasus, the west shore of the Caspian Sea, among the Scythian and Slavonian heathen and other barbarians, and were unmolested" (Ibid, p. 123).

But how was it in antiquity? The Diaspora of the Jews began with the Babylonian Captivity. Between that time and the rise of the Church, and especially during the Graeco-Roman period, the Jews came in contact with, and lived among, all the dominant races, nations and states of the world. The statement of Strabo is well known: "It is not easy to find a place on earth which has not received that race". How were they treated? At times very badly, it is true. But in each case there was a particular cause or reason for friction, hostility and persecution; it was not hatred of the Jew as "the accursed Jew".

Let us take the region over which the Babylonians, Persians and Parthians ruled in turn, Mesopotamia and Iran. Their treatment by the Babylonians was such that the vast majority of Jews there refused to avail themselves of the Persian Balfour's famous declaration in favor of re-establishing the Jewish State in Palestine. The story of the Book of Esther, contrary to Lazarre's foolish opinion that "it may be taken as the beginning of anti-Semitism", proves what power and standing the Jews of Persia really enjoyed. The sympathy of the Jews, even those of Palestine, at all times for the Parthian rulers and nation shows what their position in that dominion was.

True, with the advent of the neo-Persian Empire, that of the Sassanides, the troubles of the Jews in Mesopotamia began. But the cause was such as would have operated the same way against any other group under similar circumstances, and actually did so operate. The new ruling race, influenced by the fanatical Magians, and in the heated zeal of a religious revival, persecuted Christians and pagan Greeks as well as Jews. It was the recurrence of a well-known phenomenon in human history: a vigorous race, stimulated by a new, powerful religious conviction, seeking to conquer and to subdue all its opponents. That is why the Jews of Arabia suffered during the rise of Mohammedanism, and later in Spain and Morocco, whenever a new Mohammedan sect, frenzied by its fanaticism, came to power, such as the Almoravides and Almohades.

Those who point to the pre-Christian origin of anti-Jewishness appear to have a stronger case when they refer us to the Graeco-Roman world. From the time of the Diadochoi Jews were found in considerable numbers in every large Graeco-Macedonian center, especially Alexandria, Cyrene, Antioch, Seleucia, and somewhat later in Rome. The Jews had their troubles in all these places, particularly Alexandria, Egypt. In Alexandria there were repeated conflicts between them and their neighbors, and even some wholesale massacres of Jews. So there were in other large centers: in Cyrenaica during Vaspasian's reign; in Ionia under Augustus. In Rome there were one or more expulsions of Jews, especially that in the time of Tiberius.

The conflict in the Graeco-Roman world assumed also a literary aspect, and that is where it bears the closest resemblance to Christian anti-Jewishness. Beginning with the two Egyptian Greek writers, Hecataeus of Abdera (c. 300 B. C.) and Manotho (c. 270 B. C.), who began to circulate what is known as the Egyptian version of the Exodus, there is a long list of other Greek writers, mostly trained in Alexandria: Mnaseas, Agatharchides, Chaeremo, Lysimachus, Apion, Posidonius of Apamea and Molo; and of Roman authors such as Cicero, Persius, Petronius, Tacitus, Juvenal, Pliny the Elder, and even Seneca.

Now let us analyze the situation and see what the causes of the antagonism were. Let us take Alexandria, which was its hot-bed, as an example. The first fact to be considered is the mixed population. There was the ruling element of the Greeks, or the Grecianized natives; then the hoi polloi of the indigenous population, and then the Jews and their somewhat related Syrians and Phoenicians. The character of such a population is well described by Gibbon, who says: "The people of Alexandria, a various mixture of nations, united the vanity and inconstancy of the Greeks with the superstition and obstinacy of the Egyptians. The most trifling occasion, a transient scarcity of flesh or lentiles, the neglect of an accustomed salutation or mistake of precedency in the public baths, or even a religious dispute, were at any time sufficient to kindle a sedition among the vast multitude, whose resentments were furious and implacable" (Gibbon, Vol. I:255). And then he tells how for twelve years it was the theater of civil war.

"It is true that the Hellenes in those towns formed only the dominant element; alongside of them lived numerous Syrians, and as a third constituent there were associated with these the not much less numerous Jews, so that the population of these Greek towns of the Parthian Empire, just like that of Alexandria, .was composed of three separate nationalities standing side by side. Between these, just as in Alexandria, conflicts not seldom occurred, as e. g. at the time of the reign of Gaius, under the eyes of the Parthian government, the three nations came to blows, and ultimately the Jews were driven out of the larger towns" (Mommsen, Provinces of Roman Empire, Book VIII: Chap. 9).

Assuming that in all such conflicts the Jews were the most frequent scapegoats, let us consider the reasons. Was it not largely a case of rivalry and competition, a case of Greeks vs. Jews, as later of Romans vs. Jews? Greeks vs. Jews. Here we have the key to the situation. Two intellectual, ambitious and aggressive peoples, with this difference that the one, the Greeks, always considered themselves the ruling race. Both peoples were important factors in the trade and commerce of those regions in those days, even as they are to this day in the Levant. And while the Greeks always considered themselves the ruling or superior class, the Jews were not willing to occupy a subordinate position. They had been given special rights and privileges, they enjoyed prosperity due to industry and thrift, and they were highly esteemed by the ruling powers.

At Rome, Alexandria, Antioch and Cyrenaica they governed themselves by their own laws. They were not required to appear in court on Saturday. They were even permitted to have their own special tribunals, and were not amenable to the laws of the empire; when the distribution of grains occurred on a Saturday their share was reserved for them until the next day; they could be decurions, being at the same time exempt from all practices contrary to their religion; they enjoyed complete self-government, as in Alexandria; they had their own chiefs, their own senate, their Ethnarch, and were not subject to the general municipal authorities. Here was the primary source of friction: keen rivalry and competition between two leading elements of the population. What such friction very often led to is shown in occurrences in which other than Jews were involved. "About forty years after the reduction of Asia", says Gibbon, "eighty thousand Romans were massacred in one day by the cruel orders of Mithradates".

But keener than the political and economic rivalry in which the masses of the Greeks and Jews were involved was the religious and intellectual combat between these two leading groups. Both were proud of their historical, religions and literary traditions. And both were engaged in an active, aggressive propaganda of their religions and philosophies. The Stoics and the Sophists were the two chief propagators of Hellenic thought. The vigorous Jewish propaganda in the Graeco-Roman world is well known. The attacks of all the Egyptian (Hellenic), Greek and Roman libelers of the Jews must be traced to this source.

We are told that the Graeco-Roman world was tolerant of all religions and all philosophies. Yes, tolerant of those they could understand, and could afford to be indifferent to—all forms of paganism. But a religion or philosophy which they feared as destructive of their own they did not tolerate. Hence the conflict with Judaism and the persecution of Jews, Christians and philosophers.

As a matter of fact, the Greek world feared and persecuted strange sects. The city of Lyctos, in Crete, forbade any Epicurean to enter it under penalty of the most frightful tortures. The Messenians also expelled the Epicurians, and Antiochus Dionysius expelled all philosophers from Antioch and all Syria.

The same is true of Rome. The expulsions of Jews and the attempted suppressions of their cult were generally accompanied by similar measures taken against Chaldean, Egyptian, Syrian and other alien religionists. Under Tiberius, in 22 A. D., a Senatus Consultum was directed against both the Egyptian and the Judaic worship. Nay, Republican Rome was even intolerant of the then spreading Greek culture. "In the Consulship of Caius Fannius Strabo and M. Valerius Messala (B. C. 161) they (the Senate) decreed that M. Pomponius, the Praetor, shall take such measures and make such provisions as the good of the Republic and the duty of his office require that no philosophers or rhetoricians be suffered at Rome" (Suetonius, De Clar. Rhetor. I). "Cato the Censor in his old age (c. 155 B. C.) to his son: 'I will speak in its proper place concerning these Greeks . . . whenever that race shall impart to us its literature it will corrupt all things". He (Cato) always maintained, moreover, that all Greeks should be expelled from Italy" (Pliny, Nat. Hist. XXIX: 7, 1). "The ancients are said . . . when they expelled Greeks from Italy, long after Cato's time, to have excepted physicians" (Pliny, Nat. Hist. XXIX: 8, 1).

If Greek and Roman writers, therefore, especially those of the Stoic and Sophist schools, speak with contempt, derision and rancor of Jews and Judaism even more than of other races and cults, it only shows their bitterness against rival propagandists, or disturbers of the established order, against whom they could make less headway, and whom they feared more, than the others of that kind. Josephus has shown a keen understanding of the matter when he writes: "Some of them (the writers) have endeavored to disgrace the nobility of certain nations and of some of the most glorious cities, and have cast reproaches upon certain forms of government. Thus hath Theopompus abused the city of Athens, Polycrates that of Lacedemon, as hath he that wrote the Tripoliticus done by the city of Thebes. Timeus also hath greatly abused the foregoing people and others also; and this ill-treatment they use chifley when they have a contest with men of the greatest reputation; some out of envy and malice, etc." (Contra Apion, I:24).

All this, however, is not the same as the anti-Jewishness that we have known during the last eighteen hundred years. The Jew was not branded. When there was no clash there was no trouble for the Jew. What then is the answer to the question, "How old is anti-Semitism?"

JERUSALEM HAS WATER SUPPLY AND RAILROAD

The boon of fresh water has been brought to Jerusalem by the liberating British army, and the double-track railroad which they built all the way from Cairo is already depositing passengers in the Holy City.

These facts are set forth in a letter to the New York City Churchmen, by J. E. Spofford, dated Jerusalem, June 13. Mr. Spofford writes:

"You will no doubt be delighted to learn that the British have laid water pipes all the way from Arroub, and that next week the water will be in. This dream of a lifetime and of ages duration is now brought to pass by Britain, whilst carrying on a war. Yesterday the first broad-guage train came in from Cairo".

Mr. Spofford writes also: "Last June eight British airplanes came over and dropped a number of bombs on the German sanitarium on the Mount of Olives, which was Djemal Pasha's headquarters. This the Germans vociferously misrepresented as a bombardment of places sacred to Jews, Mohammedans and Christians".

Of war conditions Mr. Spofford says: "For three and a half years we have not had sugar, but for two years we have had grapefruit boiled down that answered for preserves, and a molasses extracted from the caraub pod (St John's bread) which could be used fo sweetening in cake. For the duration o the war we did not have rice. Now it i easily obtained.

"Many improvements are taking place The roads are being repaired and new roads built all the time. About 10,00 people, men, women, girls and boys, ar earning a much better wage than eve before, working on the road. Plans ar being made for the improvement an growth of the city; the reforestation o the country is being studied; the healt of the city is being carefully looke after; the sewerage of the outside i being taken into consideration".

AMBITION!

Rev. Dr. Gustav N. Hausmann
Rabbi Temple Beth Israel, New York City

A Talmudic legend has it that at the creation, the sun and moon were originally equal in splendor and dimensions. One day, so the story goes, the moon came before God with the following protest:

"It is not meet for two kings to wear the same crown".
The Creator replied:
"Then descend and become the smaller".

I

Let us endeavor to comprehend this bit of Rabbinic fancy, for herein is revealed the philosophy of life. Ambition is part and parcel of life's course. Every individual is animated by ambition in some form or another. It is a compelling force that refuses to permit him to remain inactive. The secret of one's being and his ultimate destiny are determined by ambition. Life is won or lost, blessed or marred by this master passion. There is no mortal who has not his visionary desires, his poetic dreams, his imaginative longings. "We are such stuff as dreams are made of". Prophet, poet, reformer and philanthropist, no less than artisan and peasant, has vision. This is what is called the Ideal. Tacitus had said: "The last vice, which even the wise abandon, is desire for glory".

"Ah, but a man's reach should exceed his grasp,
Or what's a heaven for"?

This driving instinct reveals itself alike in the spiritual, intellectual, social, communal and commercial sphere. The more knowledge one has, the more he strives to know. In society, he desires recognition; in business, he wishes to expand. Ambition is as natural as any other sentiment existing in the human breast. Even courage results from ambition. To be dissatisfied with one's lot, to rise above conditions, to endeavor to surmount difficulties, adds zest to the spirit of living. Real happiness consists in the pursuit of an object, rather than in the possession thereof. Joy spells not success, but effort; not achieving, but trying. Wholesomeness results from progress toward our desires. "Ever higher and higher", is the motto that burns in every heart. "What next"? is the natural inquiry of all. Not failure, but low aim, is a crime. Indeed, he who tries to do something and fails is infinitely better than he who does not try, yet succeeds. According to Dr. Sigmund Freud, the psycho-analyst, the unit of human consciousness is wish.

"Where human power and failure
Are equalized forever,
And the one great light that haloes all
Is the passionate endeavor".

In so far as ambition rules the heart, man rises or falls, ascends or descends the ladder of life. God has implanted in every breast some aspiration. Civilization is but another name for striving. Advancement is the result of aspiration; progress shows ambition in action. It was ambition that prompted Homer to gather and collect the poetry of Greek heroism, in order to entertain the nobles at the royal courts. The same longing inspired Virgil in his Anaeid to stir with patriotism the youth of Rome, impelled Euclid to formulate the immortal principles of mathematical science; caused Copernicus to discover the principles of the earth's revolution around the sun; led Newton to discover the law of gravitation; made the world Franklin's debtor by his discovery of the power of electricity; stirred Admiral Peary to explore the North Pole and Captain Amundson the South Pole.

The development of the electric light, the telephone, the telescope, the wireless, the phonograph, and the many labor-saving devices are the result of human ambition for improvement. Civilization is the result of endeavor; progress spells effort. All the exalted achievements of culture, labor and capital, are but the result of the heart's longing for distinction. Discovery, exploration and invention have resulted from ambition crowned with what is called success. America is but another word for opportunity, because it offers ambition a chance to develop. The man without ambition is very often the lowest in life's scale and is placed in the bread line with the degenerate and dangerous element of the social order. This species of failure follows stony apathy. Not unless we fill our existence with an aim do we make it life. This stands indubitably true: money lost, something lost; honor lost, much lost; ambition lost, everything lost. Nothing is as incurable as callous indifference.

However, this ideal striving becomes the most dangerous when allowed free play without restraint. As there is a line along the tropics where two zones meet and consequently engender constant storm, so there is an orbit in man's ethical make-up where true and false ambition meet. Hence, there is continuous discord. Ambition is a passion, but not unalloyed. It is a gulf without a brink—a well without a bottom. It is an emotion which increases with the nourishment given it. As it is true or false, good or bad, ambition is in itself both reward and penalty. Ambition of this kind is something like the sword of Damocles. This court flatterer told Dionysius of Syracuse that he was a very happy tyrant. Whereupon Dionysius made the courtier sit down and eat an elaborate banquet with the sharp sword hanging just above him.

"That's how I live all the time", said the tyrant, "How do you like it"?

That is what many a struggling and striving ambitious man might tell those who envy him. Evil results hang suspended in the air; passion is constantly threatening to crush the ambitious one. This is perhaps the burden of the theme of Goethe's "Faust", the higher and the lower ambitions surging in the breast of the hero. Man must learn to master his feelings; he must control his sentiments; he must subordinate his instincts. The automobile must be under control or it is dangerous. So with ambition. Let us turn to some historical episodes where ambition was lost control of, and see the results.

Themistocles, at one time the hero of Athens, lost his sleep when he saw his rival—and not he—defeat the Persians. Here is a case of uncontrolled ambition. Similarly, Catiline became a traitor to Rome because his ambition knew no bounds. Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar, Antiochus, Nero, Atilla and Tamerlane were prompted to acts of ruthless cruelty through their uncontrolled mad desires. The medieval church, some of the popes and many kings, wrought almost unending hurt through their lawless ambition. What do the courts, the jails, the penitentiaries, the hangman's rope, the electric chair, represent but a check to false yearnings? May it not be that the cemeteries are peopled by many who have reached an untimely end through their mistaken longings? Perhaps as many people are ruined by ambition as are benefitted by it. Where, then, is the line of demarkation? Where is the danger zone? Where is the dead line of ambition?

II

Enlarging our theme, let us take for granted that ambition is twofold—one for glory and honor, the other for mastery and dominion. The former is controlled; the latter masters the aspirant. He who seeks honor is true, pure and noble; he who seeks mastery is false, impure and spurious. The one searches for reality and spiritual fruition; the other looks for appearances and material advantage. Here we are reminded of the following Talmudic legend:

Passion wrought so much harm in the moral world, that in their disgust the people pursued, caught and finally drove the evil genius into a cage which was then kept watchfully locked.

However, it soon became evident that humanity could not progress without this emotion, and so Passion was again liberated, but not until that evil genius has been deprived of his sight that he should no longer be his own master of destruction—but rather be subordinate to man's moral nature. Similarly, ambition is irresistibly indispensable, yet it must not control, but be mastered by man. Like the aeroplane that will turn topsy-turvy and destroy the pilot if he does not control it, so will every natural gift destroy the possessor if it masters him. Let us open the tome of the past, consult its pages, study its glorious and inglorious characters. There we may learn of those whose ambition was under control—true, pure and noble—and who proved to be the world's benefactors; while those whose ambitions mastered them proved to be the world's malefactors—the tyrants, the subverters of humanity's best interest. We will put at the bar of history, before the world's tribunal, four of those characters whose aims were pure and who advanced the social consciousness, and four others whose characters may represent the spurious type. Each will tell his own story, to help or to warn, to guide or to caution, to exhort, to teach or to admonish.

Let us begin from the negative point of view. Alexander the Great was ambitious. At the age of nineteen he rode the fastest on the swiftest charger; at thirty he was the absolute master of the then known world. But his conquests resulted from his ever-burning selfish desires. When he finally mastered the world, he wept. Yes, he wept; not because of the miseries his triumphs caused, the devastation wrought, the ruin brought to men. Alexander wept, "There were no more worlds to conquer". Not for the world, not for humanity, was he concerned, but he was grieved because he could not spread his name as a conqueror any farther than the furthest known limit. To spread his name and fame, to obtain power and command, mastery and influence, were his chief ambitions.

Julius Caesar was indeed ambitious. While yet a youth he was captured by pirates and chained to the oars as a galley slave. Through his extraordinary genius for organization and manipulation he was enabled to turn on his captors and bring the pirate ship with its crew and cargo to a Roman harbor as his spoils. As commander-in-chief, this great Roman conquered many lands and brought many captives to Rome. Nevertheless, Caesar's heroism was prompted by no altruistic motives. Thrice he was offered a kingly crown. He refused the proffered honor, each time more gently, as his resistance relaxed. Calculation was the real preventive. Thus, as the great Shakespeare puts it is the mouth of Brutus, "As he was ambitious, I slew him". No other conqueror left behind him a larger line of cruel despots as successors. "The Caesars" stands as a term of reproach to his day for ruthless ambition, despotism nd murder—for heartlessness and hame.

Napoleon was the incarnation of amition. As a boy he played soldier with he other lads of his years, and, because f his successful maneuvers, placed himelf at the head of the school of soliery. At the age of sixteen, he was an rtillery lieutenant, at twenty-one a capain, at twenty-three a lieutenant-colonel, at twenty-four a brigadier-general and at thirty-four found himself master of ractically all Continental Europe, Emeror of the French, the man of all the world who was most feared by his nemies. During his marvelous and unrecedented progress, this erstwhile 'Little Corporal" had but one real guiding impulse, the passion to rule—for elf. Covetousness was the ruling ideal f this great adventurer.

Standing by the magnificent tomb of Napoleon, on the sarcophagus of black Egyptian marble, and recalling the inomitable ambition of the man, Robert G. Ingersoll declared:

"I would a thousand times rather have een a poor peasant, worn wooden shoes, lived in a hut and go down to he tongueless silence of the dreamless dust, than to have been that imperial ersonification of force and murder."

Benedict Arnold was thoroughly amitious. He was more learned than Washington. He was a greater soldier han the commander-in-chief; as a tactiian he had no superior. But greed aused him to be a traitor. Mammon was his ruling passion. This great solier sold himself to the English for hirty thousand pounds. Betraying his wn countrymen to the enemy for gold, e led the foe to his own native village, urned the town, fired at his own little ed school house and plotted the surender of his comrades and old friends. Not hatred for his countrymen, nor love for the English, but covetousness, gnawed at his vitals. On his deathbed, in the garret of an old house, the American traitor was asked by the doctor: "Do you wish for anything"? "Only a friend", was the reply. Deserted by the English, hated by his countrymen, he dies of loneliness and a broken heart.

Strange that a similar fate should have overtaken the above mentioned heroes in the realm of false ambition. Alexander died in early youth, after killing his best friend; Caesar was murdered by his trusted confidants; Napoleon's end came as he was caged, a prisoner at St. Helena. "How are the mighty fallen".

Indeed, the Bible declares that Adam's sin—which is according to theology, "The Fall of Man",—was due simply to evil aspirations. Little wonder that Milton maintains that Satan's downfall—considered by this English bard an Archangel cast out from heaven headlong—was due to inordinate ambition. Man's ruin, like that of Satan, is the inevitable result of spurious ambition.

As a consequence of his unexcelled, marvelous insight into human nature and experience, Shakespeare puts the conviction into the mouth of Cardinal Wolsey in his "King Henry the Eighth".

"Mark but my fall, and that that ruined me.
Cromwell, I charge thee, fling away
ambition;
By that sin fell the angels; how can man, then,
The image of his Maker, hope to [illegible]
by it?
Love thyself last, cherish those hearts
that hate thee.
Corruption wins not more than [illegible]
"Oh Cromwell, Cromwell,
Had I but served my God with half the zeal
I served my kind He would not in mine age
Have left me naked to mine enemies".

III

Having observed that inordinate ambition is subversive of the best interest of mankind, it is our aim now to show—from the same sources—that pure aspiration makes men benefactors of humanity. Moses was ambitious. Spiritually, he had no peer. His moral code will remain forever the chart of life. "There arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses whom the Lord knew face to face". To which the Talmud adds: "Not only in Israel, bu among Gentiles neither". He was the oracle of theocracy. His religious precepts will remain the heritage of humanity. Intellectually he had no rival. His is the one colossal intellect in all recorded history. It is to be doubted whether nature ever produced another such mind. He accumulated all the learning, the arts, the philosophy and the jurisprudence of Egypt, the center of world's civilization at that time. The Decalogue will always remain the basis of justice. His conception of property rights, the greatest contribution to industrial equity. Moses was the first man with a fully developed social consciousness. His poetry has not been surpassed and his doctrines form the ucleus of synagogue, church and mosque. Jew, Christian and Mohammedan call him master.

Physically Moses was of gigantic stature. According to Renan, the great Egyptologist, Moses evinced such extraordinary talent in his military training that, soon after the completion of his studies, he was promoted to the rank of general. In the campaign against the Ethiopians Pharaoh made him commander-in-chief. Oriental tradition relates that, while he was leading the rmy, one of the princesses was so ascinated with his manly vigor and beauty that she had opened the gates of the capital to him, deluding herself that he might become her husband.

At the age of forty, while going out, one day, to observe how the Hebrew slaves were being treated, he espied an Egyptian smiting an Hebrew. With one blow he slew the taskmaster. A fugitive and wanderer, he fled to Midian. There he observed the daughters of Jethro, the priest, maltreated by the local shepherds who came to the well to water their flocks. A stranger in a strange land an alien, he was ready, singlehanded, to give battle to the native herdsmen. At the age of eighty he became the revolutionary leader of Egypt, the emancipator of his race, the founder of a nation, and the lawgiver of his people. At the age of 120, ready to obey the summons from on High, "his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated".

Yet despite his rapid rise to power, his ambition did not master him; he kept it always under control. After emancipating his people from Egyptian bondage, bringing them into the Sinaic Desert, he instituted a form of government, becoming leader, master, judge, and teacher. Moses might have assumed the royal prerogative and title—the Hebrew Pharoah—thus securing for himself and his descendants a throne and a crown. But he disregarded all these material advantages, these prerogatives, special privileges and opportunities to promote his own power and interests. Answering his critics, the Liberator declares: "I have not taken away an animal of any one of them; nor have I done wrong to any one of them". His ambition was to make of these former slaves an immortal race, the chosen people, the teachers of mankind. Now, where Alexander, Caesar, Napoleon, and Arnold were world destroyers—Moses stands out as humanity's benefactor.

Socrates was ambitious. He began life as an artist, drifted into the army, developed into politics and finally betook himself to the society of the truth-seeker, where he soon towered head and shoulders above them all. He was always studious and endeavoring to learn more about the facts of life. But what was the propelling dynamo in his life? Was it wealth? The answer is seen in the fact that he lived on crumbs and walked the streets barefooted. Was it position? He scorned and derided those who were in power. Was it recognition? He was satirized on the stage and in public assemblies. At the age of seventy, while pining away in a cell, awaiting the poisoned cup, to which a

THE DISPORA

Monthly Review of Events in the Jewish World

By Gotthard Deutsch

This article introduces a new feature of the B'nai B'rith News. It is my endeavor to give every month a survey of the leading events that occurred in the Jewish world. This review shall be strictly non-partisan, giving the facts, and commenting on them merely so as to render them intelligible to the reader who is not acquainted with the past history, but not taking any sides. Orthodoxy and Reform, Zionism and anti-Zionism, shall have an equal chance. The review will always close with the 15th of the month previous to the appearance of the issue. So the present one closed Aug. 15. The reports will come late, but will have the advantage over the weekly papers that they will have been ratified and will be more connected.

Zionism

The rabbis of old said: "Despise no man and dispute no theory, for there is no man who will not find his time and no theory that will not find its place". Never within our recollection has the wisdom of this statment been more clearly vindicated than was the case with the development of Zionism since Mr. Balfour, British secretary of state for foreign affairs, declared in a note, issued Nov. 2, 1917, that "His majesty's government views with favor the establishment of a national home for the Jewish people and will use its best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object".

This assurance did not remain a mere courtesy. The British government lent its support to a commission, headed by the celebrated chemist, Dr. Chaim Weizman, which arrived in Palestine April 10, was received by the entire population with sympathy of which the most noteworthy manifestation is a letter of Archbishop Poryphrios of the Greek Monastery of Mount Sinai. A tangible accomplishment is the cornerstone laying of the University of Jerusalem greeted by another message from Mr. Balfour, who hoped to see it become a powerful factor in the world's progress. There were, as always is the case on such occasions, some sensational but baseless reports, as the announcement that Henri Bergson had expressed his willingness to teach philosophy in the new institution. Professor Felix Frankfurter in the August issue of "The Menorah" emphasizes this offer as a guarantee for the success of the institution, but Bergson declared officially in the Paris press that he will remain connected with the University of France. The statement republished in "L'Univers Israelite", July 14, may be taken as absolutely genuine. There need be no fear, however, that the university will suffer from lack of capable professors. While the university is and will remain for some time in an embryonic state, the primary and secondary educational institutions of Palestine are reported to have resumed their activity, and the Bezalel school for arts and crafts, well known in this country through its exhibits five years ago, found welcome assistance by the production of souvenirs, consisting of silver-plated cartridge shells.

The recognition of the Jews in the reconstruction work of Palestine is shown in the appointment of the active Zionist, Norman Bentwich, of London, as judge of the Court of Appeals in Jerusalem, and in the official recognition of the Red Magen David in the army of occupation. The same symbol obtained also official recognition by the War Department of the United States, having been adopted to mark the graves of Jewish soldiers killed in action. It is an interesting specimen of the absorption within Judaism of foreign practices. The two crossed triangles are no more the escutcheon of David than the cross or the crescent. They are a charm of Celtic origin, barely known in Judaism before the sixteenth century, though they are seen as a flourish under the signature of Solomon Bonafus, treasurer of the king of Aragon, in a document, dated 1243. The French War Department on Jan. 21 and 26, 1917, issued an order similar to that of our War Department that the graves of Jewish soldiers be marked with the Magen David, but repealed it upon the representations made by the Central Consistory, which recorded the objections on the part of the Algerian Jews to whom this symbol is entirely unknown. The Hebrew poet, Leon Gordon, protested against placing the Magen David on the new synagogue of St. Petersburg because it was of non-Jewish origin (Letters, II, 37). However, in Europe the Jews have come to regard the two crossed triangles as an ancient Jewish sign, and so it will remain.

A more serious objection has arisen on the general question opened up by the declaration of Mr. Balfour. In England a "League of British Jews" was formed as a protest against the statement that Palestine was the homeland of the Jews. The fonuders saw in this appellation a reflection on their British citizenship. It is worth while noticing the illustration of the antisemitic charge of Jewish solidarity, furnished on this occasion. One of the leaders of this protest movement is Baron Lionel de Rothschild, president of the United Synagogue, the official organization which represents the high-toned British Jewry, while his cousin, Lord Walter Rothschild, vice-president of the Board of Deputies, the oldest Jewish organization of England, sides with the Zionists. Lord Louis Swaythling, the first British Jew to succeed to a peerage, is president of the orthodox "Federation of Synagogues", a sort of rival organization to the United Synagogue and representing the foreign element. Though officially he represents the dogmatic view of the ultimate union of all Jews in Palestine, the noble lord protests in the name of orthodoxy against the idea conveyed in Mr. Balfour's declaration, while Herman Landau, the vice-president of the same organization, a Polish Jew by birth, calls the president a joke.

American Judaism shows a similar situation. The Central Conference of American Rabbis, with a membership of over 200, comprises practically the whole liberal element of the American ministry and therefore should represent—at least one would imagine so—the theology, expressed repeatedly since 1841, when the first reform synagogue of Charleston, S. C., was dedicated that "America is our Palestine". It passed indeed at its last convention, held in Chicago, July 4, a declaration that "the acceptance of Palestine as a homeland of the Jewish people" was contrary to "the mission of the Jew" who "is to witness God all over the world". This resolution is now being strongly antagonized by a number of members under the leadership of Rabbis Max Heller, Stephen S. Wise and Max Raisin. The anti-Zionists are—this is one of the pranks of history—indorsed by the "Catholic Columbian", which warns against "enthroning the Jew in the shrine of Christendom".

Russia

The abdication of the Czar, March 15, 1917, opened a new era. The abrogation of all Jewish disabilities, reported by the Associated Press in a dispatch dated April 4, 1917, is certainly a fact, but how far the population is willing to accept this fact, is a question which only history will be able to answer. We know now in a manner which admits of no doubt that the persecution of the Jews in Russia was part of a scheme, devised to prop up a tottering autocracy. We knew it before, but now we have documentary evidence through the publications from the government's archives, for which we are indebted to the Bolsheviki. Count Lamsdorff, as secretary of foreign affairs, submitted in 1906 a report to the Czar in which he declared the Alliance Israelite Universelle as the center of all anti-Christian and anti-monarchical agitations. This report was submitted shortly after the terrible pogroms of November, 1905, and we know whose interests were to be served by the atrocities which re-enacted the era of the crusades and shocked civilized humanity. We also can form an idea of the Czar's mentality to whom such stuff could be served as political wisdom. It is quite in harmony with the character of a man who could be guided by an ignorant peasant posing as a prophet.

The reports that we receive under the present conditions are not very reliable owing to restrictions on mail, though censorship and all sorts of sensationalism that cannot be controlled, but judging from analogy the frequent reports of pogroms from all parts of Russia are not at all incredible. They come from Podolia, from Ukraine, from the Crimea, from territories controlled by the Bolsheviki, from others revolting against their government, from the newly formed independent states of strife-torn Russia, and from territories controlled by the German army. In the Asiatic provinces, like Turkestan, where the Jews greeted even the Czar's regime as a deliverer from the brutality of fanatic Moslems of which the history of the Jews in Morocco and Persia is a continuous record, religious persecution is reported. Antisemitic leaflets, circulated in Warsaw, were the subject of an interpellation in the Reichstag, and the fact was admitted by the representative of the government, who declared that the administration was doing its best to suppress the movement. The disappearance of Jewish labor leaders in Warsaw is supposed to be due to secret incarceration. In Lithuania the Jews protest against forced labor. Unfortunately it will not be possible to ascertain the facts until we are again in position to obtain information directly. Only one thing we do know. In a state of popular excitement, the Jew always was and probably always will be the most convenient scapegoat everywhere.

Roumania

Has the time arrived for the solution of the question that was the shame of Europe for the last forty years? The announcement was made officially, and judging from the criticism by the British Foreign Office, it must be taken as a fact that the Roumanian government is willing to honor the just claims of the Jews by the installment plan. The text of the bill, introduced in the chamber, provides for the naturalization of all who have served in the army and of all Jews born in Roumania of Roumanian-born parents. The British Foreign Office in a letter to Nahum Sokolow declared this offer as unsatisfactory and adds that it would never have been accepted by the allies as a fulfillment of the obligation imposed upon Roumania by the Berlin Treaty of 1878. A protest sent by the Roumanian Jews to President Wilson against the legislation proposed may be taken as an indication of its insincerity, which was the expression used by Lord Cecil in his reply to an interpellation by Mr. King, the intrepid champion of Jewish rights in the British House of Commons. International action in internal affairs has, however, its difficulties, as we saw in the history of the Jewish question in Roumania. The only government that was sincere in this case was that of Russia, which declared through its representative, M. de Giers, at the Berlin Congress, that it considered the whole question as one of internal Roumanian policy. All the other governments that are now lined up against each other on both sides contented themselves with a theatrical gesture of disapproval, when Roumania evaded her solemn obligation by declaring the Jews whom she had promised to give full legal equality as foreigners who would have to present their petitions for naturalization individually, at the same time hedging the naturalization procedure so carefully that it amounted to a prohibition. We shall have to wait until after the war before we can know whether insincerity will this time be excluded. Reports of pogroms from various places in the Moldavia are naturally vague, though again not at all improbable. A feature of avenging justice is the indictment of Premier Bratiano, the son of the man who was responsible for the trick with which Roumania in 1878 robbed the Jews of their rights, solemnly assured to them by a European concert.

Bearing the Sin of Many

The time has passed when the prophetic books of the Bible were so interpreted as to contain hints on individual events that were to take place in a distant future. Yet prophecy has only gained in value when we see in it psychological revelations that reflect in every age the divine interpretation of human nature. Isaiah's picture of the "Servant of the Lord", who bore the sin of many, is in the present turmoil of the world a reality. England is the only country, possessing a somewhat important Jewish settlement from which we receive reliable information. The situation in the country of the Puritans who saw in the resettlement of the Jews a guarantee of divine blessing three centuries ago is hardly a pleasant one. Wishing to be guided by the most scrupulously defined methods of historic criticism, we quote the Jewish Chronicle, which speaks of a distribution of masses of antisemitic literature in London and adds that an appeal to local authorities will do no good, for they are in open and avowed sympathy with this movement, as their resolutions prove. Individual remarks in the House of Commons are not a decisive factor. Among 600 people a few antisemites are not of great significance. The spirit, however, exhibited in one interpellation on the number of naturalizations issued to Jews, and especially in another one (by Mr. Hunt) on the immigration of Russian Jews, which has practically come to a close since the beginning of the war, is by no means encouraging. The destiny of the servant of the Lord is manifested in every issue of G. K. Chesterton's "New Witness". People flee from the houses exposed to bomb attacks into the subway, they move to Brighton to escape the area in the East End, which is chiefly the object of the aerial attacks. Panic among the population, overcrowded conveyances and anything else which is either inconvenient or at any rate displeasing to the writer, is the fault of the Jews, and any actual fault of an individual Jew is at once generalized. This is the case everywhere. The principal of Mercersburg Academy, whose "best friends are Jews", writes to a Jewish father that his son cannot be registered in the institution because the Jews do not enter into the real Mercersburg spirit. One is strongly reminded of Heine's philosophical bear, Atta Troll, who wishes that dancing at the fairs shall be prohibited to the Jews, because they do not enter into the right spirit of this art. Even Italy, which has been remarkably free from antisemitism since its unification, does not seem to be quite proof now. We read in an Italian paper a protest of Calojanni, member of the Chamber of Deputies, against the charge of antisemitism which was raised against him on the ground of a remark that he made in the house. What the remark was is not stated in our source. The following is a small matter, but not entirely without significance. The Food Administration of France restricted the days on which meat may be sold to Monday, Wednesday and Saturday. Grand Rabbin Israel Levy requested the minister to allow Jewish butchers to sell kosher meat on Fridays, as otherwise observant households would be without fresh meat for four days. The minister declined the request.

From Vienna violent anti-Jewish demonstrations at a convention of the German party, and at the opening session of the Reichsrat, and from Galicia, riots are reported. While the truth cannot be ascertained, there is unfortunately no reason for doubting the reports. The mayor of Vienna, Weiskirchner, was Lueger's trusted lieutenant. The German party, whether nationalist or clerical, always included antisemitism in its political creed, and in Galicia national jingoism and religious fanaticism have always combined to make the lot of the Jews miserable in accordance with the traditions of the Polish kingdom and its Jesuit advisers. In the Prussian iDet a member moved the disenfranchisement of the Jews. It is quite possible that such a thing happened. Antisemites like to indulge in such antics. They are far more dangerous when they propose less radical steps, such as restrictions of naturalization or regulations of Sehitah, and when they set the mind of the public aflame with slanderous literature. The love for sensation and the unreliable nature of some press reports could not have been better illustrated than by the dispatch printed in various Yiddish newspapers that Albert Ballin, the director general of the Hamburg-American Navigation Company, was appointed secretary of foreign affairs. The Messiah has not arrived in Potsdam yet, though it is not to be underrated that the Jew Max Joffe was received as Russian ambassador to Berlin. In 1914 such an event was no more probable than that Mr. Joffe would have been appointed by Nicholas II upon the recommendation of Count Lamsdorff.

Within the Gates.

It is gratifying that all the afflictions of more than four years of warfare have not been able to kill Israel's well-tested optimism that has made the sufferer exclaim: "Though he slay me, yet I wait for him". A Mrs. Eliza Fischer, of Arad, is said to have left five million crowns for the establishment of two charitable institutions, and a Mr. Stiebel, of Moscow, five millions of roubles for the advancement of Hebrew literature, especially for a Hebrew daily. Less pleasant is the squabble on the Shehitah question in New York. The shohets went on strike, fighting for an increase of wages. They were backed by most of the rabbis, while one of the old "againsters" in the orthodox camp, Rabbi Wolf Margolis, backed the "scabs". The rabbi was attacked in his office and narrowly escaped bodily injury. The present living conditions and —to be frank—the general conditions in Jewish trades, where conscientious scruples are often exploited, make it rather probable that the strikers had just grievances and knowing that there are so many members of their profession to whom half a loaf is better than none, they resorted to intimidation in order to carry their point.

Religious authority is something which even in Moses' time was hard to maintain. Moses had his "Reb Velvela" in a distant relative, named Korah, and if the Midrash is right, Israel whispered various stories about the profits that Moses made in letting the contracts for the Tabernacle and even about his mysterious seclusions in the latter. England has a chief rabbi. He is in reality not the chief rabbi of the English Jews, but of the United Synagogue. As the general public is not so intimately posted on the subtleties, and as the non-Jews, being Episcopalians, believe the Jews must have their Jew bishop, too, the chief rabbi of the United Synagogue is looked upon as the Jewish primate. For the sake of the impression on the outside world, Jews usually try to make things within their gates appear as perfectly loveable, just an illustration of Psalm 132, where brethren live in perfect agreement under Aaron's imposing beard. It is therefore somewhat surprising that the Jewish World, published within the shadow of the chief rabbi's office, declares that the ecclesiastic leader is "not by temper, temperament, knowledge or capacity fitted for organized administration". In the other section of the London Jewish community things took even a severer turn. Dr. Moses Gaster, a man of international fame as a scholar, and, according to general consent, a powerful speaker, at the same time a man of spotless reputation, was forced to resign. The ostensible reason was that taking up his residence in Brighton for reasons of health, he abandoned his flock and lowered the latter's reputation in the eyes of the non-Jewish world, because the ecclesiastic leader dodged the danger from aerial attacks which was unpatriotic. It is, however, generally admitted that this was merely a thin pretext to rid the congregation of a man who was in many ways a little too independent.

The dismissal of another rabbi from office is in every respect a puzzle. The government of Greece insisted that the chief rabbi of Corfu, Gustavo Calo, be discharged because he is an Italian subject. The congregation protested, but had to yield. The affair is unintelligible, because Italy and Greece are allied powers, and the congregation of Corfu, due to the small number of Jews in Greece, usually had foreigners as rabbis, and mostly Italians, the Italian language being the language spoken by most of the Corfiote Jews from the time of the Venetian rule. This case again shows that our information on European affairs is sadly incomplete at present.

An achievement, worthy of special notice, is the appointment of Mr. Charles Louisson, of Christchurch, as a member of the Legislative Council of New Zealand. The Legislative Council, a sort of senate, consists of forty-two members who are appointed by the governor for a period of seven years. Mr. Louisson held four terms as mayor of Christchurch.

The necrology of the period covered by this summary shows the variety of Jewish activities. Prof. Adolf Baginsky of Berlin was one of the leading men in the field of pediatrics and at the same time an active member of the Berlin Jewish congregation. Abraham Epstein of Vienna, a native of Old Konstantinov, in Volhyina, was one of the remnants of old-fashioned aristocracy. A man of large means, he devoted his leisure to Jewish archeology, and, although never a minister, he was one of the leading scholars in the field of medieval rabbinic literature. Vienna lost also its chief rabbi, Moritz Guedemann. A native of Hildesheim, he was one of the first students of the Breslau Seminary, and so one of the first rabbis who received a regular training for the ministry. He was elected chief rabbi of Vienna in 1866 and retired owing to advanced age in 1913. He reached the age of 83 and left an immortal name by his truly scholarly works on Jewish history and apologetics. His successor is Dr. Hirsch P. Chajes, grandson and namesake of the rabbi of Zolkiew, Galicia, one of the first rabbis of the old Polish type, who wrote in German on Jewish scientific topics. H. P. Chajes was formerly professor at the rabbinical seminary in Florence and chief rabbi of Trieste. He has made quite a reputation for himself as author in Hebrew and German. An interesting historic aspect is recalled by the death of Pacifico Ascarelli of Naples. He was the first Jew elected to the municipal council of his city. The kingdom of Naples, a Spanish dependency, expelled the Jews in the sixteenth century. During the last decades of the Bourbon dynasty they were quietly readmitted, chiefly through the house of Rothschild, whose representative, Baron Charles, managed the local interests of the firm. They could not organize as a community, nor did they possess political rights, until in 1860 the Bourbons were dethroned and the kingdom of Naples became incorporated into the new kingdom of Italy. Not until 1891 was the first Jew elected to the municipal council.

THE SAGES OF ISRAEL

INTRODUCTION TO JOB

Tenth Essay in the Series of Historical Portraits of Jewish Leaders

By Rabbi Samuel S. Cohon
Chicago

PART II

With the advancing activity of Israel's sages, their problems grew in depth and widened in extent. From dealing with simple rules for the guidance of human life, they were called to examine the complex motives and sanctions of conduct, in their relation to the known nature of Providence. Sharing the profound belief of the Prophets and Psalmists in the all-seeing presence of God, they confidently announced that "the ways of man are before the eyes of the Lord" (Prov. V:21). As the Creator and unwearied Guardian of the world, He actively interferes in its course, rewarding man "according to the fruit of his doing". The universal law of compensation, observed through the divine order of nature, at once serves as a moral incentive and as a stern warning. "Light is sown for the righteous, and joy for the upright in heart" (Psalm XCVII:11), while the portion of the wicked is darkness and grief. "His own iniquities shall ensnare the wicked, and he shall be holden with the cords of his sin" (Prov. V:22). "The Lord will not suffer the soul of the righteous to famish, but He thrusteth away the desire of the wicked" (Prov. X:3). "The righteous shall never be moved, but the wisked shall not inhabit the land" (Prov. X:30). Whereas wickedness leads to death and destruction, "in the way of righteousness is life, and in the pathway thereof is no death" (Prov. XII:27). "He that followeth after righteousness and mercy findeth life, prosperity and honor" (Prov. XXI:22).

The law of compensation operates in the life of nations as in that of individuals. In the social order, as Dr. S. A. Driver points out, "the habits which go to constitute righteousness are such as to win a man respect from his fellowmen, and to command success; on the other hand, wickedness paralyzes the moral energies, blinds the individual and a nation alike to the real condition upon which prosperity depends, and often overreaches itself" (Lit. of the Old Testament, p. 409). Nations strong and great have been hurled into the abyss of destruction by the very power they possessed. In their victories they also found their defeat. Their overweaning confidence, their reliance on the might of their arms, and their hardness of heart, led them to ruin. This is the warning tale of Assyria, Babylonia, Persia, Greece, Rome and all other nations, great and small, who sought to establish themselves by their power and wealth. Matthew Arnold writes: "The world goes on, nations and men arrive and depart, with varying fortune, as it appears, with time and chance happening unto all. Look a little deeper and you will see that one strain runs through it all: nations and men, whoever is shipwrecked, is shipwrecked on conduct. It is the God of Israel steadily and irresistibly asserting himself; the ETERNAL THAT LOVETH RIGHTEOUSNESS" (Literature and Dogma, pp. 287-288).

This truth so axiomatic to the believer in the power of the Eternal, is yet full of perplexities; and for none more so than the believer in God's justice. The doctrine of the permanent connection between felicity and virtue is a questionable aid to moral conduct. By resolving life into a scheme of rewards and punishments, as simple as that of addition and subtraction, this well-intentioned doctrine robs morality of its beauty, and impoverishes the cause of religion. It sets materialistic props to uphold the moral and spiritual edifice of humanity. It virtually commends righteousness because of its profitableness, and the love of God and obedience to His known will because they yield rich returns of bountiful crops, large flocks, good health and long years. But true religion will not rest upon prudentialism. The soul that loves God will cling to Him even in adversity and failure. The Prophet Habakkuk expressed the spirit of true devotion in these great words:

"For though the fig tree shall not blossom,
Neither shall fruit be in the vines;
The labor of the olive shall fail,
And the fields shall yield no food;
The flock shall be cut off from the fold,
And there shall be no herd in the stalls;
Yet I will rejoice in the Lord,
I will exult in the God of my salvation".
(Habakkuk III:17-18.)

The human soul refuses to be fettered to earth. As a spark of Divinity, it aspires upward toward the starry heights of idealism. For it goodness can never be a mere matter of policy, nor honesty a form of good business.

What is more, human experience emphatically contradicts such thumb rules of utilitarian morality. This doctrine of compensation practically implies that prosperity and health are to be taken as indisputable rewards of a man's righteousness, and that wealth is (to use the language of Bacon) "the baggage" of virtue; and conversely poverty and suffering must be regarded as marks of wickedness, as the fruit of sinfulness While in many instances this may be the case, it is not always true. Shall fortune be considered the unfailing index to man's character? Shall we conclude that every rich man is a saint and every poor man a sinner? Shall we regard the strong as ever righteous and the weak as ever wicked? Then the wolf must be right and the lamb wrong, the robber just and his victim wicked! Monstrous lie that would surrender right to might, that would exalt the tyrant who reigns in splendor and condemn his innocent victims who languish behind prison bars! The ignorant masses, who gladly pay homage to success and prosperity—no matter how obtained—may submit to this order of things; but men of deep faith in God's justice cannot but cry out against truth being forever on the scafflold, and wrong forever on the throne. The topsy-turvydom of the world, wherein virtue is trodden under foot and vice is uplifted, wrung this soul-piercing cry from the heart of the prophet:

"Wherefore doth the way of the wicked prosper?
Wherefore are all they secure that deal treacherously?
Thou hast planted them, yea, they have taken root;
They grow, yea, they bring forth fruit".
—(Jer. XII:1-2.)

The Psalmists also complained against the preponderance of evil (Psalms XXXVII, XIL, LXXIII). The wicked ride rough-shod. Contrary to all their deserts,

"There are no pangs at their death.
And their body is sound.
In the trouble of men they are not;
Neither are they plagued like Men".

On the other hand, the righteous are often vexed and tormented. Does not this seeming perversion of the scales of judgment "cast a direct slur upon the justice of God's government of the world"?

Considerations of this nature led the thoughtless of ancient Israel, as of other nations, to deny God's providence. They said: He stands afar off: He hides Himself in times of trouble; He forgets and closes His eyes to evil. Let us therefore eat and drink, for tomorrow we die. Because He does not right the world and adjust it to human standards, but permits violence and bloodshed, some have denied His existence altogether. The leaders of religious thought in Israel were aware of these facts, and were seriously troubled by them. Their faith in God remained unshaken. They saw His laws too clearly in the life of nature and in the moral constitution of man to doubt His existence and His righteousness. In their perplexity over this perennial problem they tried to modify the accepted views of the laws of compensation. Some of them found relief in the thought that the prosperity of the wicked is but of short duration, and that righteousness alone is abiding.

"When the wicked spring up as the grass,
And when all the workers of iniquity do flourish,
It is that they may be destroyed forever. . . .
The righteous shall flourish like the palm tree;
He shall grow like the cedar in Lebanon". —(Psalm XCII.)

The arm of the Eternal, long delayed though it may appear to impatient humanity, is not short. It reaches all men and all nations, in the end, and establishes the world in righteousness. Others came to the recognition of the truth that life is not operated on a basis of straight cash. Accounts of old standing are settled, and new ones are being ever formed. Men pay the moral and physical debts of their parents, and contract new ones for their children to pay. The happiness and misery of the individual depend also on social as well as hereditary factors. In the light of this awe-inspiring fact of social responsibility, the suffering of the righteous came to be regarded as an expiation for the offenses committed by their ancestors or even neighbors. Those who refused to look upon God in the light of strict judgeship maintained that the tribulations of the just are the expression of divine love, rather than the decree of wrath and vengeance. "As a man chastenth his son", declares the author of the book of Deuteronomy, "So the Lord thy God chasteneth thee. And thou shalt keep the commandments of the Lord thy God, to walk in His ways and to fear Him" (Deut. VIII:5-6). "Whom the Lord loveth He correcteth, even as a father the son in whom he delighteth" (Prov. III:12). The disciplinary view of suffering offered an explanation for the baffling national tragedy of Israel. Israel was punished because of iniquity, but its iniquity was surely not greater than that of the bloody and heathen nations round about. In the view of Deutero-Isaiah. Israel was made to drain the cup of woe, that it might thus be fitted into the divine plan of universal salvation. Schooled in adversity, Israel was to be sufficiently strengthened in faith to become God's instrument of light and healing for all sinful humanity.

Each of these views of the purpose of evil and of suffering expresses a great truth; yet none of them satisfactorily adjusts the scales of divine justice. In their turn, they set up doctrines of Providence as dangerous as those they set out to correct. It is probably against such attempts to explain the inexplicable, that the level-headed Agur aims his unanswerable interrogations:

"Who hath ascended up into heaven, and descended?
Who hath gathered the wind in his fists?
Who hath bound the waters in his garments?
Who hath established all the ends of the earth?
What is his name, and what is his son's name, if thou knowest?

Disclaiming the pretended knowledge of the unknowable and the blasphemous familiarity with God, he humbly contents himself with the simple faith in that which is known to every sane mind:

"Every word of God is tried;
He is a shield unto them that take refuge in Him.
Add thou not unto His words,
Lest He reprove thee, and thou be found a liar". —(Prov. XXX: 4-6)

This protest against dogmatism is carried to its logical extreme in the philosophic drama of Job. "The Book Job", writes Heine, "is the song of songs of scepticism (das Hohelied der Skepsis), and horrid serpents hiss therein their eternal 'wherefore'? As man when he suffers must weep his fill, so must he cease to doubt. This poison of doubt must not be wanting in the Bible, the great storehouse of mankind". At least in this instance honest doubt is better than half the creeds. Here doubt rises to the vindication of the human conscience and the transcendent wisdom of God. Renan finds in this poem "blasphemy approximating the hymn, or, rather (it) is itself a hymn, since it is only an appeal to God against the lacunae which conscience finds in the works of God". (The Book of Job, p. XL.) The earnest protest of the big-souled author of Job "against the rigor and uncharitableness of the traditional orthodox belief", like the storm, clears the atmosphere, and shows in brighter light the true nature of the problem.

THE TYPICAL AMERICAN

The typical American is he who, whether rich or poor, whether dwelling in the North, South, East or West, whether scholar, professional man, merchant, manufacturer, farmer or skilled worker for wages, lives the life of a good citizen and a good neighbor; who believes loyally and with all his heart in his country's institutions, and in the underlying principles on which these institutions are built; who directs both his private and his public life by sound principles; who cherishes high ideals; and who aims to train his children for a useful life and for their country's service.—Nicholas Murray Butler.

THE ORDER'S DIAMOND JUBILEE

Seventy-five years ago a small band of German Jews who had settled in the city of New York laid the foundation of our Order. What the twelve founders, from the outset, called into existence was not a single local society. It was the Order itself. In the process of time the original constitution was revised again and again until the present form was evolved. But that pertained merely to the mode of government and the mthods of intercommunication between the central body and the individual districts and lodges.

The ritual, likewise, was recast several times, and certain features, like mutual insurance, had to be dropped and new activities set agoing. The Order might have evolved out of single societies consolidated later into one large society. The Order preceded the lodges; from the very beginning lodges were instituted and installed by the Constitution Grand Lodge. Whether in this country, from ocean to ocean and from the Lakes to the Gulf, or abroad, on the continents of Europe, Asia and Africa, everywhere the lodges are its daughters, deriving their charter and rights and duties from the mother lodge. Name, motto and largely also purpose are the same today as at the inception. "Sons of the Covenant"—those that entered brought with them their credentials as brothers of a fraternity knitted together by the ties of blood, by a common past with its story of joy and sadness, by a common faith and a common hope.

"Benevolence, Brotherly Love, Harmony". Never were three rules of human conduct such as should guide every Jew in his relations with his fellow-Jew more happily joined together. Of course, the immediate conditions in which the organizers found themselves prompted the emphasis placed upon them. Strangers in a strange land, with all the agencies for help to the needy and comfort to the distressed still to be created, these Jews in the forties of the last century naturally had to fall back upon each other for mutual assistance. Driven from homes widely apart, meeting in their new abode fellow-Jews from other countries from whom they might be divided in education or refinement, yet to whom they knew themselves attached in their deepest convictions, they realized the need of fostering brotherly love in their community. Above all, with the synagogues divided along lines of nationality and ritual, and strife and discord rampant among the congregations, harmony was indeed the need of the hour.

And there has been no recession in the aims of the Order, succinctly contracted in the triune motto, but at the same time enunciated with the utmost clearness in the earliest preamble and addresses, and the activities and institutions of the Order bear witness to a steadfast resolution to carry into effect, perhaps beyond the dreams of the founders, the plans which they so wisely formulated. Benevolence stands forth in concrete shape in the various Homes for the aged and for the fatherless; in infirmaries and hospitals; in bureaus of free employment and relief committees.

But B'nai B'rith charity was not confined to physical wants; from the very first day of the Order's existence the spiritual and moral advancement of the Jew was made the keynote of its activities. And so educational work, whether it expresses itself in lecture courses or entertainments of a refining character or schools or libraries, marks the activities of the Order throughout its career. The Order had its inception in the early years of the second wave of immigration, the second layer of American Jewry. Then it meant that a few men who had raised themselves to eminence by dint of self-education and by keeping their eyes wide open, and the still fewer who had had the advantage of an education in their native home, sought by means of association in the lodge meetings, as well as by direct agencies, to elevate to their own level the untutored. American Jewry, at the time the Order celebrated its golden jubilee, had largely become a unit animated by one spirit, and the creation of that body, eminently loyal to America, responsive in every way to its institutions, and withal supremely alive to the duties imposed on it by its position in the household of Israel, stands forth as the Order's most notable achievement.

And with the same zeal it set about to Americanize the third layer of Jewish immigrants, those from eastern Europe. It assisted them physically; it placed them throughout the length and breadth of this country, wherever facilities obtained for a livelihood; it found for them employment; but above all it opened its own doors to them, that by means of the lodge meeting they might acquire orderliness and self-control and all that goes to make an American gentleman. For harmony was even more necessary now than it had been in those early years. We had grown accustomed to a two-party government: conservative and progressives had battled for a while and then agreed on a mode of living together. Now smaller factions arose: there was the large proletariat to be reckoned with, and then Zionism raised its head. New alignments were shaping themselves, and across the old division varied battle-cries and watchwords were heard in our camp. The Order constituted itself the peace-maker in American Israel. It not only welcomed to the lodge any and every Jew, but by virtue of its neutral position it stepped into the breach, bringing the contesting parties together, always ready to co-operate with any and every society or organization for the cause which transcends the idiosyncracies of individual bodies and their sometimes headlong leaders. Harmony, as conceived by the Order, could only reign where there was a spirit of give and take. We may mention as an example the recent agitation for an American Jewish Congress. Where other bodies seemed to have been concerned with their own interests, when a lamentable disruption appeared to be imminent, the Order stepped in and saved the situation, replacing passion by calm judgment, and the leadership of the Order was recognized. The Order stands out today not merely as the peer of all Jewish fraternal orders, of which it is the oldest, but by virtue of its ramifications in the Old World, as the one American Jewish body which enjoys international prestige and possesses the machinery for doing Jewish work abroad.

From the earliest years of its existence it emphasized its conception that American Jewry must not segregate itself from the whole household of Israel; that wherever the Jew suffered economically or politically, it was the duty of the American Jew to come to his rescue. The Order exemplified its policy at an early date when the civic rights of our Swiss co-religionists had to be guarded; it made the Roumanian mission of Brother Peixotto possible; but its culminating achievement was the petition drafted by its Executive Committee and its lamented president, Bro. Leo N. Levi, after the Kishineff massacre, and presented to the government of the United States for transmission to the Czar.

Latterly the Order took a prominent part in the steps leading to the denunciation of the treaty between the United States and Czardom. Early in its career the Order pondered over the question of consolidating all the Jewish fraternal orders; they have since increased in number, and the tendency appears to be to multiply organizations which might be a thousand times more effective if they were united. If union is not attainable, there is room for co-operativeness. We are in the midst of a world struggle which bids fair to multiply the problems awaiting the Jewish people; things will assume of necessity a new aspect, when the old order passes away and a new will emerge; yet not all the beaten tracks will have been washed away by the unprecedented cataclysm. The Order, strong in its organization, with its machinery unimpaired, with such ties as have been perforce broken readily joined together, with its prestige undimmed and its vigor unabated, stands ready to do the work of binding up the wounds, of restoring Jewish institutions and communal agencies, and, above all, to guard vigilantly and effectively the interests of Jewry all over the world when the belligerent powers lay down the sword and turn their energies to the readjustment of a world out of gear. There is great work ahead, and the Order will enter upon it with vigor and zeal, in the fourth quarter of a century of its existence upon which it now, thanks to Providence, enters. All well-wishers of the Jewish cause must wish it Godspeed, even as now they are joining in the chorus of congratulations upon its achievements of five and seventy years.

NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL

By Simon Wolf

Walter E. Weyl, in his book, "The End of the War", states with force and historical accuracy "that the future of the world is Internationalism; that peace of a lasting character is an impossibility without co-ordination by all civilized peoples". Taking this view as a text, the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, having in the past played an important part, will in the future do still greater work, not only in helping the unfortunate and suffering, but in unifying our co-religionists. One of the great achievements of the Order has been and is its catholicity, its democracy, all shades of Jewry are welcome and equal in its ranks, and by and through that broadening process the Order has become a world factor. Leading men at home and abroad have given testimony to the splendid work of the Order in those countries where unity of action and freedom of thought were essential. The Order can point with pride to the foundation of the international link, and when the blessed day of perpetual peace shall dawn, the representatives of the Order will play no unimportant part in the World Drama. The Order has spoken in ringing words in the past, the future will find it no less assertive, the only Jewish International Organization, it will aid in solving local, national and international problems, not only by eminent and patriotic Americans, but by patriotic men of every country.

Our mission is not in controversy, but in unity, not in doctrine or in dreams of the ghetto, but to make every human being in every part of the world a loyal, patriotic citizen, and to that end we pledge our united support. And on this day of sacred memory, the seventy-fifth of our notable existence, it is meet and proper to speak in no halting terms, not to apologize, but to act boldly, worthy of the great heritage and equally worthy of the great future. The sons of the sires will battle not only on the field ensanguined in noble France, but on the no less fruitful fields of Peace. The stars on the service flags of our Lodges testify to our national patriotism, when Peace, blessed Peace, shall come, we will be found equally ready to discharge every duty incident to World Citizenship.

RESOLUTION

Adopted by the Central Conference of American Rabbis at Chicago, Ill., July 4, 1918, Anent the Balfour Declaration

The Central Conference of American Rabbis notes with grateful appreciation the declaration of the British government by Mr. Balfour as an evidence of good-will towards the Jews. We naturally favor the facilitation of immigration to Palestine of Jews who, either because of economic necessity or political or religious persecution desire to settle there. We hold that Jews in Palestine, as well as anywhere else in the world, are entitled to equality in political, civil and religious rights, but we do not subscribe to the phrase in the declaration which says, "Palestine is to be a national home-land for the Jewish people". This statement assumes that the Jews although identified with the life of many nations for centuries are in fact a people without a country. We hold that Jewish people are and of right ought to be at home in all lands. Israel, like every other religious communion, has the right to live and assert its message in any part of the world. We are opposed to the idea that Palestine should be considered the home-land of the Jews. Jews in America are part of the American nation. The ideal of the Jew is not the estabilshment of a Jewish state—not the reassertion of Jewish nationality which has long been outgrown. We believe that our survival as a people is dependent upon the assertion and the maintenance of our historic religious role and not upon the acceptance of Palestine as a home-land of the Jewish people. The mission of the Jew is to witness to God all over the world.

Editor B'nai B'rith News:

The June issue of the B. B. News contains on page 16 the report that Miss Leah Stern has the distinction of being the first woman honored with a professorship in a Swiss university. This statement is not correct. Anna Tumarkin, like Leah Stern a native of Russia and of Kishineff, at that was professor of philosophy in the university of Berne as early as 1901.

Sketches of Modern Jewish History

By Gotthard Deutsch

XI.—From Waterloo to the July Revolution

Fifteen years are a short period, yet these fifteen years from June 18, 1815, when Napoleon's dream of a world empire was definitely dispelled until July 27, 1830, when a riot in the streets of Paris announced to the last Bourbon king that he was given indefinite leave of absence, were full of portentious events in the history of the Jewish people.

Trying to survey the field, we naturally have to make a limited selection of the vast material. Russia shall be left out entirely because the events affecting the Jews of this empire will better be told in connection with the reign of Nicholas the First, which began in 1825. England again has to be left out of consideration because during this period there is so little to be told that it will better be left to the more important period of the struggle for emancipation, which began in 1830. The Scandinavian countries, again, with the exception of Denmark, furnish nothing of any consequence and may be entirely neglected, as will be the case with Spain, which had no Jews at all, and with Portugal, where they are so few in number that they may be entirely overlooked. It is quite interesting in this connection to cite a case of historic inaccuracy. Thiers, in his history of the Napoleonic period, speaks of 200,000 Jews who greeted the invading French army as liberators. It would have been much safer to make it 200, for at no time since the expulsion of 1496 did Jews of Portugal number more than 500 souls, and in 1808, when the French troops occupied the country, there may not have been even 200 Jews in the whole kingdom. This, by the way. Outside of Europe, Jewish history is either a monotonous, and even at that incomplete, list of brutal mob attacks as they come to our notice from Morocco and Persia, or it is in an embryonic state, as we may watch it in the United States of America, from which only one fact shall be cited.

Jewish history after Waterloo centers in France. During the previous period the new republic, even before it was legally proclaimed, had cut the Gordian knot by the famous declaration of Sept. 27, 1791, which, for the first time in history, placed the Jews on a footing of perfect equality with their fellow-citizens. The victorious French armies, wherever they hoisted the French tricolor and planted the tree of liberty, in Italy, in Germany, and even to some extent in Poland, proclaimed the same principle. Napoleon limited this freedom again by a law, issued March 17, 1808, which placed the Jew under certain civic restraint. The Jewish merchant could not engage in any credit operation, selling goods on credit or lending money, without submitting to the humiliating process of either calling a notary public to certify that the transaction was a bona fide business and not usury, or applying for a special license which entitled him to do business under a permit.

From this rule there were a number of exceptions, which, for our purposes, are too intricate to be explained. Suffice it to state that the law provided that after ten years it was hoped that it would not be necessary to maintain these provisions. When the ten years were up the question of renewing this law was discussed in the legislature, and the motion to renew it was tabled by a vote taken March 9, 1818. It seems indeed strange that the Bourbon dynasty, which was recalled on the principle of "legitimacy," advocated by the political chameleon, Bishop Prince Talleyrand, should have left the full equality of the Jews intact. It certainly was not in harmony with the reactionary ideas of Louis XVIII, although his brother had signed the bill. I have no complete explanation to offer except that it seemed more advisable to leave the law of the late legitimate king stand than to renew the restrictions enacted by the usurper, Bonaparte. Whatever the reason was, the fact remains that this actual annullment of the constitutional rights of the Jews disappeared from the statute books. In other respects, also, the Bourbon government seemed to be favorably inclined to the Jews. Like all paternal administrations. it took interest in the religious affairs of the Jews, making contribution to the congregations compulsory and regulating them by royal ordinances, issued June 29, 1819, and Aug. 23, 1823. It also established a rabbinical school in Metz Aug. 20, 1829. On the other hand, we see that the medieval formula of the oath of a Jew in court was still held to be legal. Cremieux, afterwards one of France's famous statesmen, made a plea against this ruling of the court in a famous case that was tried in Nimes, though it was not until 1839 when the same celebrated barrister in a similar case brought the matter before the Supreme Court, which declared this oath as unconstitutional.

The little country of Denmark, with a population of about 3,000 Jews and a history that does not go farther back than the 17th century, has never been of great importance in Jewish life. It indulged occasionally in the favorite pastime of small countries to meddle with the intimate and private affairs of the citizens. A royal order of Aug. 17, 1813, required that the appellation "Mosaic" should be substituted for Jewish, and a law of March 29, 1814, placed the Jews on an equal footing with their neighbors in all civic respects, and at the same time ordered that all Jewish children must be confirmed. This order included the island of St. Thomas, now Virgin Island, part of the United States, and the orthodox congregation of Altona, then under Danish government. The miniature pogrom that spread over southern and western Germany in 1819 found an imitation in Copenhagen, where the soil had been prepared for it by a pamphlet of anti-Jewish character, published in 1817. These events shall be more exhaustively treated in connection with the German history of this period. They were aggravating when measured by the standard of "the human rights", but were of little consequence when measured by the damage that they did.

Holland had been the haven of refuge for persecuted Jews during the 17th and 18th centuries. Founded on the principle of full religious liberty by William the Liberal, one of the noblest statesmen that ever lived, the Netherlands from the time of the Treaty of Utrecht, in 1579, attracted first the Jews from Spain and Portugal, where the Inquisition against which the Netherlands had rebelled had its home, and afterwards numerous victims of bloody persecutions or legal oppression from Germany and Poland. They were so satisfied with their condition that the majority would not even have political rights when the country came under French influence in 1796. The Jews were afraid that political liberty would estrange the future generation from their ancesteral faith. But the political emancipation became a law, and the imperialistic scheme of Napoleon extended to the kindom, over which he placed his brother Joseph. Holland had its consistory as well as France, and with the return of the old government this beaurocratic organization was abolished and a Hoofd Commissie tot de Zaken of the Jews was put in its place by an order of July 6, 1817. Otherwise the Jews remained in their self-created ghetto, conducted their services partly in the Portuguese, partly in the German-Polish style and ate strictly Kosher cheese.

Switzerland, the free democratic republic, as it had evolved under French influence, presents a complex situation with its autonomous 22 cantons. The freest government of Europe was almost the last to extend the democratic liberty to the Jews. Up to modern times it imposed on them restrictions equaled only in Russia. For a long time, probably since the 14th century, the Jews were completely barred from residence within the Swiss republic. Not until the middle of the 17th century do we find two Jewish communities in the villages of Endingen and Lengnau, in the canton of Aargau. It is a puzzle how they came into existence. In all likelihood they were formed by fugitive Jews from southwestern Germany, who fled from the barbarous hordes that devastated this country during the war of thirty years. Humanity was, after all, so strong that its duties could not be entirely denied to people fleeing for their lives, though they were Jews. These refugees probably had to remain in their new homes for several years, and in this way became definitely settled. Beyond that, however, they were not permitted to go. Outside of the canton of Aargau, and within that canton outside of these two villages, they were not permitted to set foot. One after another of the cantons restricted them in many ways. In St. Gall they were only permitted to visit the fairs in Zurich; they were not admitted to the cattle markets in Geneva; they were prohibited from owning real estate, and so on.

As an interesting contrast we pass to the most autocratic government, to that of Turkey, where the Jews fared comparatively well. There were no restrictions on residence, occupation and marriage, and, compared with the situation of the Christian subjects of the Sultan, theirs was even enviable. They did suffer like the rest of the population from misgovernment, arbitrary acts of officials and occasionally, also, from individual acts of brutality perpetrated by the Mohammedans. Individual Jews, rose occasionally to a high position as financial agents of the government, though even these men, and they perhaps more than others, suffered from the whims of tyrants, both big and small. Hayim Carmona, a rich banker of Constantinople, enjoyed for a while the fullest confidence of the Sultan until in a fit of rage his majesty ordered him to be strangled to death in 1826, and incidentally ordered his property confiscated. In the provinces of the empire the pashas carried on their high-handed rule of extortion or gratified their fiendish instinct by the torture of an unfortunate victim. The late chief rabbi of Jerusalem, Jacob Saul Elyashar (1817-1906), in his autobiography tells a touching story of how his father, Jeroham Eliezer, Shohet of the Jerusalem community, was suddenly taken a prisoner, kept in prison for six months, when he managed to escape to Damascus, and the pasha, unable to satisfy his brutal instince on the intended victim, ordered all Jewish houses pillaged. Similar were the conditions in the vassal states of Turkey.

Servia, declaring her independence in 1817, expelled the Jews from all cities with the exception of Belgrad, and even there restricted them to a ghetto, and in 1822, during one of these periodical fights between two rivals for the throne, the Jews of Belgrad had to flee across the Danube River to Semlin. The conditions in Greece were far worse. The people who fought for their independence began their revolution with terrible atrocities perpetrated on the Jews. There was indeed some provocation, of which the Jews, however, were merely the innocent victims.

The Greeks, even from pre-Christian times bitter enemies of the Jews, were masters in devising means of persecution. The Jews of Thebes, in medieval times, had to furnish the executioners In Corfu the executions were held in the Jewish cemetery. The motive is not quite clear. It may have been a desire to disgrace the criminal or to disgrace the Jews, or both. The Turks retaliated. The patriarch of Constantinople was considered the head of the conspiracy which planned the liberation of Greece. With fiendish cruelty, the Sultan ordered him to be hanged in front of the cathedral on Easter Sunday, April 22, 1821, and the Jews were ordered to drag his body through the streets and to cast it into the sea. The Greeks took revenge by a wholesale butchery of the Jews in the towns of which they took possession. Recent experiences, as in the case of a blood accusation in Corfu in 1891 and in the latest developments in Salonica, show that the feeling of the Greeks to the Jews has not improved.

A very complex situation is presented in Italy. This unfortunate country was for centuries the victim of conquerors from abroad and petty tyrants from within. Napoleon, an Italian himself, was the most powerful type of these ambitious warriors who tried to realize the dream of world dominion that had gone forth from the same peninsula which afterwards became the object of the imperialistic schemes, first conceived within its own borders. After Waterloo the old conditions were for the most part restored. Only the republics had to pay the penalty for the unpopularity of this form of government, and they divided the spoils among the victors.

Genoa was annexed to the kingdom of Sardinia; the territory of Venice to Austria; Maria Louisa, Napoleon's grass widow, was given the Duchy of Parma for her dower right; in Modena and Tuscany Austrian princes got some pleasant jobs; in the kingdom of both Sicilies—as the combined kingdoms of Naples and Sicily were now called—Bourbons were restored to the throne, and his holiness the Pope had the satisfaction to be compensated for all the sufferings which Napoleon had inflicted on him by the restitution of his former states.

The situation of the Jews naturally differed in all these territories. Tuscany may be considered the most humane government in the treatment of the Jews. There they had even some limited political rights, being allowed a share in the municipal administration of the city of Leghorn, which owed to their business enterprise a great deal of its prosperity, both in commerce and in industry.

One instance, in itself insignificant, may be quoted as a curiosity. Encouraged by the spirit of reaction that held all of Europe in its grip, the students of the University of Pisa held a Jew up on the street during the carnival season and demanded from him as ransom his weight in confetti. This was one of the old college pranks of which the Jews were made victims. In the Jesuit colleges in Poland these pranks assumed the proportions of murderous assaults and pillages. In Italy they were mere holdups. In Turin, for example, the students had the privilege of pelting the Jews with snowballs, for which afterwards a ransom of 25 scudi in gold was substituted, payable when the first snow fell.

In Pisa, as we saw, it was the right of the academic youth to hold up a Jew in the carnival season and to demand the ransom above quoted. Grand Duke Leopold, the brother of the humane Emperor Joseph II of Austria, abolished this barbarity in 1783. In 1818 the students attempted to restore it, but they were severely punished and warned not to repeat this act. Grand Duke Ferdinand III, by an order dated Dec. 17, 1814, also regulated the constitution of the five Jewish congregations of his land. It is quite remarkable that in this relatively best governed state of Italy the Jews had to suffer more than anywhere else from the mob spirit that prevailed after the French troops had withdrawn.

In the city of Siena nineteen Jews were barbarously murdered, some of them being burned alive, June 28, 1799, by a mob formed under the war cry "Viva Maria". The congregation never recovered from this shock. Quite favorable were the conditions in the Austrian part of Italy where the ghetto of Venice, the place where the name originated, abolished by the French, was not reintroduced, and similarly the special Jewish taxes remained abolished. In the papal states the exact opposite took place. The ghettoes of Rome and other cities were re-established, and with the ascent to the papal throne of Leo XII, in 1823, the most atrocious medieval laws were put in force. Jews were not permitted to own real estate, and the houses which they had acquired during the French period were ordered to be sold within five years. The Grand Inquisitor ordered not merely that Jews must dismiss all Christian servants in their employ, but even a Jew who gave private lessons in Christian families were ordered to give up this work under penalty of 300 scudi. All Jewish students were expelled from universities and Christian physicians were prohibited from attending Jewish patients, even if called in an emergency. The only favorable ruling was that the Jews who during the French time had settled in Bologna, from which only they had been expelled by a papal decree in 1593 were permitted to remain.

These papal laws were to some extent enforced in some of the smaller states. The Duke of Modena also prohibited that Jews keep Christian servants and that Christians must not live with Jews under the same roof, nor must Jews be landlords of Christian tenants, being compelled at the same time to sell their houses which they do not inhabit under penalty of heavy fines exacted through annually increased taxes. This was somewhat better than the condition in Rome, where the Jews were not permitted to own any house, even for their own use. The law prohibiting the employment of Christians as domestic servants evidently was not enforced rigidly, for the case of Mortara, who was baptized by a Christian servant in the papal city of Bologna, furnishes clear proof of this fact.

Maria Louisa, the Duchess of Parma, went even farther in her reactionary tendencies. She not only reintroduced the old special Jew taxes, but demanded that the arrears be paid for the time of the French occupation. She also indulged in a revival of a medieval law which we can trace back to the sixth century in Spain, ordering that Jews should not chant at a funeral in the streets.

The most remarkable case is that of the kingdom of Sardinia, whose dynasty afterwards became the monarchial embodiment of the United Italy. Even in this kingdom, which in medieval times

HIGH PLACES IN LEGAL HISTORY

Extract of Address Delivered by Frank H. Short, President of the California Bar Association, at Its Annual Session, San Jose, California, June 6, 1916

* * * * * *

We have in this country separate church and state, at least so far as that is humanly possible. But in truth, in few countries has this even been attempted, and in most countries today there is a state church or a state religion, and there are those who dissent therefrom. Naturally out of such a situation much controversy and trouble have arisen and continue.

In China they have had little religion, not much government, and less law, and seem to have gotten along rather peacefully without much government or much law or much religion, simply by substituting a good deal of philosophy for these three usually essential ingredients of human institutions and human government; while in India they have had an abundance of religion, iron-clad, hidebound and perpetuating castes, and as a result have pretty much destroyed government and have made law out of religion and religion out of law.

In this discourse I shall refrain, as far as I may, from an assertion of any views or opinions of my own. I speak solely as a lawyer, neither as an iconoclast or a "defender of the faith". The orthodox will correspondingly condemn me for a lack of faith or fervor, and, upon the other hand, the radical unbeliever will contemptuously suggest that I have been preaching a sermon. If you want to keep out of trouble in this world you should express no opinions on religious subjects, nor beliefs, but we are reminded that under such circumstances we are promised an abundance of trouble in the next world.

While doubtless we all agree, or should agree, in this country that church and state should be separated, this does not mean that in the growth and development of law there is not an existing, apparently unavoidable, an endless connection between religion, morals and law. In fact, in the earlier history of the world law consisted in the application and enforcement of religious beliefs, and morals were the result of religious beliefs and teachings, and, while this situation is somewhat disavowed at the present time, nevertheless the human tendency goes forward, and if you find a majority of the people of any country firm in a religious belief, that, of course, is their standard of morals, and usually enacted into law and then is applied to those who believe and those who disbelieve as well.

In fact, while the principle of the separation of church and state is much extolled and is put in practice in so far as direct support by the state of any church is concerned, nevertheless, we can observe that in recent years the tendency has been rather in the direction not of conceding to other people free rein as to their religious views, and especially in not conceding to them free judgment as to morals, but the majority seem more and more inclined to enact into statute law their own moral standards, which moral standards are very generally derived from their religious beliefs. And there is less tolerance than existed a generation ago by the majority for the rights of the minority on disputed matters of morals, to conduct themselves as they believe to be right, and more of a tendency to make the views of a majority on a question of morals the standard, and to enact such standard into laws and compel the minority to abide by the same.

In view of these considerations, a brief resume of the origin and history of the law, including a consideration of religions out of which the same has grown and developed, will aid us in adjusting our minds to the modern problems of government and of law. Therefore, without further apology of explanation, I will proceed with this somewhat heroic task.

Generally speaking, our own ideas of right and wrong, and of justice and injustice, and of what should be and what should not be the law, are even at this time derived from the Ten Commandments and the accompanying moral code constituting what is called the Mosaic Law, and which have come down to us through the Jewish civilizations.

I realize there is a divergency of opinion about Moses. The most orthodox believe in the personality of Moses and in the promulgation of the Ten Commandments and the Law exactly as described in the Bible. Other people, accepting the Commandments as the law, are inclined, nevertheless, to believe that they originated out of a general development of ideas of right and wrong and religious beliefs of the Jewish people, and that Moses is more or less of a figure in history and not the definite individual described in the Bible. Others reject the same en masse, and wholly deny the idea of divinity, the actual existence of Moses, or the verity or importance of the Commandments or the Mosaic Law. Regardless, however, of any discussion of the divinity of the Commandments or the Mosaic Law, the most thoroughgoing infidel in the world receives almost equally with the most devout believer his ideas of right and wrong and of morality and law from this same source.

Whether we believe in its divinity or its authenticity, or not, in all of the teachings and procedure of all of the countries and civilizations to which the Commandments and Law have gone, the ideas of right and wrong that have permeated the masses of mankind, that have been the basis of the literature of all those civilizations, have been primarily and fundamentally derived from the Ten Commandments and the Law accompanying the same.

We devote, in legal education, years to study of the common law, and in a large sense it is a useful and desirable thing. And in truth, the common law has probably developed into the most satisfactory and workable scheme of laws in the world. And yet, in the branches of it that we study, there are trivial things arising out of the rights of kings and of dukes and barons and commoners and citizens and serfs. Except for the general course and development of the existing scheme of the common and statutory law, many of the things we must understand and be able to repeat of the common law, are as unessential to an understanding of the fundamental questions of right and wrong as anything could possible be. Upon the other hand, apparently out of the very nature of the human mind and in the formative struggle toward the light and the right, we find in the Ten Commandments and in the Mosaic Law the basic growth and development illustrating the natural tendency of humankind, and in all of this growth we find elements of solidarity, perpetuity and truth that have never been changed.

Therefore, while an adequate knowledge of the common law is necessary to procedure and practice, and in some respects to an understanding of right and wrong, it is congenitally, fundamentally and from the standpoint of desired conception of the tendencies of the human mind and the fundamentals of right and wrong, derivative, trivial and unimportant in comparison with the Commandments and the Mosaic Law.

In fact, while the stream has been affected and colored in a degree by the philosophy of the Greeks and the laws of the Romans as codified by Justinian, and in other ways and from other sources, it is a matter undeniable that the general course and flow of these ideas and principles have been comparatively clear from the beginning, and are as applicable and as much in force today, and perhaps even more so, than they were at the time of the promulgation at the foot of Mt. Sinai. Other religions have arisen, other moral standards have been promulgated, but one and all, they have either vanished or become ossified in some decaying civilization. Some of these have wholly vanished into the desert of time; some are stationary and gradually disappearing like a dead sea. The one stream of definite source that seems to forever flow and never to fail—that has many tributaries but one defined and unfailing source—is the stream of Sinai. Legally the light that must ultimately direct our course is the light of experience. Why then should we confine our legal studies to tributary and unimportant channels, and even avoid a study of the one main and obvious source of our laws?

It is true that ideas of guilt and innocence, and of adequate punishment, have changed, not only in connection with the Ten Commandments and the Law, but it is almost equally true that there has been an almost equal change from the earlier history of the common law. I am prepared to defend the assertion that the rules established in the Ten Commandments, not as to mere questions of title and procedure, but as to the fundamentals of right and wrong and of morality, are more nearly the laws in California today than the rules of the common law.

Obviously, therefore, it would be very interesting to know, if we could, whether or not it is true, as orthodox people believe, that the Ten Commandments were traced by the finger of God himself on Mt. Sinai and given to Moses as divine law.

Consistent, however, with my previous statement, I am not going to enlighten you on that subject, at least not today, my brethren of law, not today. I am not going to pause even to state my beliefs thereon. However, I am going to take the liberty of reminding you that if we, in our infirm, human way, were trying to illustrate divine things as compared with human things, we could, I think, find no illustration to equal the history of the Ten Commandments. Those Commandments were promulgated for or by a primitive and recently enslaved people, comparatively few in numbers, out of touch with orderly government, strangers, pilgrims and wanderers in the waste and desert places of that far eastern country. Since they were promulgated, throughout the long centuries of history, nations and civilizations have risen to power, changed laws and changed customs have come and have decayed and passed away. Other religions, other doctrines, other philosophies, have had their day and have either largely passed away, or do not much affect, in our time, the course of human history of of human events. There were long periods, following the Commandments, of contending, rising and falling, civilizations and powers. There was another long, dark period when civilization and law seemed to react, and when the course of civilization and history seemed backward, not forward. And since then, there has come what we believe is a Renaissance toward a higher civilization and a better understanding of the law.

When the Commandments were written, and for long centuries thereafter, civilization, so-called, was a very different thing from what exists in our day and time. Since the Commandments were communicated, the life and conduct of human kind has almost entirely changed in methods of living, in habits of living, and in means of communication. And especially within more recent years, we have seen almost an entire new course of human life—we have seen the invention of steam and its application to industry and travel; we have seen the amazing and varied development of electric power; we have seen the coming of the telegraph, the telephone, the wireless telegraph, and the flying machine, as well as the moving picture and the phonograph, and to an indefinite extent and number the development of the arts and sciences.

Through all these varied and amazing changes the Commandments have traveled unchanged and unchanging. They were just and sufficient for the primitive and pastoral people, by and for whom they were promulgated. They have continued and survived through the rise and fall of civilizations and of nations. And in our own generation, when industry, manufacturing, travel, communication and all of the varied interests of life have been wholly revolutionized and changed, it would be hard to suggest any existing law that could not be clearly traced, either in principle or in general application, to the Commandments. And if all the laws in all the world were repealed today, and the Ten Commandments and the Law of Moses were re-enacted in spirit and effect, there would be little law repealed and little that is new enacted. We travel by express trains instead of riding on donkeys. We have multiplied energy and the applied capacity of mankind a hundred fold. We go around the world in an incredibly short space of time. We communicate, practically instantly, with all parts of the world. And with the development of the moving picture and the phonograph, though a man should die and be dead a thousand years, yet does he live and move and speak again, the very resurrection and the life.

It follows, I think, that if in our human infirmity we were asked to give some illustration of divinity. we would be quite unable to do so from our own consciousness, yet nevertheless, we might illustrate the divine conception of things as compared with the human conception of things by the Ten Commandments and their history, better than in any other way.

I shall not dwell, of course, upon the history of the people who adopted and were or should have been guided by the Ten Commandments, but shall indulge only in a few brief references, illustrating the tendency of humankind to enact laws, to sometimes be guided by and sometimes to violate laws.

We are frequently deluded into the belief that some very ancient things are entirely novel and modern. For instance, I have heard many of my friends boast of the initiative, referendum and recall as modern inventions. It is, therefore, interesting and curious to observe that, after Moses had announced the Ten Commandments, and while they were being engrossed, so to speak, on Mt. Sinai, that by a popular uprising a referendum was instituted by popular will and of popular right. And on account of the delay in the return of Moses and the promulgation of the Commandments, it was moved by initiative that the Golden Calf should be substituted for the Ten Commandments, and illustrating that the majority is always right, the Golden Calf at the referendum defeated the Ten Commandments by at least the ratio of 16 to 1. We also observe that Aaron, the spokesman of Moses, and his brother, upon this occasion, approached nearly to the highest stage of modern statesmanship and political wisdom, in that he immediately glued his ear to the ground, abandoned the Commandments, and, like a true patriot, joined the popular majority and assisted in the manufacture of the Golden Calf. I can almost hear the arguments that were uttered as to the length, complexity, difficulty and undesirability of the Commandments, and the simplicity and beauty of the Golden Calf, as a standard of law and the standard of right. Few people could understand the Ten Commandments, but it would be a simple citizen, indeed, who could not understand and appreciate the Golden Calf. Correspondingly, it followed that the Calf was enthroned and the Ten Commandments were broken. It also followed, as it has frequently happened since, that after a brief period of rejoicing, the Golden Calf was dethroned, never to be re-established in that connection again, and the Ten Commandments were re-enacted frequently to be violated but never again repealed.

Somewhat later in the history of the Jewish people, when they were dwelling under a perfectly good judicial form of government, of which the Prophet Samuel was the chief justice, a movement was established and carried out whereby the judiciary were deposed, and Saul, tall and shapely, but of no great intellectual weight, was crowned King over Israel, to the end and to the purpose that Israel might be as other nations and might be led to war and trouble and hoped-for conquest, as the other nations were.

I am constrained to refer to one other historic incident, that, while it illustrates little directly of the law, is about the best cameo of modern politics that I have been able to discover in ancient history, and that is the occasion when David was dethroned as king temporarily by the uprising of his son Absalom and his followers and was driven into the desert and temporarily out of power.

It appears that when David was old and stricken in years, trouble arose among his sons, and Absalom killed one of his brothers and was banished to Hebron, but, being a very handsome as well as a very ambitious young man, Absalom persuaded his affectionate and yielding father to allow him to return to Jerusalem. And upon his arrival there, the political intrigue commenced. As stated, Absalom was the handsomest man of his time, and by some is believed to have been the handsomest man of all time, which was a bad omen to begin with. Absalom selected some of the handsomest horses obtainable from the neighboring Arabians, and in full regalia and in a chariot rode frequently through the city and was naturally much admired and built up a large following and obtained for himself a great deal of support. He adopted the practice of going to and standing by the gate, called the Gate of Justice, and when a wayfaring Israelite came his way, Absalom would inquire, "Art thou of the tribes of Israel", to which would come the reply "I am, my lord". And then Absalom would say, "And thou comest here to be judged, and there is none to judge thee. Oh, that I were a judge of Israel, that all might receive justice". Illustrating that condemnation of the law's inadequacy and delay is not all of modern origin. And it is observed in Holy Writ that in this way "Absalom stole the hearts of the men of Israel".

As designed and intended, following these intrigues an insurrection was organized, and David, most illustrious and greatest king of Israel, was driven into the desert and out of power, and was followed only by some of his old captains and legions. And Absalom gathered about him a great host, and they pursued David and his followers into the desert. But David, though old, "was a mighty man of valor", and his captains and his legions were gathered together and, notwithstanding the great superiority in numbers and enthusiasm, and in youth, of Absalom and of his followers it is recorded that on the day of the battle forty thousand of the followers of Absalom bit the dust, and Absalom himself was slain.

Immediately following this, the same people that had pursued their illustrious king into the desert gathered about him, re-enthroned him, carried him across the Jordan, and he took a seat upon his throne, where he finished his days in peace and died full of years and honors.

It was through David that the Kingdom of Israel and Judea became a real force in the world, and, while few would suggest it, it is my idea that he is almost the immortal of immortals. He was the one great military leader of his people. His Psalms and his beautiful writings are the freshest literature in the world compared to their age. Through all the intervening time, and apparently throughout all the years to come, he will cause people to remember that: "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul". And, although born in poverty and reared in simplicity, he was a great soldier, a great statesman, a great teacher and a great prophet. And when we recall that he was reviled and dethroned by the very people whom he had made great and immortal, and that he was later restored and carried back to power and to place, we are reminded of how frequently it has been true in history that—

"The hooting mob' in silent awe returns
To gather up its victim's ashes
For history's golden urn".

Following the power and the development of Israel by David, his son Solomon built the Temple, and as a result of the building of that historic edifice, the Ten Commandments were perpetuated and continued and finally became a part, and a most vitally important part, of the civilization of the greatest countries of the world, and a factor in all future human history.

While never as potent as the Commandments and the law originating in religious fervor and belief in divine revelation, there is no question but what the teachings of the Greek philosophers, especially Socrates, Plato and Aristotle, have contributed and will continue to contribute to the learning and to the morals, and therefore to the laws of mankind through indefinite history. Of all philosophers, it is probably true that Aristotle has contributed most to the applied thought and the standards of law, of any of the world's philosophers. Religion is faith in revelation and in divine inspiration. Philosophy is the greatest development of the highest thought and of the greatest capacity of the human mind to understand truth, justice and right.

Wonderful as is the human mind, valuable as is philosophy, its limitations are all too obvious. Ingersoll, the great and eloquent agnostic, said, "We strive to look beyond the heights, we cry aloud; but there comes back naught but the echo of our wailing cry".

Most truthfully it has been said, "There are more things under Heaven than thou hast dreamed of in thy philosophy, oh, Horatio". The fundamental error is in assuming that the Mosaic law is either inspired, divine truth or of no significance whatever. Upon the other hand, it is very clear that the Bible, regardless of any questions of its inspired or divine origin, is the source of most of our ideas of morals, of what is right and what is wrong, and is the foundation of our history of all early times. Therefore, if you insist that the Bible is unimportant and should not be studied because you disbelieve in its divinity, you shut out consideration of the most important basis volume of all our literature; the study of our most related ancient history, the source of our understanding of morals and of right and wrong, and, correspondingly, the source of most of our laws; the connection may be in a sense remote, but it is very obvious.

A refusal to read or study Shakespeare because one did not approve of the theater would be even less foolish than is the refusal to read so invaluable a work of history and of literature and law as the Bible because of a disbelief in its divine inspiration.

Doubtless of all races the Greeks developed the highest degree of philosophy, but they possessed little capacity to apply that philosophy or write it into good or permanent laws. Their laws were erratic, changeable, insecure.

While far less philosophic than the Greeks, the Romans were possessed in a high degree of the genius of government, and so far in history they have been unequalled in their capacity to build a state both powerful and durable; their laws, though unequal and lacking in universality, were very enlightened and highly developed, and continue to shed a valuable, if reflected, light upon the course of human conduct and the development of human laws.

Fortunately these laws, something over 500 years after the birth of Christ, under the wise guidance of Justinian, were collected, codified and preserved in what is referred to as the Justinian Code, perpetuating the name, fame and memory of their author. These codes and laws, while not controlling, have in a very high degree contributed to the enlightenment and perfection of later laws, and are still read and appreciated as one of the great sources of human learning and human law.

From the Justinian Code, it was a long way through the Dark Ages to the Magna Charta of England. The Magna Charta to us is of great significance, and while it can hardly be pointed to as a well-designed statement of legal principles, it is a wonderful application of applied human rights and indicated the growing tendency in the English-speaking people to develop independence under the law and to establish standards and principles to be adhered to, enforced and observed from generation to generation.

In rebellion against the English government, but consistent with the Magna Charta, the American people later adopted the Declaration of Independence, which, although we cannot know yet, we believe to be one of the immortal legal and political documents of history.

It was under the direct light of the Declaration of Independence, illuminated by the far distant light of the Ten Commandments, the Sermon on the Mount, the Magna Charta, and the philosophy and laws of the sages and statesmen of all past ages, that the Constitution of the United States was written, of all governmental documents without question the most perfect classic. When it was written, completed and adopted, it was, as I believe, high noon of the world's civil liberty, and a principle of government was adopted requiring of necessity from time to time to be changed to apply to changing conditions, but never in principle rightly to be repealed or impaired.

The moral that we gather from a consideration of these outstanding historic events is: Of all things, the one thing that endures is truth. And this truth is illustrated by a comparison between the Egyptian and the Hebraic civilizations. The Hebrews were the servants and slaves of the Egyptians. Of all ancient peoples, probably the most psychic and adept were the Egyptians. Their civilization was magnificent, their power for long centuries was widely extended. Their knowledge of science, such as had been then developed, their study of astronomy and astrology, and their occult capacity, was unexcelled and probably unequalled. But they endeavored to immortalize themselves by mumifying their human bodies, and by the construction of amazing monuments of stone in the form of pyramids, and by the erection of other monuments as illustrated by the Sphinx.

It is, however, painful to contemplate that out of all this power and learning and long stretch of civilization there has emanated, so far as we can observe, nothing at all in the way of contribution to the truer enlightenment, the better understanding, or the sense of justice of mankind. Their mummies are curiosities in modern museums, their pyramids are curiosities as to when, why and by whom they were erected. Their Sphinx, unseeing and unspeaking, gazes forth forever over the desert wastes. And through the changing centuries, the Egyptian civilization has retrograded, their castes and their inequalities have continued, and while a few revel in luxury, the great mass, as in the centuries long ago, toil in comparative servitude.

Upon the other hand, the strange and apparently unimportant people who escaped across the sea and the desert, sought to understand and discern the truth, and to follow the divine guidance, as they believed. Their great prophet, lawmaker and ruler sleeps somewhere in the land of Moab, near the mountain of Nebo, and his resting place is unknown, unmonumented and unmarked. And yet to me it would seem a desecration, not an honor, to have a monuument mark the resting place of one more immortal than any monument.

No other writer, philosopher, ruler, judge or lawyer ever contributed in such a large degree to mold the future beliefs, the future laws and the future conduct of mankind. Being, therefore, spiritually and legally immortal, it seems appropriate that the resting place of his body should be unknown and unmarked. In poetic truth it is recorded that this lonely tomb in Moab's land:

"Should speak to these curious hearts of ours
And teach them to be still.
God has his infinities of grace,
Ways that we cannot tell.
He hides them deep, like the secret
sleep,
Of him that he loved so well."

"LET THERE BE LIGHT"

Address of Mr. Victor Abraham of Cincinnati at Friday Evening Services at Charlevoix, Mich., Aug. 23, 1918

"In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth, and the earth was without form and void, and darkness was on the face of the deep, and the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters, and God said, Let there be light, and there was light".

One summer in Switzerland, at Ouchey, on Lake Geneva, I woke ere the break of day. On the Alpine Mountains' crests and o'er the placid waters of the peaceful lake darkness reigned. Soon the first faint touch of dawn silvered the mountain heights, gradually deepening, gradually descending, until at last all down their rugged slopes and over the lake's fair breast resplendent shone the brightness of another morn, welcomed by the melody of birds, and mingled with their glad madrigals, heralding the opening day, was the distant lowing of the awakened kine. My soul seemed to absorb the holy beauty of the scene, for before my gaze had there been repeated one of creation's miracles, again had one of its mysteries been revealed, again from out the darkness of the night had God's voice proclaimed, "Let there be light", and there was light. Yet on that glorious day, though viewing this miracle and mystery revealed, a doubter asked, "Is there a God"?

In that bright morning's dawn the husbandmen in many lands went unto the fields, took from off their stalks the golden-tasseled corn and shook from off the trees the olive and their ripened fruit; the vintager plucked from the vine the luscious grape, pressed from it, with ready hand, its ruddy overflowing wine; corn, wine and oil, which had come at His command, in miracle and mystery from the earth; and plucking their products from stalk and vine and shrub and tree, again a doubter asked, "Is there a God"?

And on that sun-kissed day young men and maidens went unto the dance, bedecked with garlands of fragrant rose and beauteous lilies, with flowers redolent and radiant in hue and perfume—miracle and mystery—work of a living God; and yet, viewing the beauty and scenting the fragrance of the flowers, and recognizing not Him whose hand had painted the purity of the lily, and whose breath had breathed into the rose the sweetening of its fragrance, one among them asked, "Is there a God"?

In the stillness of the night men with faces upraised saw in the dome of heaven the "Sentinel stars keep their watch in the sky", planets suspended by the will of their great Creator, moving in miracle and mystery through the immensity and infinity of illimitable space, and still a doubter, among them gazing, asked, "Is there a God"?

A mother saw her infant's earliest smile, and on bended knee poured forth her thankfulness to God for His great gift, as rapturously from her heart welled forth her love responsive—miracle of birth, mystery of love. An aged man, footsore with travel and weary with life's cares, smiled as he closed his eyes in their last, eternal sleep—mystery and death; and in the presence of these mysteries of life and love and death men, still doubting, ask, "Is there a God"?

To souls attuned in harmony the "Heavens are telling the glory of God and the firmanent showeth His handiwork". To them, "Day unto day uttereth speech and night unto night showeth knowledge". Yet 'mid all the miracles of our daily lives—mysteries, though before our eyes, still unsolved and beyond the comprehension and compass of our intellect—men, doubting, denying, defying, demand, "Prove to us a God; let our finite minds comprehend the Infinite". They, having ears, hear not His voice in the thunder's crash, in the cataract's roar, the symphony of the summer zephyrs, nor in the admonitions from the still, small voice of conscience within themselves; and, having eyes, see not His handiwork in the stars of heaven, nor in the clod of earth, discern it not in the clouds watering the thirsty ground, nor in the fruitful vine, the golden harvest, nor in the manna which o'er spreads in every wilderness, and feel not His presence in the tenderest emotions of the soul.

Ascribing to "Nature", not to Nature's God, all that is material of earth, they fail to recognize that their own spirituality must have its source in a higher spirituality, their own intelligence must emanate from a Supreme Intelligence, that Supreme Intelligence—God—to whom we bow the head and bend the knee in prayer. To those who [illegible] darkness, "Let there be light".

Within the ghetto walls, as [illegible] of the Sabbath eve descended, the Jew lighted the taper to illumine [illegible]. Through centuries of persecution it shone for him an emblem of Divine light an emblem of those truths which inspired him and kept him, 'mid torture and flame, constant to his faith secure that out of his present darkness God should declare again for Israel, "Let there be light", and so, within our homes, where too often we receive unthankfully, perhaps unworthily, His bounteous blessings, and in the homes where spiritual darkness reigns, may the burning taper announce, "Let there be light".

Wherever there be darkness, "Let there be light". Where want and sorrow dwell, or pain and misery abide, "Let there be light". Where into the horrors of war America's sons have gone to offer up their lives that the democracies of the earth may live and may endure; where the heel of the invader treads into the dust a defenseless people; where widows wail and lisping children cry in anguish for a crust of bread, "Let there be light".

When from out the deep valley of the shadow of doubt or grief o'erpowering, a soul looks to the mountain heights for the silver torch of dawn presaging a brighter day, may God's voice from out the darkness again proclaim, "Let there be light".

Repeating from our text, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth, and God said, Let there be light. may we bear with us from this service the faith that "In the beginning God created" and the assurance of its supreme truth in the beginning "There was God".

"A Book of Jewish Thoughts for Jewish Sailors and Soldiers". Selected and arranged by the Chief Rabbi (Dr. J. H Hertz of Great Britain). Eyre & Spottswood, publishers, London, 1918.

In compiling this book of Jewish thoughts for the Jewish sailors and soldiers, the Chief Rabbi of Great Britain entered the vast realm of Jewish literature, the dwelling place of light, picked some of the most beautiful flowers of thought, wove them into a wreath of glory for the Jewish forces fighting for the freedom of the world and for the justice and righteousness of humanity.

Dr. J. H. Hertz created one of those rare little volumes which direct attention by the very daintiness of their outward form, one of those savory little morsels of the highest grade of literature which tempt the taste beyond resistance with their great promise of enjoyment, with which you fall in love at first sight, and the longer you linger over their luscious pages the greater their contents grow to enchant and captivate the soul. For there the right word is always in the right place and every thought expressed suffuses the mind with radiant light which purifies the heart from hate and fills it with love for all fellowmen.

With the introduction of his book of Jewish thoughts to the Jewish sailors and soldiers the Chief Rabbi of Great Britain entered the firing line on the British front as a valiant hero and introduced a new, powerful weapon, not of destruction but of construction, and which is stronger than the most powerful gun or cannon and more far-reaching in its effect. It is the weapon of the still, small voice, the comrade of conscience. For the warrior who is in possession of this armament loses all fear, gains the highest grade of courage and becomes a commanding conqueror

This book of Jewish thoughts is divided into six departments: I. The Jewish Warrior; II. The People of the Book; III. The Testimony of the Nations; IV. The Voice of Prayer; V. The Voice of Wisdom; VI. Index. Each department is well arranged.

We join the author when he prays: "May these 'Thoughts' help you to realize that every Israelite holds the honor of his people in his hands" and hope that these "Thoughts" will surely do it

WHAT CONSTITUTES SUCCESS?

He has achieved success who has lived well, laughed often and loved much; who has gained the respect of intelligent men and the love of little children; who has filled his niche and accomplished his task; who has left the world better than he found it, whether by an improved poppy, a perfect poem or a rescued soul; who has never lacked appreciation of earth's beauty or failed it; who has looked for the best in others and given the best he had; whose life was an inspiration; whose memory is a benediction.—Mrs. A. "A High and Holy Appeal to the Conscience of the American Jew"

By Rev. Dr. Jacob H. Kaplan, Reading Road Temple, Cincinnati, Ohio

Is. 56:1-2: "Thus saith the Lord: Keep ye justice and do righteousness. For my salvation is near to come, and my favor to be revealed. Happy is the man that doth this, and the son of man that holdeth fast by it: That keepeth the Sabbath from profaning it, and keepeth his hands from doing any evil".

On this High and Holy Day, the Jewish New Year, I am going to make a High and Holy Appeal to the conscience of the American Jew, an appeal that has never been made by any one in the modern age with that earnestness and that determination that it shall be heeded, with which I appeal now to you, to every man and woman in American Israel. Never in the history of the world was this Memorial Day of ours celebrated in more serious times, never were greater and more heroic sacrifices made, never was Israel more honored and respected by a world, conscious of the past gifts and the present worth of our heroic people. And the appeal I shall make is the same appeal which the great prophet of Israel made to the House of Israel at a time when the world at large was not prepared as it is today to appreciate the consecration of a whole people to the spiritual values of life.

Before you answer that it cannot be done, let me remind you that when Moses sent men to investigate the condition of the land and the people of Canaan, the majority returned with the report that it cannot be done, and they were believed as majority reports are so often believed, while Joshua and Caleb, viewing the same facts, brought the minority report, that it can be done. And as if to set a criterion for all future time in similar crises of conflicting reports, God is reported to say: "Say unto them, as I live, saith God, surely as ye have spoken in my ears, so will I do unto you".

And so it was they who said, "It cannot be done" did not do it. They died in the wilderness without beholding the glory of a free people in a free land. While they who said, "It CAN BE DONE", led the people into the promised land; and though often unsung and unhonored, they have continued to lead Israel to ever higher planes of spiritual vision and human service.

Through the long and weary march across the dark centuries the majority have asked the Jews, not always in gentle words, why they stubbornly guard the secrets of their religious truths, what hidden charm they found in worshipping the God of truth and justice, and yet today in the mighty struggle of the earth to bring forth a new era in the development of mankind, we see how utterly impossible it would have been to voice the ideals of our president, so ably and so often reiterated, so gladly and willingly and heroically embraced by a world but yesterday steeped in selfishness, if Israel had not suffered and lived for the truth, voiced by Isaiah and embodied in our nation's championship that we shall not fail nor be discouraged until we have set justice in all the earth. (Is. 42:4).

Then again, we know that through the centuries every prayer of Israel, every dream and every hope has been to see a restored Palestine. And yet, when a few years ago a few bold spirits championed the cause of working for the realization of that dream, the vast majority of Jews ridiculed and discouraged the attempt. Within a few short years, through God's help, the miraculous course of events have so shaped the entire course of human history as to make this dream of the few one of the stakes of diplomacy in the world war. The imagination of even a magician did not dream such possibilities.

Whatever may be the outcome of the Zionist dream, it will at best solve only one-fifth of the Jewish problem of life and existence. Aside of showing the sympathetic, cordial help that every great movement in Israel has received from the noble Jewish heart, the American Jew has a tremendous problem of his own to solve, a problem of life and death, a problem of self-consecration or desecration of his sacred inheritance.

Nearly all thinking Jews agree that the core of Israel's life is spirituality, a genius for religionizing human life, a divine visualization of every national and individual institution and practice.

What is the Jew, the refined, cultured, energetic American Jew going to do after the war with the Mission which he has set for himself, with the commission of God to become a Holy, a Priest People?

The first part of Isaiah's appeal, to keep justice and righteousness, until God's salvation is at hand, the Jew has, I believe, kept most faithfully and at the greatest conceivable sacrifice. He has labored in every city, every country, in the presence of superstition, in spite of oppression, in spite of all the host of inimical forces let loose upon him by unthinking and unfeeling fellowmen, labored with his life blood to uphold justice, to set men thinking upon justice by his very presence and his stubbornness to hold his own, by his millions of martyrs for the right to live his own life in his own way. And so, greatly at the expense of the Jew, the world has slowly learnt the lesson of tolerance first, justice next, and now justice to all the world. Justice to all the world will now at last be the ideal for centuries to come among all peoples of the earth.

But the second part of the prophet's appeal, to keep the Sabbath, to spiritualize all life, what has the Jew done in that direction, what will he do now in this new era of world history?

The Jew is the most ancient and the most modern of men because he has intuitively or through divine guidance taken hold of the true conception of life as Spencer has later defined it, an adjustment of inner conditions to outer conditions. Everything in nature moves, nothing is immovable. The Jew would have been eliminated from the processes of nature, if he had not moved along with the tide of life. In every age he has through his religious genius adjusted his inner life to his outer conditions. That is the secret of life. Without that living force the Jew would have been either preserved as a specimen of archeology, or else entirely buried beneath the dust of ages. And yet the Jew is alive, and not only alive, but the most modern man with a most ancient history. He is the lineal descendant of the prophets, the Levites, the kings and the philosophers of the House of Israel. And this merely because he knew the meaning of life, an adjustment, constant adjustment of life to ever changing conditions.

But always it was an adjustment of OUR religion, OUR relation to God, to the form and need of the age.

From the very first inception of the racial life Moses, on the advice of Jethro, appointed men of reputation to adjust Israel's life to the Laws of God as they were then known. The biblical history of Israel shows us age after age of change and adjustment of the inner life of the people to the outer life of the world. The wonderful and noteworthy fact about this constant adjustment is that the leaders and prophets in Israel saw for the first time in human recorded history that among these outer conditions to which the inner life must adjust is the MORAL LAW OF GOD. The entire history of Israel revolves about this discovery, and all the history of the human family, including the present war and any future war we may have, revolves upon a thorough comprehension of this discovery of Israel.

When Shalmeneser took captive the Northern tribes of Israel, they adjusted themselves to their surroundings in their Assyrian provinces, but as they had no distinctive inner life of their own to adjust, they were utterly lost, completely assimilated, so that no trace is left of them. Quite different is the history of Judah in the Babylonian captivity a century and a half later. They also had to adjust themselves to their surroundings, they felt at home after due time in their surroundings, but they adjusted their OWN INNER LIFE to the Babylonian surroundings, and from this adjustment and from their return and resettlement flowed forth all the spiritual blessings of which we and all the world are heirs.

The same principle of immortal life made itself felt in that deathless struggle of the Maccabees. Many Jews of the upper classes had adjusted themselves to the Greek culture so completely that they were being absorbed by that culture, when the band of true Jews, recognizing the principle of life, that of adjustment of their OWN inner life to that of their surroundings, rebelled against the sweet absorption into death and saved the forces of religious life for the salvation of the world. For it cannot be denied that had the Maccabees not risen against the Hellenizing forces of the land, Judaism would not have survived, and Christianity and Mohammedanism would not have been born to bring whatever spiritual light the civilized world has thus far enjoyed.

After the close of the Biblical Canon and long before Christianity was born the Jews continued to live and to adjust their inner life to outer necessity, and were embodying the results in the Mishna. Of course, after the rise of Christianity the Jews were supposed to have ceased to exist, but in spite of their supposed burial, they continued to live, and to live their own life in the world, absorbing whatever is good but never ceasing to breathe THEIR OWN SPIRIT into the time and place of their abode. And thus the Gemara arose, recording the history of the constant adjustment of life to life. That is the Jewish Genius!

Now Modern Reform Judaism has done practically the same thing that the Jews have always done in all ages, only the adjustment to the surroundings paid more attention to the surroundings than the INNER LIFE OF OUR OWN sacred past. One need not be a profound student of history to realize that there were good and sufficient reasons that brought about this undesirable result. We were getting tired of abuse, intolerance, prejudice, suspicion, humiliation and in the flowering forth of the modern spirit of education and political emancipation the Jews felt that they should have a part and a place assured them. Even then the early reform spirits did not dream of the laxity and the modern lack of reverence and appreciation for our own Jewish religious life. Among all the other sacred things that have been lost in this mighty struggle is the Sabbath, the great institution that has brought blessings to all the world. But we have had to give up this long hallowed and blessed day of spiritual uplift and religious joy. For no one, who has ever lived in a Jewish home, and observed the Jewish Sabbath with all the courtesies to the spirit of the day and in the name of our Father in Heaven, will or can forget the inexpressible joy that the poorest Jew felt in that Sabbath consecration. No wealth and no position of any man, in any place, can equal that divine joy. And yet we have sold all that rich inheritance for business necessity. We are not, however, strictly honest with ourselves and with our religion and with the world, and I know the humblest Jewish heart as well as the proudest, and know that we do not intend to be dishonest with ourselves or disloyal to our religion. We are just drifting, drifting into the melting pot of unrecognition, and that in spite of the fact that we are sincerely in earnest when we say we love our religion and have a mission in the world.

When the world war is over we shall have won a place for every nation and every people on earth, when secret diplomacy and ungentlemanly understandings will have been relegated to the limbo of yesterday, when in the light of day nations and policies and individuals will be seen and judged what are we, American Jews, going to do with our religion and our inherited commission to be a priest and a holy nation? We shall not want, out of self-respect, to continue to repeat in the Temple, "Remember the Sabbath day to sanctify it" and then go about our business, thinking that neither our children nor our neighbor will ever know the discrepancy in word and conduct nor will anyone ever hold us to account. As a Jewish people there is nothing more sacred to us than our good name, than our priceless heritage with which we have blessed the world. As American gentlemen of honor and integrity we cannot and dare not continue to hide ourselves behind the driftwood of necessity, but rather in this new era, ushered in through the countless sacrifices of life, labor and wealth, we must continue to serve humanity, as we have been appointed to serve, by deathless example of loyalty to our religious life and this loyalty demands that we observe the Sabbath in the beauty of Holiness. Observe the Sabbath in the true Jewish spirit, in joy and health, and consecration of mind and body.

It means sacrifice, this that I ask of the American Jew, but I ask it of a people schooled in the meaning of sacrifice; I ask it of a people that has always rejoiced in sacrifice for God's sake; I ask it of a people that consecrated its whole life in all the long course of its existence to sacrifice.

Men have proposed substitutes, makeshifts, half-hearted observance, and the like. I have done so time and again. None of the suggestions have ever taken hold of the Jewish people because I realize now that all these makeshifts are too trifling for so serious a people, of so serious a problem. The young American Jew is anxious to do and to live for his religion that shall require of him something worthy of his noble spirit, some sacrifice commensurate with his power and dignity of selfhood. We have tried all these years to make religion so simple and worthless, so void of all demands on all real manhood, and hence we have just what we asked for, a worthless, unobserved Sabbath.

I make this High and Holy Appeal to the conscience of the American Jew on this High and Holy day of New Year to observe the Sabbath that the Jew might be a living example unto all the world of the dignity of the Jewish Mission, of the reality of the divine spirit. and I feel in my heart of hearts that there will be some Jews in this glorious land who will hear the call and respond in such a way that means will be found and opportunity will be made possible for the observance of the Sabbath.

I know that Jewish manufacturers and the Jewish wholesalers can by united action so arrange the workday hours as to crowd the working hours into five days and let his employees have Saturday as well as Sunday free to enjoy the fruits of labor and of the spirit.

As for the others, I do not know, and I do not have to know the details of how to make Sabbath observance pay, I only know the joy divine of a true Sabbath. and I know the promise of God which has been verified throughout history. "As I live, saith God, as ye have spoken in my ears, so will I do unto you".

Whatever we wish wholeheartedly, we can do, God helps us to do. Let us of our own free will and accord find ways of so arranging our life that we can sanctify the Sabbath in the sight of all the living. For after all, what benefit is it to free the world, to make the world safe for Democracy, if we ourselves with all the sacrifices and the rivers of blood and tears are not free to enjoy the peace of mind that our Sabbath has brought not only to us but to all the people in the civilized world! What good to save the world, if we cannot save our own noblest inheritance, to be enslaved by the fear that unless we live a religious lie, we shall not be able to have bread to eat and raiment to put on?

Do not, I beg you, put this appeal aside with the comforting thought that it is an appeal to the foreign Jew, who has not yet a business to open and close. or to the young man, who has no position yet to keep him away from the house of God and from the sanctifying influence of a home with dear ones. I mean this appeal for the high-minded American Jew, whose sons and daughters I understand better even than their fathers and mothers, who have destroyed the idealism of their children, the inherited funds of Jewish spirit, by demanding and expecting nothing heroic. nothing worth while from them until this great war awoke the slumbering, heroic energy of the youth of our people, I appeal to them and to you, and everyone in whose veins flows the Jewish, consecrated blood of idealism to help usher into Judaism a new era of religious life that by precept and by example we might continue to be worthy in God's sight to remain the priest people, to serve, to help, to inspire, and to labor for all the children of men.

May God bless you in the New Year and accept in favor your sacrifices as a peace-offering and blessing for the entire brotherhood of man. Amen.

JEWS AND MOSLEMS IN PALESTINE

A significant example of the good relations of Moslems and Jews in the Holy Land was afforded by a little ceremony which took place recently in Jerusalem. Dr. Weizmann, head of the Zionist Commission to Palestine, had been so fortunate as to be able to acquire in Cairo the historic copy of the Koran belonging to the town of Adrianople, and he formally handed it over to the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem. The Moslem community was much touched by this mark of consideration on the part of a devotee of another religion and acknowledged the gift with cordiality and enthusiasm —(Reuter.)

THE SEVENTH MONTH

By DR. MAX L. MARGOLIS

The seventh month in our calendar is one into which are crowded holy days, with their symbols and ceremonies, and memorial days, with their historical reminiscences, all with their singular appeal to the emotions running the whole gamut from the seriousness attending the "fearful days" at the beginning to the laxity marking the celebration of "the joy of the Law" at the close. The seventh month it is, and yet it opens up with the New Year. Two systems of computation have apparently crossed one another; while the months are counted from the spring, the year dates from the autumn. Nor was it at all necessary for the opening day of the year to synchronize with the first of the month. For a time, it seems, the new year began with the tenth of the month, on the Day of Atonement; thus in the jubilee year the horn of liberty was sounded then, and our sounding the horn at the end of our services today is a remnant of the older custom. So much has gone into the make-up of the New Year! It is with us not a day of hilarity. We have no room for carnival orgies. Whatever its antecedents, our New Year's Day is a day of solemnity. Its tone is one of the utmost seriousness. It is the annual day of judgment.

In ancient Babylon the opening of the year was conceived as one upon which the destinies were decreed; the city-god was carried in procession and enthroned in his temple. Something of that conception has been imparted to our own festival. The joyful tone pervading the liturgy is the cry of acclaim, The Lord is enthroned, He reigneth. But there the similarity ends. The reign of the Lord means the reign of justice tempered with mercy. We sing no songs of jubilation, we intone no Hallel psalms, when before the heavenly throne the books of the living and the books of the dead lie open, and the destiny of men and the destiny of nations hang in the balance. The poet of the synagogue has blended into one grandiose picture the pessimism of Job and the majestic visions of Isaiah. The Ruler of the universe opens court; He is surrounded by the hosts of the angels, who all tremble when the great horn is sounded, for even they are not pure before Him; it is for them as well as for frailer man the Day of Judgment. The heavenly books are produced, the books of record, wherein are listed the doings of every man, his merits and demerits sealed with the signature of every human being. The decree is pronounced, who is to live and who is to die, who is to die a timely death and who before his time, and the manner of death is specified.

On New Year's Day the decree is written down, but it is not sealed until the Day of Atonement. The days of penitence intervene. An opportunity is afforded for the sinner to repent. Repentance, prayer and charity set aside the evil decree. In the old prayer books, in small letters, the words Fasting, Voice and Money are superscribed. That is the popular conception, and though we all fast on the Day of Atonement and the fewer on the other intervening days, the majority of our brethren consider the essence of prayer to be noise amidst lack of decorum, and the women in the galleries contribute their whining on all occasions. Just how many part with their money remains to be ascertained. But we know that almsgiving is the smaller part of charity; that the silent but devout prayer is just as efficacious as the noisy; and that penitence is of the heart.

The true fast day, according to the prophet's conception, is for rectifying social wrongs rather than for the mere afflicting of the body. There is so much in the liturgy that brings out Israel's supreme faith in the One God, who will cause the arrogant kingdom, the world-power usurping His dominion, to pass away and then bring on the Kingdom of God for a humanity united as one band. The hymn, "And All Shall Come to Worship Thee", has been called the "Jewish Marseillaise". The synagogue listening to the sound of the horn reminds itself of the first revelation on Mount Sinai and reaffirms its hope in the future revelation to a united Israel gathered from all corners of the world.

The fast of Gedaliah, on the third day of the month, commemorates the slaying of the Jewish governor left in the land by the Babylonians. Had Gedaliah understood how to guard himself there would have been no break in the tenure of Judea by the Jewish people and no restoration such as occurred later under Cyrus and Darius would have been necessary.

The Day of Atonement addresses itself primarily to the individual. It is the day when the soul that sinneth may rehabilitate itself through penitence. The pomp of the sacrifical ceremonies passed away long ago, and, humanly speaking, will never be restored. Yet it must have been a magnificent spectacle. It has impressed itself upon the people's memory. The high priest, officiating in person, clad in his vestments of office, surrounded by his brother priests, attended by a vast concourse of people, all kneeling down as the high celebrant pronounces the ineffable Name!

We possess a description by a contemporary eye-witness, the Son of Sirach, and the liturgists of the synagogue have borrowed his phraseology to convey to posterity the awe of the spectacle. It is the day upon which sinful Israel is restored to heavenly grace. Israel needs no mediator, no man-god, to intercede for him. He stands face to face with the Supreme Reality. It is the day upon which the Jew divests himself of the impurities clinging to him from the street, from the environment which forces upon him so many a compromise. In the synagogue, on the Day of Atonement, we would all be full Jews, arraying ourselves in the white garments of purity and showing ourselves united as the heavenly host is above. Amidst the outcries of the individual conscience, as it surveys our innermost soul and balances up our credit and debit sheet, there are interspersed the moans of the Jewish body aggregate lamenting its past glories and crying out for restoration.

"Every city is builded upon its foundation, but the City of God is lowered to the nethermost pit". As always in Judaism, the universal and the particular are intermingled. Man, not Israel, was set apart from the beginning to stand before God, to be Godlike; yet Israel longs for the day of national restoration on the holy soil; but withal it is a purified Israel that can be found worthy of redemption.

The Festival of Booths was Palestine's Thanksgiving Day. It marked the close of the agricultural activities of the year, the ingathering of the fruits. The dwelling in booths was incident to the harvest festivities; but it was subsequently associated with the historical episode of the passage through the wilderness, the same wilderness through which now a railroad track has been laid and from which the British occupation has taken place. The Jew, whether he be Zionist or not, must be particularly thrilled this year at this closing festival of the month. It is indeed for him a Day of Thanksgiving. The traditionalist may still wait for the blast of the great horn and for all the miracles which popular imagination has woven around the final act of liberation. We also may inject a religious tone into our rejoicing. Nothing happens unless it is willed by God. There are miracles visible and miracles invisible. The popular imagination can comprehend only the signs visible. But the divine ordering of history proceeds along invisible paths and they are none the less miraculous. It was God's spirit that had stirred the heart of Cyrus of old. It is God's spirit has stirred the heart of Balfour, speaking for the British government, and of our own President, who in a letter timed to reach the Jewish people as a New Year's gift, has expressed his acquiescence in the British scheme of turning over Judea to Jewish endeavor. The Jew in Palestine constitutes the element of the population with which the Allied powers can work; Jewish legionaires are battling under England's command; we see the beginning of redemption, and a seat of Jewish culture has been founded amidst the acclamations of the Allied statesmen and of sister institutions in the world. Surely we have reason to be glad, and in this season of our joy we bless the Ruler of battles, who has brought to an undreamed of realization the yearnings of His people through these centuries. And from Redeemed Zion there will be shed luster upon scattered Jewry, who in their various abodes will continue loyal citizens, and while loving their many fatherlands will cherish the mother country, the seat of Jewish culture in the land of the fathers.

AMERICAN JEWISH LEGION ARRIVES IN PALESTINE

The Zionist Organization of America has received a cablegram announcing the safe arrival in Palestine of the first and second contingents of the American Jewish Legion. These contingents were recruited during March and April and have since been in training at Windsor, Canada, and at Egg Buckland, near Plymouth, England. They will join up with the Jewish regiment which was recruited in London and which is already on the firing line north of Jaffa, Palestine.

SPIRITUAL RESULTS OF JEWISH WAR RELIEF CAMPAIGNS

By ALBERT. P. LEWIN

Instructor in English, University of Missouri

Only second in importance to the actual work of rescuing the stricken Jews of Europe, which the campaign for Jewish War Relief is effecting, is the profound influence of the movement upon ourselves here at home. It will indeed be enough if we can send the indispensable money which will feed the starving millions who look upon their brothers and sisters in America as their sole hope; it will be enough if we can save those five-year-old children, who, the cablegrams say, because of continual malnutrition, have never been able to walk. The work of the committee under the distinguished chairmanship of that great American, Mr. Louis Marshall, and with the splendid executive directorship of Mr. Jacob Billikopf, has brought and is bringing a great response from the nation in behalf of these innocent victims of war. Last year's $10,000,000 campaign shows how loyally American Jewry responded to the appeal made in behalf of our suffering people by these illustrious men and their associates on the American Jewish Relief Committee. But even that was only an indication of what can be done—indeed, is being done now. In the sixty campaigns already held this year, the response has been from 50 to 1,000 per cent more than in 1917. The splendid amounts subscribed in Baltimore, Boston, Newark, Pittsburgh, Des Moines, Kansas City, St. Louis and Portland, Oregon, are representative of many others. The result is that over $5,000,000 has already been raised in the 1918 campaign with such large cities as New Orleans, San Francisco, Chicago and New York still untouched.

But what is becoming more evident every day is the profound spiritual change which is being wrought by the campaign among the Jews in this country. Mr. Billikopf himself, in an article in the Menorah Journal for February, 1918, describing the romance of raising $10,000,000 last year, has remarked upon the tremendous spiritual gain to the Jews themselves who are being called upon to give as never before. It is a truism, of course, that the wonderful thing about charity is its beneficent reaction upon the charitable. To every contributor there has been a spiritual return quite incommensurate with his material investment. Here, for example, is a well-to-do Jewish merchant, whose concern hitherto has been wholly in his business and in his family, who gives $1,000 to the cause. His horizon is suddenly broadened. He becomes something of a figure in the eyes of his friends and neighbors. A fountain of good will, where before had been apparently a spiritual desert, suddenly begins to flow. A great gain in character is being effected among the Jewish people in America as a whole by this loosening of their purse-strings. As Nathan Straus, in an address at Wilkesbarre, Pa., trenchantly put it: "The saying is: 'Give until it hurts'. My personal experience makes me change it to 'Give until it feels good' ". The habit of generosity once formed, even if its origin lies in extraneous social pressure, moulds subtly but incalculably the whole character.

More important even than this great personal growth in character which the work is bringing about is its success in breaking down traditional barriers between various groups of Jews. Working in a common cause, Russian and German Jew, Orthodoz, Reform and freethinker, have suddenly forgotten their old hostilities and have developed a brotherliness that seemed almost impossible before. There is nothing like a united endeavor to annihilate old differences, and the necessity of relief has called forth that fusion. This spiritual bond has been growing stronger and stronger, and as the work of the committee goes on, there can be no doubt that a unity will be achieved in this country which no one would have dared to predict three years ago. It is impossible to estimate how much of this unity, rising fundamentally out of a great need, is due to the inspired leadership of Jacob H. Schiff and the great men associated with him.

But even more important than either of these two spiritual by-products is the deep change that is being wrought in the sentiment of non-Jews. When the work of the committee began two years ago, and even last year, there was almost no solicitation from citizens of other creeds. Though the Jews have always been ready to give to charities of every description, they have been equally diffident about asking others to help them. They have undergone deep sacrifices of need were rather than yield to the slightest degree their pride of race. But now the need has become too great for them to bear alone. When practically the whole race in Europe is threatened with extinction, measures apparently desperate must be resorted to.

Under this pressure, in the most recent campaigns, the co-operation of non-Jews has been sought. Experience has shown that the difficulty was indeed only apparent. Once the reluctance of the Jews themselves was overcome, the response of the non-Jews was astonishingly generous and sincere. The Jews have discovered a new gold mine of sympathy. Wherever their help has been requested, non-Jews have eagerly responded. And they have helped not only by personal contributions. In many instances they have devoted time and energy in unstinted measure in the work of organization and solicitation. The contagion of disinterested zeal and enthusiasm for a great cause has caught city after city.

Wilmington, Del., is already the classic example. Opening the campaign with an objective of $75,000, before the drive was over Wilmington had raised $140,000. It is no reflection upon the superb generosity of the Jews of Wilmington, who, under the splendid chairmanship of Mr. David Snellenburg, gave time and money without stint—it is no reflection upon their generosity to say that this magnificent total would not have been reached without the wonderful support of the non-Jewish members of the executive committee, notably Pierre S du Pont, John Roskob, William Coyne and John S. Russell. The stirring appeal of Dr. Natham Krass, warmly seconded by eloquent addresses by ministers of all creeds, created a spirit of ardent co-operation in charity, which made Julius Rosenwald, whose unprecedented subscription of $1,000,000 last year has given a glow of philanthropic greatness to his fame, declare that he had never before seen so inspiring a sight. The non-Jews in Wilmington made us see our cause in a clearer and truer light. To them the appeal is human, not sectarian. As Senator Saulsbury put it, "This is not a Jewish movement; it a human movement. It will clothe where clothing is needed and feed where feeding is necessary; it will go wherever the cry of humanity calls it. It is of human beings, for human beings, and by human beings".

The glorious spirit of this utterance has found its most brilliant manifestation so far in the Newark, N. J., campaign Never was there more thorough co-operation of all creeds working in a common cause. Protestant ministers and Catholic priests gave stirring appeals; wealthy non-Jewish business men were at the head of the list of contributors; newspapers published persuasive editorials. But most striking of all was the gesture of Mayor Gillen, of Newark, who turned over to the campaign committee "the entire machinery of the city". In the week of the drive the police and fire departments were rivals in the work. The police canvassed all the theaters, made passersby drop money in the coin boxes, organized picnics and block dances. The firemen did likewise and in addition gave a daily performance on the main streets with hook and ladder, which made the crowds respond enthusiastically.

But the most brilliant single stroke of the Newark campaign was the use of the six-pointed blue star with the words "American Jewish War Relief and Welfare Board; In Humanity's Name". This star the police pasted—for a stated contribution—to the windshield of every automobile. For many days it was impossible to see an unstarred automobile in Newark. This star was a stroke of genius, for it did more than it was supposed to do. It not only raised money, but it marked the entire city with a visible symbol of a spiritual unity in behalf of Jewish War Relief.

A multitude of examples of the spiritual harmony evoked by these drives is now at hand. The non-Jews of Trenton, N. J.; of Pittsburgh and of Duluth, Minn., and of many other cities have been no less zealous in our cause than those of Wilmington and Newark. But a special word deserves to be given to the negro boy of Duluth, who gave the entire proceeds of his sale of the Saturday Evening Post—$28.00—to the Jewish War Sufferers as a token, he said, of "what Julius Rosenwald has done for us".

THE JEW—HIS DESTINY

By Charles C. Pavey

"Is ours a lower order of people? Why should I, even in Caesar's presence, feel the shrinking of a slave? Tell me especially why, if I have the soul, and so choose, I may not hunt the honors of the world in all its fields"?—Ben-Hur.

The destiny of the Jew has been a long debated and much vexed question. For more than twenty centuries the countries of Europe have not known what to do with the Jew. He has been all these years a torment and nuisance to the people with whom he has lived, and statesmen of Europe have cussed and discussed him, and all sorts of plans for his disposal and removal from their midst. What to do with the Jew has been and ever omnipresent but apparently unsolvable problem. All at once, with the coming of the great war cloud in Europe, there came from a clear sky a new idea. A revolution in sentiment, as remarkable and astonishing as the world war itself, suddenly arose upon the horizon, and England and America have taken the lead in asking not what we can do with the Jew, but what can we do for the Jew? The most logical solution seems to be the rehabilitation of the Jew as a nation in Palestine. This is not a newly suggested solution of the old question, but it has had an impetus, remarkable for its spontaneity and for the prospects for its early and permanent fulfillment. It is not the purpose of this paper to discuss either the question of what the world will do with the Jew, or what the world will do for the Jew, but what the Jew will likely do with the world. Preliminary to that discussion a brief review of the career of the Jew is pertinent and important as reflecting upon the future of the world in the hands of the Jew.

In their origin, their history and their religion they are the most wonderful and peculiar of all the peoples in the annals of this world. Anciently and until the Dispersion under Nebuchadnezzar, 586 B. C., as a nation they are properly known as Hebrews, as a religious hierarchy as Israelites. Since the Dispersion the term Jew applies to them both as a people and as a religious sect. They are of Semitic origin, how ancient no one knows. Assyrian and Egyptian records contain references to such a people, but practically the only authentic account of their origin and early history is found in the Old Testament.

The King of England can trace his proud ancestry back nine hundred years to William the Conqueror;the Imperial Hohenzollern to 1415; the House of Hapsburg to 1096, four centuries before the discovery of America, but the humblest Jew can tract a direct line 4,000 years back to Abraham, and while it may be largely mythical, he can still trace it back through Noah to the Garden of Eden, by a most creditable table of genealogical records. So much for his genealogy.

Six centuries before the Trojan war Abram and Lot, with their families and their herds, went forth from Ur of the Chaldees and came into Canaan. Five centuries later, after Abram had gone down into Egypt and had gone back again; after Isaac and Jacob and Esau were born and gathered to their fathers; after Joseph had been sold into Egypt, and after the Exodus and the Wandering in the Wilderness, and while the Mediterranean Sea was yet the center of the earth, and the earth was flat and stationery, Moses came down from the clouds of Mt. Sinai bearing to all the world the Ten Great Commandments—the Decalogue of the Christian Faith.

For two thousand years before the Christian Era, while our ancestors, the Teutons, Angles and Saxons, were barbarians in the forests of Europe, the Hebrews were the sears, the prophets, the kings, and the law-givers of a highly civilized nation—a nation that lived in tents, herding their flocks; or in houses growing grapes, olives and figs; building palaces and temples of worship and promulgating, solely and exclusively, amidst the polytheism of the whole world, a monotheism—the existence of a one God—not a god of stone, or wood, or brass, or of the sun or moon, but a Spiritual Being, the God of the Christians; and last but not least, while the soldiers of Rome held Transalpine Gaul and England captive, the Jews gave to the Christion world the Mother and the Son. Seldom do we remember that Mary was a Jewess and Christ a Jew. No wonder the author of "Over the Teacups" exclaimed:

"Thy prophets caught the Spirit's flame,
From thee the Son of Mary came,
With thee the Father deigned to dwell,
Peace be with thee, Israel".

So much for the Hebrew and two thousand years of his history before the Christian Era. Now what about the Jew?

The story of the Jew begins with the Babylonian captivity, but little concerns us of his history for the succeeding six centuries, down to the advent of Christ, except a glance at the Talmud. Prior to the destruction of Jerusalem and the Captivity, under Nebuchadnezzar, the laws, customs and ceremonials of the Hebrews had been handed down, by tradition, from father to son, for fifteen centuries, but when Jerusalem and the Temple were destroyed, and the Hebrews were carried off to Babylon, the rabbis feared that their people, widely scattered among heathen tribes and disheartened and discouraged, would fail to keep their ancient faith, and in time all such customs and the worship of their God would be lost and forgotten. So these thoughtful and tireless rabbis began to write and compile manuscripts—essays, treatises and theses—containing in minute and amplified details all the ordinances, ceremonials, rites, laws and customs of the Hebrews. It is a monumental work. It is now translated and printed in eighteen folio volumes, containing over 4,500 pages. Only the tireless energy of a Jew, under all the baneful and doleful circumstances of a cruel captivity, would have compiled it. But in all succeeding centuries, through all trials, sufferings and torture. the Talmud has been a wall and fortress, which maintained and sustained the Jew, in all countries and all times to this day, against the merciless persecutions of the Turk and Christian. And, when I use the word Christian in this connection I mean both Roman Catholics and Protestants, for in the matter of the persecutions of the Jews neither can call the other black.

Incidentally, I may speak of that unspeakable persecution and ostracism to which the Jew has been subjected everywhere and in all times, whether in Egypt, Assyria, Persia, Turkey, Italy, Greece, Russia, Germany, France, Spain, England or the United States of America. In all these countries, without exception and irrespective of the prevailing religious creeds or doctrines, brutality and ostracism, in every shape, manner and form that the laws of the countries would permit or tolerate has been heaped upon his defenseless head. You shudder at the atrocities of the Hun in Belgium and the Turk in Armenia. The midnight Pogrom, with its cries of terror, its screams of anguish, its murder, arson and rape, is as familiar to him as are the sounds of church bells on Sunday morn to you. For twenty centuries in Europe, Asia and Africa the Jew has known, in all its revolting details, all such brutality, and, strange to relate, has survived it. And why all this ostracism and persecution?

I was born, bred and raised in the coldest, clearest and truest religion that God ever planted upon this earth. I am of the House of the Scotch Presbyterian, whose foundation was laid by John Calvin, a man who for righteousness' sake and the glory of God burned a miserable heretic at the stake. Original Sin, Free-Will, Election, Foreordination and Infant Damnation are the cornerstones of my hereditary house of worship. It is the only safe and sure institution known to God and man. All others are a little shaky or altogether false. I was taught that the "Curse of God"" rested upon the Jews at the times of the Crucifixion.

"When Pilate saw that he could prevail nothing, but rather a tumult was made, he took water, and washed his hands, before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person: See ye to it.

"Then they answered all the people and said, His blood be on us and our children".—(Matt. 27:24, 25.)

There it is, plain enough. All the people were the rabble of Jews in that mob, and the blood of Christ has been upon their heads and their children forever. One-half the Protestant preachers in Christendom would, off-hand, give that as the reason for the world-wide antipathy to and persecution of the Jews. To my mind there is a far deeper and truer reason, which I hope to unfold in this paper. Certainly all of the antipathy to the Jew did not arise out of that incident at that time, for when Joseph, who second only to Pharaoh, was entertaining his brethren in Egypt, he and his brethren and the Egyptians sat at separate tables, and the reason assigned is "because the Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews; for that is an abomination unto the Egyptians" (Gen. 43:32). This was at least seventeen centuries before the Jews, at Jerusalem, called down the blood of Christ upon them and their children. That antipathy in Egypt finally reduced the Hebrews to slavery, and followed them all the days of their development and grandeur as a nation, and after their dispersion, developed, in their helplessness, into brutality and ostracism, which has followed them to this day. The reason is to be found in the Hebrew and the Jew.

The Jew of the Christian Era is the product of three forces—his peculiar characteristics, his law—the law of his being as found in the Pentateuch and the Talmud—and the treatment accorded him by the Christian and Moslem world in which he has lived. Some of my Jewish friends do not agree with me that the Jew has any marked characteristics, but he has, and he ought to be proud of the fact as an ancestral heritage. Of course, he does not have any traits of character which are not common to all other peoples, but he has certain positive traits of character in excess of all other peoples, and he lacks certain traits of character in excess of all other peoples. No one individual has them all, but as a type—a people—he has had and has kept these characteristics persistently since he first went down to Egypt. Some are positive, some are negative, some are good, some are bad, and it is certain of these persistent traits in his character that are to my mind responsible for the wretched existence he has had among non-Jews.

In physical characteristics, as a rule, and, of course, I am now speaking of the Jew as a type, he is a brunette—dark hair, dark eyes, broad forehead, swarthy complexion, short and stocky. Sometimes very beautiful blonde types appear, but these are the exception to the general rule. He has indomitable and persistent energy, is aggressive, resourceful and successful. In adverse circumstances he will survive and prosper where every other nationality fails. When poverty pinches he denies himself everything but a bare existence. When economy dictates he husbands his resources. He always takes thought for the morrow—what he shall wear and where withal he shall be clothed. When affluence warrants he squanders his resources in lavish entertainment of himself and his friends. He has a distaste for hard or violent physical labor, hence he is not a farmer, day laborer or mechanic, but rather a merchant, tradesman, pawnbroker, banker or engaged in intellectual pursuits. In business dealings he is close, keen and exacting to an aggravating degree. The poor Jew is, by reason of his poverty and the abuse heaped upon him for centuries by Moslem and Christian, too often dishonest. The well-to-do Jew practices strict honesty and prides himself upon his integrity. You can depend upon his word of honor. In trade and business the Jew is alert, shrewd and astute. In intellectual ability in every line he has no superior. When it comes to competition in trade or intellect he asks no quarter and gives none.

In disposition he is fussy and contentious, but not quarrelsome, nor fond of fights and fisticuffs. He is law abiding, and when he commits crimes they are petty offenses. Murder, highway robbery, burglary, grand larceny, incest and rape are not in the category of his offenses. Arson is practically the only exception to the general rule, and this is not because he is bad at heart, but he sees in it an escape from threatened bankruptcy. He is fond of music, the theater, dancing and cards—especially pinochle and poker—every pastime that has motion and action. He is uniformly happy and sunny and in direst misfortune is always hopeful and not morose. In his worship he is happy and never doleful. He does not weep about his sins—no howling dervishes, no religious revivals, no mercy seat for him. He does not bend the knee or bow the head or cringe or grovel before his God. He does not fear his God as an avenger or a scourge, but when he prays, he prays standing, with head erect, eyes open and happy facial expression, as a child would approach a fond parent. He does not drink to excess, nor does he commit suicide or go insane. He is a good citizen and an affable and agreeable neighbor.

In his domestic relations he has great affection for his family, a wonderful adoration, especially, for the mother and maternal ancestors, and marked philoprogenitiveness—hence large families. Very rarely does he patronize the divorce courts. He settles his domestic difficulties, of which he has his share, in his own home and in his own way. He has an oriental love of dress and display, and a full appreciation of the power and pleasure of social position. He has wonderful fondness for sociability, confined too much to his own people, due both to his own fault and the ostracism practiced upon him. He is not as fond of the society of his Gentile neighbor as he is of his own, but when he entertains his non-Jew friend he does it with a lavish hand and most gracious hospitality. He has a marked religious instinct, with the courage of the prophet or martyr, rather than of the pioneer or soldier, although he makes a good soldier and has fought under every flag, and is always loyal to the government to which he owes allegiance. In philanthropy he is lavish to a fault, and his bounteous liberality knows no bounds when he hears the cry of distress. In the Book of Genesis, if you care to verify my views, you will find that the Egyptians complained of some of these aggressive characteristics of those far-off Jews.

By reason of these firmly rooted characteristics, and by virtue of his adherence to his God and his strict observance of the laws, customs and ceremonials of his Hebrew fathers, in both his domestic and religious life, as taught him in the Pentateuch and in the Talmud, he has preserved his identity and individuality, both as a people and as a religious sect. Through all his captivity, and through all the succeeding years of the centuries, he did not proselyte and he would not be converted. He would not embrace Christianity nor Mohammedanism. He worshiped only at the altar of his ancestors' penates. He lived to himself in the pale and the ghetto, partly because he wanted to, partly because he was compelled to, hence by Christian and Turk alike he was despised, denounced, robbed, raped and murdered. Some poet whose name I have lost or forgotten epitomizes his story in eight lines:

"Great in his history,
Grim in his tragedy,
Through the long years
He has patiently trod,
Hoping and sighing,
Aspiring and dying.
Though bloody the path
Still he trusted his God."

These three forces—his peculiar characteristics, the law of his domestic and religious life and the world around him produced the Jew of today and the Jew of the past, and in spite of the whole hostile world, in which he had been compelled to live, although comparatively few in number—possibly 12,000,000 in 1,575,000,000—man for man he occupies a position far superior to any other sect or nationality. Turn where you please—in finance, philanthropy, music, art, literature, politics, legislation, judicature, administrative statesmanship—in any of the great or small achievements of our present day civilization you will find a Jew's brains and Jew's money, and back of that brains and that money a wideawake Jew.

But I am supposed to prophesy for you the destiny of the Jew. In the light of the Holy Bible, and in the light of history, I consider it one of the safest prophesies that can be made. If you believe in the divine origin of the Old Testament—if you believe that it is the Word of God—then you must believe and accept what it says. In the XV chapter of Genesis you will find:

"After these things the word of the Lord came unto Abram, in a vision, saying, Fear not, Abram: I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward".

And again in the same text:

"And he brought him forth abroad, and said: Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them: and he said unto him, So shall thy seed be".

And again in chapter XXII:

"That in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven and as the sand which is upon the seashore".

If you be a good Presbyterian, or a member in good standing of any regularly ordained and orthodox religious sect or church, what more proof do you want for the destiny of the Jew than God's word? You must not laugh and smile and say that these texts and promises are merely couched in poetical language. Not at all. If you believe that God inspired the Holy Text, you must not accuse God of speaking in riddles or poetical expressions, for if you do, why, then may not all the balance of the Old and New Testament be riddles or poetical expressions? According to the Bible God picked out the Jews as a favored people. He made them certain wonderful promises. He played no other favorite, and made no promises to any other people among all the nations of the earth. When God's promise is fulfilled, as it must be, and we get as many Jews upon this little green earth as there are stars in the heavens or sands upon the seashore, there will be little room left other people, other sects and creeds.

But if you can free your mind from the superstititious belief of the ages, and do not believe in the divine origin of the Bible, or that its writers were inspired, or that God ever spoke to any man, or made any promises to Abram or to anyone else, but that the story of the creation and origin of man and the history of the Hebrews are but the traditions of the centuries collected by men, from time to time, then you will have to look to that law of scientific development—that law applicable to all animal creation, dumb brutes and humans—individuals and species—and likewise applicable to nations and peoples—the law, tersely paraphrased by Herbert Spencer as "The Law of the Survival of the Fittest". What does history teach us of the survival of the Jews? He saw the fall of the dynasties of the Pharaohs and the Ptolomies, the rise and fall of the Persian empire, and the rise and fall of Greece and Rome. He has lived through the Middle Ages. He discovered America. He has lived under Louis the Grand, under Ivan the Terrible, under Frederick the Great and under all the kings and queens of England. Of him it may be said, as an enthusiastic poet wrote of the Diety:

"Before mine eyes, like burning flax,
Man and his marvels pass away,
And mighty empires wane and wax,
Are founded, flourish and decay".

Today, as a people, he is stronger and greater than he was twenty-five centuries ago, when Nebuchadnezzar carried him off to the Euphrates River. Looking history squarely in the face, and laying aside all prejudices of a narrow mind, and measuring the Jew of the future by the plumb line of the past, an ordinary man may, in all sincerity, predict that if the Jew will stick to the path his fathers have trod, and not wander off into new and questionable fields and pleasures frequented by the Gentile world around him, but ever keep in mind the bridge that has carried him safely so many centuries—the Pentateuch and the Talmud—and thus preserve his identity as a people, and give him 4,000 years more, he will own the earth and the fulness thereof.

This may savor of a flourish of trumpets, but it is made in all sincerity, and while the world is debating the question of what the world may do with or for the Jew, the world had just as well ponder the question of what the Jew some day may do with or for the world. The great struggle in Europe is a contest waged between autocracy and democracy for supremacy in the world, but be the result what it may, another great cloud looms in the distant horizon. I do not mean to flaunt the "yellow peril" scare. That is only a miserable misnomer and a bugaboo employed by cheap politicians for a real crisis possibly not a hundred years hence. What I mean is that when this European war adjusts itself, and the nations resume their wonted life, there is yet to come an inevitable and irrepressible conflict between the Orient and the Occident for supremacy in the world's expansion. It is only natural that it should come. In that contest—not necessarily war—if in the meantime the Jews become a rehabilitated nation in Palestine, which seems most probable, they will constitute a no inconsiderable figure, not only as a sovereign state, but as a class and religious sect distributed among all nations. The brilliant minded Jews of two hemispheres are now wide awake to this possible and very probable crisis in the world's politics. Jewish papers and periodicals are full of pending possibilities. Jewish sears are seeing a handwriting upon the walls of European warfare, and Jews as astute as Daniel are reading the interpretation thereof. It is "Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin" again. The interpretation is almost the same—not "a deep religious awakening", as many saintly hare-brained pacifists and preachers have so awesomely and reverently proclaimed—but the interpretation is, "Western civilization, thou art a failure; Christianity, thou art weighted in the balance and art found wanting". The mind of the world, untrammeled by pietistic paralysis, practically admits the indictment. Christianity has failed, Mohammedanism always was a fraud. What force, then, in the future will sway the omnipresent religious tendency in the human mind? The Jewish prophets answer, "Israel".

In the April, 1918, issue of the B'nai B'rith News will be found a forceful address of Rabbi Edgar F. Magnin of Los Angeles. He likens Israel as a lamp lighter to the world, and in an impassioned passage says: "The lamp lighter will go his rounds once again. Faster than ever. More eager than ever. And the light which he will shed will be brighter than ever. Friends, the Jew will write new Bibles, sing new psalms, proclaim new prophecies unto the nations of the world"!

There has just come from the press a little brochure entitled "The World Significance of a Jewish State", by Dr. A. A. Berle, a non-Jew, which strikes a high key and a clear note in the distant rumble of national discord. It is wonderfully illuminating. It is startling in its prospective. This paper was read to the Kit-Kat Club, on the evening of April 4, 1918, and this book did not come to hand until a month later, but I read it twice before I laid it down.

The author boldly assumes that there is, sooner or later, in the world's conflict, a crisis looming between eastern and western civilization—between Japan, China and probably independent India against Europe and America—and he almost irresistibly forces upon you the logical sequence of coming events, and as irresistibly persuades you that in the providence of time the Jew as a state must be rehabilitated in Palestine, in order that the Jew, an Oriental by birth and tradition and an Occidental by education and training, may stand as a buffer between the East and the West. Let me quote one excerpt:

If a young Jewish enthusiast who was martyred at the age of thirty-three could set on fire the imagination of the world, and make his name the greatest name in history, and do it without an army or a navy, or any of the accessories of world power, and make by the power of words, simple words, his name the Name above every name, what may we not reasonably expect of the nation which produced that world figure, restored to the land of its dreams, fired again with its ancient traditions, putting into active life and being again its ancient laws, and giving to the world a working model of a social state free from the entanglements of the world and disgraceful game of diplomacy, and bringing idealism again into the realm of world politics, and by the force of religious devotion, high mentality and social unity enforcing it upon the world? We are seeing a little of this possibility by the action of the Russian dreamers who have upset imperialistic ideas in Europe! It is a hope and a vision to stir the dullest blood in Christendom! It is justified by the calmest survey of the brutalized world at the present minute. It is justified by the world failures of statesmanship in our present world disaster. A Jewish state would be a "Hague" which could, and which would, command the attention and govern the thought of the world.

"I will tell you something more. Time was for all these long centuries, when the Jew cringed and suffered because of the ostracism practiced upon him by non-Jew. In this country among the wealthy Jews that time has passed. You may bar him from your homes and your clubs, but little does he care. Your ostracism cannot touch him. He wants little or none of your society outside of business hours. Rarely does he care for you when the lights are lit and the dinner is served. It takes a strong personal liking for you to enter his home or his festivities. If you doubt my statement, try breaking into his family or close social circles. The time is fast coming when the Gentile world may knock long and loud at the door of the Jew, and if it does come, it will be but the poetic justice of the centuries in real life.

IS ENTITLED TO LIVE HERE

(From the Lowell Courier-Citizen.)

Thirty years ago a girl came to this country from Russia to marry Louis Fleshner, an immigrant from the same country. They settled in Springfield, and when the United States entered the war they had four sons, the oldest 23. All of them entered the army, and the eldest has distinguished himself in battle. He is the young man who, having lost an arm and an eye while carrying ammunition through shell fire, optimistically exclaimed: "I'm the luckiest Jew in the army. Any other man in my place would have been killed." We submit that the Fleshners have earned the right to live in Springfield or any other proud New England city.

GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY BY JEWISH ORPHAN ASYLUM OF DISTRICTS NOS. 2 AND 6, I. O. B. B.

The Golden Anniversary of the Jewish Orphan Asylum of Cleveland was held on January 13, 14 and 15, 1918.

On Saturday confirmation exercises were held. On Sunday morning there was an informal meeting of the Board of the Orphan Asylum and an exhibition of the work of the children. On Sunday afternoon the main feature of the celebration took place at the Hippodrome, which was attended by a very large number of members of the Order and members of the institution and their friends. His honor, Mayor Harry L. Davis was represented by Mr. L. T. Beman, Director of Public Welfare. In reading the message of the Mayor, a burst of applause followed his remark, "There is no more magnificent monument in the city of Cleveland today than the institution whose fiftieth anniversary we are celebrating." A number of out-of-town prominent guests were on the list of speakers, among them Mr. Adolf Kraus of Chicago, President of the Order; Mr. Joseph Selligman of Louisville, President of District Grand Lodge No. 2; Mr. H. D. Frankel of St. Paul, First Vice-President of District Grand Lodge No. 6; Judge Philip Stein of Chicago, President of the Orphan Asylum; Dr. Samuel Wolfenstein, for thirty-five years Superintendent of the Institution, and Geo. I. Wirple, President of the Alumni Association.

A notable feature of the afternoon program was the Service Flag presentation.

Judge Philip Stein of Chicago presided, and in his opening address included a brief history of the home and its work. The meeting opened with a prayer by Rabbi Herman Lovitsch. Patriotic songs and dances and drills by the children were also features of the exercises. The closing prayer was by Mr. Simon Peiser, Superintendent of the Home.

Mr. Joseph Selligman in his address emphasized the fact that the Institution lived because it has grown and progressed and that the B'nai B'rith Order drew inspiration from the Orphan Asylum. "Though the B'nai B'rith Shall Cease to be, we know Our Work shall Live". He stated: "The B'nai B'rith may well say of the Cleveland Orphan Asylum, 'This is our immortality' ".

Mr. Hiram D. Frankel in his remarks declared that District No. 6 will aid in making the Home an even greater, a better and a more ideal institution, and that those who aided in this enterprise would be doing their bit to aid the government.

Dr. Samuel Wolfenstein before delivering his address invoked God's blessing upon the Institution and its wards. Among other things he said:

"There is one word in the original declaration of the founders of our Asylum upon which I laid the main stress in my endeavors. It is the word, 'Home'. The orphan child placed under my care was to be provided with a home. I know that I shall be acclaimed by every man and woman who had spent their childhood years under my care, when I say that it was a home—a sweet home, in the fullest term of the word, in which they spent the happiest years of their lives.

"Standing—as I do—at the brink of the grave, I am satisfied to leave this world, having manifested and proven to those who are busying themselves with child welfare work, that it is possible to give to the orphan child the sweetness of home life with fullness of parents' love and affections within the precincts of a congregate institution. May it ever be so for years to come!

"As long as there will be orphaned children, may the Cleveland Jewish Orphan Asylum keep open its portals for their reception—offering thus a home—a sweet home".

Address of President Kraus

How wonderful is the appeal of a child to the hearts of those who are near to it in ties of blood. It is the joy and ever solicititious care of the youthful father and mother and the delight and comfort of the grandparents.

The happy voices of the children are the heavenly music of the home, and their innocent faces are home's choicest adornment. What heart is not softened at the laugh of a child? What eye does not brighten at the vision of happy children?

And for these children, mankind's richest blessings, what sacrifices are made. Only you who are parents can answer that. Only you who are parents can know of the anxious hours at the bedside of a sick child when the sharp daggers of fear pierced the heart, while the eyes keen with intensed hope of longing searched for the sign of returning health. And you parents and grandparents, how carefully you nurtured your children, from the first hour of their existence, through the period of utter helplessness; the eventful day when the first born takes his first uncertain steps alone, but safe within the circle of loving arms outstretched to shield from any misadventure; through the kindergarten, the school, the high school, the college and on through the period of young manhood and womanhood, until at last they fly from the home nest and assume their independent stations and responsibilities, which the years bring to them in their turn.

How through all these years of their childhood and youth nothing that we can do to assure and safeguard the health, morals, comfort and happiness of our children is omitted. Truly, we live for our children, and although air castles we have many times builded for them out of the rainbow tinted mists and hope and love may not have materialized, yet blessed are we who as the result of love and care and struggle and sacrifice are able to rest our dimming vision upon dutiful daughters and good sons.

But as this picture is unfolded, our minds are not here, they run back to the family hearthstone, to father, mother, children, home. There is, however, another picture which may be suggested, and that other picture is not a pleasant one, for in it we see the cruelty of the world, crushing out the laughter and the heart and the hope of little children. The artist who would paint that picture would have to leave from his canvas the sacred face of the mother; no father's rugged strength would be there depicted; no family hearthstone; no roof tree; no home. Only a barren street at night, and in it a weary child, wandering alone. And from the face of that child the laughter is gone, driven away by the same hunger and suffering that has robbed the little limbs and body of their childness fullness and made them imitate the wasted outlines of old age and death. God pity such orphan. Such orphan may well say, as is said in the book of Lamentations: "Remember, O Lord, what has come upon us". . . . "We are orphans and fatherless". . . .

Probably in all the civilized world there is not a normal man or woman whose heart is not moved to pity at the terrible plight of an orphan child, and hardly one whose hand would not be quickly outstretched to help if only he knew how. The highest evidence of true culture and broad sympathy of any people—of their deep understanding of the Fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man—is the care that people take of their orphaned children.

And I am proud to be able to say that in all the world no people have more intelligently and sympathetically recognized the obligation to their orphaned children, or more effectively met and discharged that obligation, than those of the Jewish faith.

It was the recognition of this obligation that stirred the Jewish hearts of those who founded the Order of B'nai B'rith. And again it was the binding sense of duty to discharge this obligation which caused the Order of B'nai B'rith fifty years ago today to establish the Cleveland B'nai B'rith Orphan Asylum, and we gathered to celebrate this half-century of blessed usefulness.

Within the safe haven of that Institution are five hundred orphan children today. And for fifty years they have come, largely victims of sudden disaster or poverty. Were it not for this Orphan Home they might have become the weary, wasted children of the picture, wandering alone in the barren street. The B'nai B'rith Society has, however, assumed the position of father and mother to them. The laughter is gone from their faces no more. Their happy smiles and rounded limbs give proof of youth and hope restored. For fifty years this Institution has been a never failing light in the window of darkness that surrounded the unprotected orphaned child. For fifty years they have come and have partaken its warmth and its comfort, its teaching and its training, and from it they have gone forth into the world, useful, upright men and women, blessing this Institution and the generous hearts that have made possible its maintenance.

Sometimes I think that when the last great journey is ended, and when we are face to face with the final record of our deeds, if on the credit side opposite a whole page of our lesser misdeeds there be written only that "he helped to take care of the orphan", the Recording Angel, gazing at this, will bid us enter, while lost in kindly contemplation of God's wish fulfilled.

Jewish Widows' and Orphans' Home, New Orleans, La.

By Myron M. Goldman, Secretary District Grand Lodge, No. 7, I. O. B. B.

From 1844 to 1855 the dispensing of Jewish charity in the city of New Orleans was taken care of by the Hebrew Benevolent Society, organized in 1844, and the Ladies' Hebrew Benevolent Association, organized in 1874. Their work consisted mainly in taking care of the fatherless and motherless, relieving the distressed and looking after the widow.

The fatal epidemics of yellow fever in the year 1847, and more especially in the year 1853, carried such desolation in their wake that a rapid increase of widows and orphans occurred. It was for this reason that a call was made upon the Jewish community of New Orleans in the year 1854, which community then numbered 2,000 souls, for a mass meeting, for the particular purpose of forming an association to create an institution specifically for taking care of the widow and the rearing of full and half orphan children.

On the first day of March, 1855, the Association for the Relief of Jewish Widows and Orphans was incorporated, with seventeen charter members, who elected M. M. Simpson as President, and Joseph Cohn as Secretary. During that year thirty-five new members were enrolled on the constitution of the association was adopted, in which will be found two sections which plainly state the purpose of the association, viz:

(1) "The object of the corporation shall be to establish a home, or asylum, to receive under its care and support indigent Hebrew widows; also to receive, foster, provide for, maintain and instruct Jewish orphans and half-orphans of both sexes".

(2) "This home is not to be confined or limited to the benefit of the population of the city of New Orleans".

On the 8th day of May, 1855, six lots of ground were purchased at the corner of Jackson Ave. and Chippewa St., and on the first day of February, 1856, the Home was opened for the admission of widows and orphans, and there were received within its portals one widow and her five children and seven other full orphans; thus the first Jewish Orphans' Home in the United States became a reality.

On the 7th day of February, 1859, which was the fourth anniversary of the Home, the President reported a membership of 249, and, in this regard, commented as follows: "The membership roll may be regarded as the life spring from whence our permanent prosperity is to flow. Every additional member is a friend, far beyond his mere annual tribute. Resting as our charity does for sustenance solely upon the bosom of our own people, the sentiment that fosters it is deepened and widened as the circle of our association is expanded".

At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the association, held on Jan. 3, 1875, a memorial was received from District Grand Lodge No. 7 requesting the appointment of a committee from the directors of the association to meet a similar committee from District Grand Lodge No. 7, with a view of bringing about a connection between the Grand Lodge and the Home, to the end of furthering the welfare of the widow and orphan. The fact that the number of inmates admitted into the Home from the country so far exceeded the admissions from the city created the feeling that it would be a mere act of justice on the part of the Grand Lodge to bring its aid, in conjunction with its other activities, to this association. Accordingly a committee was appointed by the Board to meet a similar committee from the Grand Lodge.

At the convention of District Grand Lodge No. 7, in April, 1876, an agreement was reached whereby District Grand Lodge No. 7 became a factor in the New Orleans Widows' and Orphans' Home.

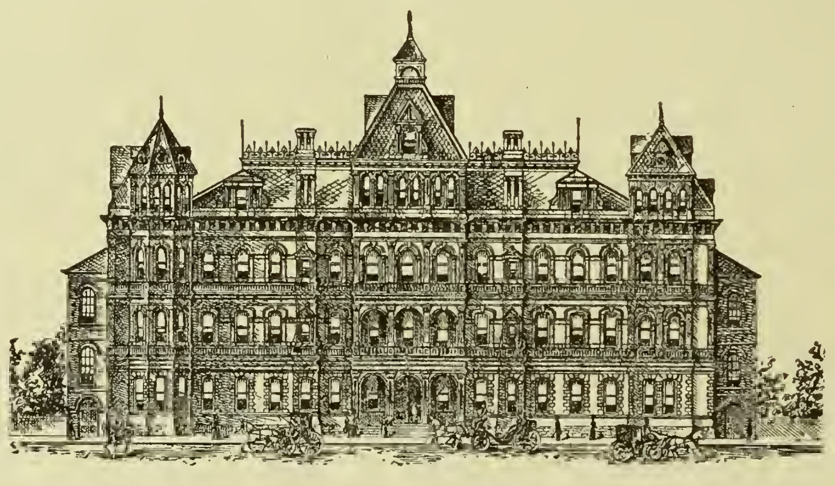
At the convention of the District Grand Lodge in 1878 one of the representatives elected to the New Orleans Home was our late lamented Brother Gabe Kahn, who in later years became the President of the association and served in that capacity for over twenty years. It is also to be noted that at the convention of the District Grand Lodge, held in 1879, our lamented brother, Nat Strauss, was elected a representative to this association. In the year 1890 he became the Secretary of District Grand Lodge No. 7, and was again elected as representative to that institution, and remained as such during his tenure of office, which was from 1890 to 1916.

The charter of the association having expired by limitation during this year, it was necessary to record a new charter, and the article referring to the object of the association was changed to read as follows:

The object of this corporation shall be to establish a home, or asylum, to receive, under its care, foster, provide for, maintain and instruct Jewish orphans and half-orphans of both sexes, and provide for the relief of Jewish widows".

This change in the object of the corporation was brought about because it became apparent that it was impractical to house under one roof aged widows and young children. The directorate of the Home learned that it was impossible to develop the various activities necessary for the welfare of the children, and at the same time maintain a haven of rest and peace for the declining days of the widows under their roof. Subsequently an arrangement was entered into with the Touro Infirmary and Hebrew Benovelent Society, which institution receiced from our late Brother Julius Weis a munificent sum for the erection of an old Folks' Home, to receive the widows then housed at the Orphans' Home, which latter institution agreed to pay the former a monthly stipend for their maintenance.

As time passed the Board realized that the Home at Jackson Ave. and Chippewa St. could no longer be used for the purpose intended for it and, through the efforts of our late brothers, Rabbis James K. Gutheim and I. L. Leucht, and others throughout the District, ground was purchased at the corner of St. Charles and Peters Aves. for the erection of a new Home. The cornerstone of this Home was laid on Thanksgiving Day, Nov. 25, 1886. On this occasion our late brother and Past President of the Order, the lamented Leo N. Levi, who then lived at Galveston, Tex., was the orator of the day. "The reputation that had preceded him was fully justified, for the address which he delivered was masterful, prophetic and clothed in magnificent language. It had a beautiful effect upon his hearers and left an impression upon their hearts and minds to remain as a lasting memory". May I here quote from an article written some years afterwards, in connection with the laying of this cornerstone. "Alas! that Leo N. Levi should have died so young, for in January, 1904, his eyes were closed in death, but his memory will live forever as that of the greatest American Jew. The work accomplished by him will be an inspiration for his successors to labor in the same fertile field of human endeavor and to carry out the plans he had conceived for the benefit of his people, which death prevented him from executing. Our great leader has fallen, but his light will shine forever". After Brother Levi had concluded his oration Brother Rabbi I. L. Leucht, the Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements, delivered a short address, after which he turned to the Grand Master of the Order of Masons and said: "I beg of you and your noble band of men to consecrate the cornerstone of our new Home to the God of all mankind. You belong to an Order teaching that every man may become a Master Mason, worthy to help in building that grand temple of humanity, wherein resounds from pole to pole the unity of Jehovah. No walls are erected dividing the hearts of men where unity, love and charity sing Hosanna in unbroken harmony. Pour out your wine and oil on this cornerstone! Let the future home to be reared upon it be called 'Bethel'. and join us in the prayer of our patriarch, Jacob, 'And this stone which I have set for a pillar shall be God's House, and all which thou doth give me I will surely give a tenth part to thee. May such be His holy will. Amen'".



In the year 1902 it became apparent to the Board of Directors of the Home that the time had arrived for the improvement of the secular education of the wards entrusted to them, and accordingly invited Dr. Bamberger of Chicago, Ill., to prepare plans for a Manual Training School.

At a meeting of the Board, held May 4, 1902, the report of Dr. Bamberger was received and the following resolutions were introduced:

"Resolved, That this Association establish a Manual Training School for the education and training of the children of the Home.

"Resolved, further, That the conditions on which this School is to be established are:

"First. It shall be conducted in a building separate and distinct from the Home building.

"Second. Pupils from outside of the Home shall be admitted without discrimination because of creed.

"Third. The number of outside pupils, and the rules governing their admission, shall be fixed from time to time by the Board of Directors, but the number which may be admitted shall be limited only by the capacity of the school after our own wards are provided for".

It was at this meeting that our late brother, Isadore Newman, offered to the Board all the money necessary to erect a building for a Manual Training School, which offer was accepted, and thus the Manual Training School became a part of our Home.

Up to the year 1906, District Grand Lodge No. 7 maintained an arrangement on a per capita basis with the Cleveland Orphan Asylum as well as the Home at New Orleans. In that year the District Grand Lodge memorialized the Cleveland Orphan Asylum for permission to withdraw its support from that institution, so that it could give its entire strength to the Home at New Orleans. In this the Cleveland Orphan Asylum acquiesced, and by mutual agreement the arrangement in force with that institution was terminated on Dec. 31, 1907.

A fund was also created by our late Brother Simon Gumbel, known as "The Simon Gumbel Dower Fund". The interest on this fund is used for the purpose of presenting to each female ex-inmate of the Home a trousseau when she enters the matrimonial state.

Likewise was a fund created by our late Brother Henry Newman, the interest of which is used for giving those wards who show special aptitude in the arts and sciences higher education in those fields.

To the sacred task of caring for the orphan and dependent Jewish child, the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith has always devoted its best energies and strength and given its full measure of moral and material support.

District Grand Lodge No. 7 points with pardonable pride to the Jewish Orphans' Home at New Orleans as a tangible proof of its part in the constructive and social program mapped out by the Order.

The modern Orphan Home is built on the theory that a real home must be provided for the parentless child. It must provide a normal, natural, happy and healthy life for the child. It must give him religious, moral, mental and physical development, and a training which should help him to be self-supporting. It must also make of the orphan a stanch, loyal, God-fearing Jew and an honest, truthful, patriotic citizen.

With these ideals constantly before the Board, a self-government plan was adopted, together with the honor system. This plan serves a vital purpose, for it develops in the child a strength of character which must lead to honest, dependable and trustworthy manhood and womanhood.

The self-government plan lends to the life in the Home a certain spiritual, moral and home-like atmosphere. It brings the child in close contact with those whose duty it is to guide, and it gives him, together with the liberties and freedom of the normal home, also the sense of filial responsibilities.

Through this system the wards of our Home meet you with uplifted face and with bright, honest eyes, for every child is made to feel that he is a social influence in his little community within the walls of the Home.

Religious classes are conducted and modern methods and materials are used Hebrew is stressed, so that each child, before being confirmed, can translate grammatically the responses in the Union Prayer Book. The children participate in the Sabbath services, the boys pronounce the "Berochoth" before and after reading from the Torah, and the girls read the "Haphtorah", and all the children recite the Hebrew responses and "Kaddish". All the holidays are fittingly observed. The children build their own "Succah" and take their meals in it. They prepare for "Pesach" and participate in the "Seder" services. On "Chanukah" and "Purim" plays are performed, and the "Yomin Noroim" are made truly holy days. "Kiddush" services are held in the dining room and the blessing pronounced in Hebrew by the children before and after meals. Thus the life of the child is spent in a truly Jewish environment.

Club activity is a big factor in this institution. Membership in the various clubs is predicated upon high standards of mental and moral ideals. Supervised athletics, outings, boy scout activities, dancing, moving pictures are forms of recreation afforded. Besides this, the Home has for a Boys' Brass Band and a Girls' Orchestra.

The health of the children is safeguarded through physical examinations by specialists and a daily clinic held by a graduate nurse. Frequent examinations are made of the teeth of the children by a graduate dentist and regulated diets prepared by a graduate dietician.

When a child leaves the Home the Committee on Big Brothers and Sisters appoint a big brother or sister in the community to which the child is discharged to advise and take a personal interest in that child up to the attainment of its majority, and, if possible, after.

In the attainment of the purposes and ideals implied in the development of the Home, our late Brother Michel Heyman, as Superintendent, played a considerable part, for which he was a pioneer in that social science out of which has grown the modern conduct of institutional life in child caring, and he gave to the Home the best of himself and of his knowledge.

Seven years ago the present Superintendent, Brother Leon Volmer, entered upon his duties, and as an evidence of his zeal in keeping the Home true to its highest standards, I quote from a letter writted to him by W. H. Slingerland, Esq., who made a tour of the country for the Russell Sage Foundation, for survey purposes in respect to child caring:

"RUSSELL SAGE FOUNDATION"
Department of Child-Helping 130 E. 22d St.
New York City
New Orleans, April 1, 1916.

Superintendent Volmer,
Jewish Widows' and Orphans' Home.
New Orleans, La.

My Dear Mr. Volmer:

My visits to your Home on recent dates were very pleasant and profitable. It is gratifying to find an executive and his assistants so earnestly desirous of utilizing every worthy modern method in the care of the children assigned to the institution. The cleanliness, sanitation, careful organization and evidently homelike spirit speak for themselves to every intelligent visitor. As you know, I advocate as the best institutional provision for dependent children the cottage type of housing, because in many ways normal home life can be more closely approximated. But seldom have I seen a large congregate plant used to better advantage in all matters relating to personal influence, and your Big Brother and Big Sister grouping and care obviate in large degree the difficulties of the large building, especially in respect to the dining room and the dormitories. I want you to know that I greatly appreciate the work you are doing for the children under your supervision.

Very truly yours,
(Signed) W. H. SLINGERLAND.

Through the efforts of the committee of the Isidore Newman Manual Training School, the curriculum has been constantly improved, and this, together with the exceptional faculty, has placed the Training School in the front rank of schools of that character.

HEBREW ORPHANS' HOME, ATLANTA, GA.

By Simon Wolf

From time immemorial, the caring for and of children, orphaned either by death or otherwise, has been the inspiration of all truly philanthropic men and women; for in the proper rearing and educating of these orphans lies the future man and woman; the citizen who is expected to aid and contribute towards the development and progress of the general community.

The civilization of a nation is tested by the love and kindness bestowed upon the unfortunate and stricken, and thus no country has contributed more to the uplift and betterment than this great republic. It was in this spirit that the foundation was laid, by creating the Orphan Asylum Fund of District Grand Lodge No. 5, I. O. B. B., which had its inception in the city of Atlanta in 1875; and out of this foundation there grew into stately proportions the splendid home which was dedicated twenty-nine years ago and which has reared hundreds of children who have become important factors and links in the communal chain of opportunity and citizenship.

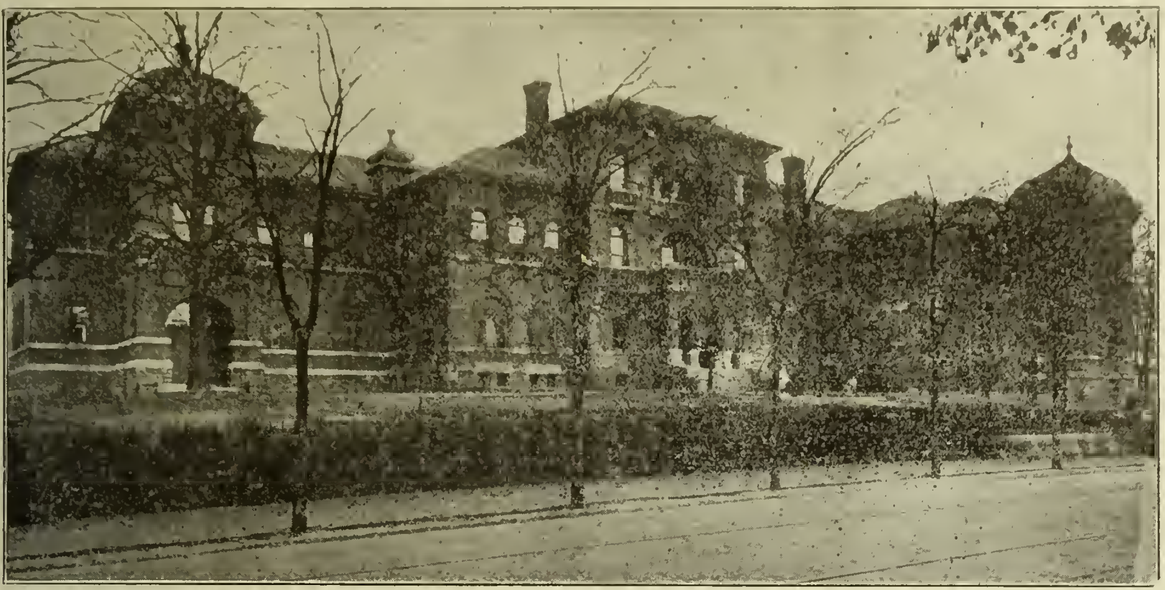
The Board of Directors and all friends of the Home can point with pride to its history and achievement. It stands foremost among the institutions founded for the purpose of standing in the light of parents for those who have been orphaned, and while no doubt other institutions all over the country have done well, and can point with pride to what they have accomplished, yet I venture to say that none of them equal our Home, which stands as a model, and in every sense not an asylum but a home. At the dedication twenty-nine years ago I made use of the following words, which I with great pleasure incorporate, now that they have been verified and proved prophetic in every sense of the word:

"We have one sublime mission within our view, and that is to make the children happy, to make them men and women worthy of our great country, so that they in turn become happy benefactors, so that they in turn will do their duty to those still more unfortunate.

"I regret that the gift of eloquence has not been given to me as to the great governor of your state, or to your illustrious citizen, Henry Grady. Had I the power that these men possess, I would conjure up from the vast deep of eloquence as would keep ages ablaze with admiration and cause man to make his lot nothing but purposes, aims, intentions and willingness to do his duty. But if that power that I have so vaguely described were given me I could take you up to that Orphan Home on that elevated plain and show you, issuing thence and returning there, orphan children trooping their way from high schools and homes to that asylum of comfort and ease, their faces radiant, smiling and serene, contented with the knowledge that there are good men and women throughout the world who are, caring for the unfortunate. I can see the opulent and the lowly, the rich and the poor, winding their way to that Home blessing God".

Nothing has given me more happiness and gratification than the knowledge that our children have been reared and educated along lines of home life, not by rule or rote, but by the heart beats of a man and his wife who have honored us by conducting the welfare and prosperity of our institution. I know that many good men and women believe that any home is preferable to an institution. I wish I could share those sentiments. The majority of our children come from what is called the lower classes, where the environments are not of an ideal character, where sanitary conditions are not satisfactory; where the stress and strain of living is intense, and where the educational advantages are practically nil. Therefore I have always maintained that the Home, such as ours, affords such advantages far superior; that it brings children of different nationalities into closer touch; it broadens them in every direction, and is an object lesson to the indifferent, to the heartless and selfish, and the constant inspiration for the advancement of those who have been stranded on the highway of life, and whose ambitions, instead of being dulled and deadened, are invigorated by the opportunity afforded them by the protection and care of their best friends.

Every man and woman of District No. 5 can justly be proud of what has been accomplished, and is the fitting stone in the Temple of the Order of B'nai B'rith. It illustrates all that the order has ever advanced as one of the reasons for its existence, and should win the heartiest sympathy and co-operation for the continuance of the Home for all time to come. May the Home of our loved and arduous work continue on the lines for which it was founded, and may we ,at all time, be blessed in having a superintendent and matron that will reflect the highest character of manhood and womanhood, and may our children, as they are dispersed in various centers of activity throughout the country, prove examples to one and all. To me who has, for all the years that have elapsed since 1875, taken deep and ardent interest in the welfare of this Home, there is no greater encomium confirmed than the knowledge that, in an humble way, I have been the instrument of founding, aiding and assisting in the welfare and prosperity of this Home, and years after, when I shall have passed to the Great Majority, I ask no greater recognition than an epitaph on my tomb: "Here Lies the Founder of the Orphans' Home of Atlanta".



RACE PREJUDICE IN TIME OF WAR

A theatrical man, in writing of the patriotic activities of stage folk, quotes a member of the Washington Red Cross committee that was planning a war benefit as saying:

I must confess that I have never heard of any of them (the artists on the bill), except George M. Cohan, and while I have a natural aversion to Jews, I rather hope that he can be prevailed upon to sing "Over There".

Waiving aside the question whether George M. Cohan is a Jew—which he does not happen to be—the query arises:

What right has a person who has a "natural aversion to Jews" to belong to the Red Cross—the great agency which is focusing the activities of all our citizens alike to a great beneficent national end, the winning of the war?

And if this man—a member of the Red Cross—is afflicted with a "natural aversion to Jews", what right has he to give expression to his aversion?

This is a time for unity of effort, of endeavor, of devotion—not for "natural aversions" of any kind. "Natural aversions" should be directed solely against the enemy, not against fellow citizens who are doing their level best to defeat the enemy.—New York Evening Mail.

The ornamentations of wisdom are meekness and modesty.

THE FOURTH LIBERTY LOAN.

The campaign for the Fourth Liberty Loan will begin September 28 and close October 19. The result of the loan will be watched with interest in Europe, not only by our associates in the war against the Teutonic powers, but by our enemies. It will be regarded by them as a measure of the American people's support of the war.

The Germans know full well the tremendous weight and significance of popular support of the war, of the people at home backing up the army in the field. As the loan succeeds our enemies will sorrow; as it falls short they will rejoice. Every dollar subscribed will help and encourage the American soldiers and hurt and depress the enemies of America.

The loan will be a test of the loyalty and willingness of the people of the United States to make sacrifices compared with the willingness of our soldiers to do their part. There must be and will be no failure by the people to measure up to the courage and devotion of our men in Europe. Many of them have given their lives; shall we at home withhold our money? Shall we spare our dollars while they spare not their very lives?

Beware lest your wisdom be consumed in the fire of anger.

FRANCE TO DEFEND JEWISH RIGHTS

Foreign Minister Pichon States that Republic Will Not Tolerate Jewish Opression in Roumania

The Zionist Organization of America is in receipt of official information to the effect that M. Pichon, the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, has sent a letter to the Central Committee of the Alliance Israelite Universelle assuring them that the republic desires the emancipation of the Jews in eastern Europe, and is disposed to do everything in its power to bring about a just settlement of the Jewish question in those countries. M. Pichon adds that, regarding Roumania, the French government is convinced that under German pressure the restricted emancipation promised to the Jews is not in accord with the declaration of M. Take Jonescu and M. Bratiano, in June, 1917, and he has promised that at the opportune moment the French government "will take steps to ensure that the very wide views of these great Roumanian statesmen shall prevail". The declaration by M. Pichon being the policy of the French government regarding this question are in line with that of the British government, as expressed by Mr. Balfour in his letter to Mr Sokolow, representing the Zionist Organization.

Mount Sinai was chosen as the place of the reception of the Decalogue not because it might be the highest mount in the vicinity, but rather because it is one of the lowest, to teach us the virtue of humility.

JEWISH WELFARE BOARD, U. S. ARMY AND NAVY

Every American soldier or sailor of Jewish faith who arrives in London will find a welcome at the headquarters of the Jewish International Hospitality League. This organization is conducted by a committee of prominent Jews of the United Kingdom, headed by Louis Jacobs of London, who have pledged their co-operation to the Jewish Welfare Board, United States Army and Navy, the Jewish branch of the International Y. M. C. A. Hospitality League and other Canadian, Australian and continental welfare agencies.

The Jewish Welfare Board has welcomed the efforts of the new co-operative agency. In a letter to Mr. Jacobs Chester J. Teller, Executive Director of the Jewish Welfare Board, defined the relationship between the two organizations as follows:

"As the aims of our government in this war are one, so is the purpose of this organization engaged in welfare service likewise single, and we have no diffidence in regarding the hospitality and information bureau of our London friends as one of the facilities of the Jewish Welfare Board through which its welfare activities will be given greater effectiveness".

Centrally located in London, near the Y. M. C. A., Eagle Hut on the Strand the Hospitality building will serve as a center of information and assistance for all Jewish troops in the British Isles. especially visiting Americans, Canadians, New Zealanders, Australians and South Africans. It will act as a clearing house for existing Jewish Welfare agencies and help the soldiers to get in touch with them. American soldiers will learn where they can meet Jewish Chaplains abroad and how they can come in contact with Jewish Welfare Board workers overseas.

The house, which was formerly occupied by the Y. M. C. A., contains rest. reading and writing rooms The hospitality provided for soldiers is, however, one of its lesser functions. Its greater aim is to deal with every aspect of Jewish soldier life in Great Britain—in all army camps, hospitals and large cities. Its work will in general be parallel to that done by the Jewish Welfare Board among soldiers and sailors in the United States.

A central information bureau will also be set up in London near a gateway by which a large number of soldiers come into the city—to direct the men to the Hospitality House, to furnish them with desired information regarding the city and to assist them in their personal difficulties. Efforts will be made to arrange for entertainment of visiting soldiers and sailors in Jewish homes when on furlough and during the High Holidays. and to provide comforts for the Jewish men in hospitals.

The Hospitality League is unofficial and is officered and supported by a group of volunteers from among the most prominent persons in Anglo-Jewish life.

Many New Branches Organized

The Jews of America are responding to the call of their fellow Jews in the service of the government. Hardly a day passes in which some Jewish community does not awake to its responsibility and forms a branch of the Jewish Welfare Board.

Among the more important branches that have been organized in the last ten days and their officers are the following:

Auburn and Lewiston, Me.—B. S. Berman, Chairman; M. Tabachnik, Secretary.

Situation of the Jews in Roumania

Statement by the Prime Minister Marghiloman

By our Special Correspondent

Zurich, July 28, 1918.

I beg to forward you three documents I received several days ago from the Central Committee of Roumanian Native-born Jews.

The first is a resume of the statements made by Mr. Marghiloman to a deputation of the Union, the second the translation of an article which appeared in "Jassy", the official organ of the present government, and the third an extract from a letter sent me a few days ago by the committee.

Before referring to the contents of the "Jassy" article and the letter from the Central Committee of the Union I feel compelled to pass a few remarks on Mr. Marghiloman's statements.

Taken as a whole, the prime minister's statements make a comparatively favorable impression. When, however, examined in detail they give rise to misgivings.

Mr. Marghiloman stated that applications for naturalization will be laid before the administrative courts of the various towns, together with the necessary documents. The administrative courts will then decide on each case. If they reject the application, the applicant has the right of appeal to a higher court. The personal testimony of witnesses is also permitted; this can be regarded as a great concession.

But Mr. Marghiloman did not say what would happen if the administrative courts, three-quarters of the members of which will certainly be composed of anti-semites, reject large numbers of applications and the appeal courts uphold the rejections. He admitted himself that the hatred of Jews is universal in Moldavia, where the greatest part of the Jewish population resides. Moreover, he did not say how long the investigation of the documentary evidence would take. (Very many thousands of applications will have to be examined.) If no time limit is fixed the administrative officials will be able to resort to obstructionist tactics and drag out the granting of rights indefinitely. Let it be granted that Marghiloman is as favorably disposed as he possibly can be, it will nevertheless not be in his power to direct the official machinery as he would wish unless he arranges for the law itself to contain severe penalties to insure a prompt and conscientious carrying out of its prescriptions. Moreover, I note that Marghiloman has made no concession to the Union's demand that Jews should not be required to produce proof that their parents were native-born. Therefore his assertion that nine-tenths of the Jews will be naturalized is valueless, as everything depends on the way the law is applied, and its application is largely dependent on the wording of its text.

But Marghiloman has made no precise statement as to the wording of the text of the law. On the contrary, his remarks about "the Jews expelled from Podolia and Galicia", to whom equal rights cannot be given, and about the Moldavian Jews, etc., show that, like other Roumanians, he still cherishes many prejudices against us even although he has been enlightened on the question. I do not need to say that the whole story of uneducated and unenlightened Galician Jews is an absolute fiction. Besides, how can it be decided who is a Galician or Podolian Jew or the child of Galician Jews? If applicants cannot lay before the administrative courts sufficient documentary evidence or the testimony of the witnesses summoned is declared to be insufficient proof, their applications will be rejected on the ground that these applicants are Galician or Podolian Jews who have only recently settled in the country. Matters would be very different if the law prescribed that the testimony of witnesses is binding on the courts. In such case the courts would be unable to deliberately exclude many thousands of Jews from citizen rights. Marghiloman said nothing on this point, and I therefore have doubts whether nine-tenths will be naturalized and only the Galician and Podolian Jews excluded.

Marghiloman notices a great difference between the Jewish element in Moldavia and here (i. e., in Wallachia). Yes; because equal rights must be granted, and the greater number of the Jews live in Moldavia. Therefore, in the opinion of the Roumanian anti-semite, the Moldavian Jews compare unfavorably with the Wallachian In Wallachia there are fewer Jews than in Moldavia. Therefore the former are commended.

Marghiloman recognizes that our Union represents the majority of Jews resident in the country. This is quite correct. The Union of Roumanian native-born Jews represents almost the entirety of the Roumanian-Jewish population. This fact has, however, not induced Marghiloman to invite the Union to co-operate with him in the task of working out the details of the Emancipation Bill. I have reason to believe that the request made by the Union to him on this point was rejected.

A proof of the difficulties which have to be combatted when it is necessary to repress the anti-semitic excesses of subordinate officials is Mr. Marghiloman's admission in respect of Colonel Moruzzi's doings in Bessarabia. I beg you to carefully reread the passages referring to this. Marghiloman ordered investigations, which were deliberately frustrated. In order to be able to force an honest examination of the case he had to go to the length of specially nominating a general to take charge of it. But if the general in question holds anti-semitic sympathies (it would very much surprise me if there is a single general who does not hold such sympathies) the results of his investigation will not differ very much from those of all previous ones. Colonel Moruzzi is well known as an anti-semitic agitator.

The fact that the request made by the Jewish directorate of Botoshani became known (Marghiloman must probably have meant the Jewish community) shows that the waves of antisemitic agitation are already running high. As soon as I receive the necessary details of the case I will forward them to you.

As regards the visit of members of the Union to Moldavia, the matter has not yet been arranged. Communications with Moldavia are still very difficult. Our Union has not yet been able to publish its paper.

However, all the above comments are no longer up to date, as the Roumanian government seems desirous of commencing quite new and unexpected tactics. To judge by the article in 'Jassy" and the information imported by the Central Committee of the Union, Marghiloman, in spite of the statements he made to the deputation of the Union, intends to let the members of the new Parliament settle the Jewish question. These latter will only meet together in late autumn.

The reason alleged for this is consideration for the statutes of the Constitution. Article 28 of the peace treaty lays down regulations for the solution of the Alien Question in Roumania. Unfortunately, therefore, this article stamps the native-born Jews of Roumania as aliens. The men who drew up this treaty have done us an extremely bad turn in assimilating the Roumanian anti-semitic theories and practices. Members of the Roumanian Jewish population who are not subjects of any foreign state are certainly not aliens, as the Roumanians maliciously assert. However, Article 28 declares us to be aliens. And so now 'Jassy", i. e., the Roumanian government, suddenly discovers that for the present Parliament to settle the Alien Question, i. e., the Jewish question, would be unconstitutional. The Alien (Jewish) Question, so says "Jassy", can only be settled by altering Article 7 of the Constitution, as the aforesaid Article 7 defines the status of foreigners in Roumania. But in order to be able to get an Article of the Constitution altered means must be employed which are provided for in the Constitution. The method of procedure is as follows: The Parliament sitting must assent to the proposed alteration of the Constitution and must declare expressly which articles of the Constitution it is proposed to alter. After a vote has been passed, Parliament is immediately dissolved and new elections are proceeded with. The Constitutional Chamber (which we call the Constituents), summoned together by an election of this kind, may not discuss or alter any other articles of the Constitution than those which the recently dissolved Parliament has proposed to alter. Therefore any law bearing on this question passed by the present Parliament will have to be regarded as null and void, and will be without any practical value. In order to bring Article 28 of the treaty into harmony with the Roumanian Constitution, the official organ goes on to say, the whole Jewish question must be put into the hands of the future Constituents. In other words, the present Parliament will first have to decide that Article 7 must be altered, and then the Constituents, who will meet in late autumn after the new election, which will have taken place in the meantime, will have to take over our question. The Central Committee of the Union rightly asks, "Who will guarantee us that these Constituents, who will have to grapple with enormous problems, will not have one or two years' work before them". And in such a case it may certainly be expected that the Jewish question will be the last one of all to come up, so that these gentlemen may gain their way and have it emerge in a thoroughly mutilated state.

Let it be remarked that these constitutional scruples of the Roumanian government have made their appearance quite suddenly just at the very moment when the Emancipation Bill was at last having to be laid before the house. I can quite understand the alarm of my committee and their suspicions about Mr. Marghiloman's intentions. I beg you to go into the matter thoroughly. The present Roumanian government is the same one which negotiated about the peace treaty and made the proposals which led to the incorporation of Article 28. Moreover, the government knew also that the law which was to be passed in consequence of Article 28 was one which could not be voted upon by an ordinary Parliament, as Article 28 speaks of aliens, and the Alien Question can only be settled by an alteration of Article 7 of the Constitution. Why did they help on the wording of Article 28 in this fashion; why did they keep silence all the time about the facts that were known to them, and then suddenly, after the peace treaty had been voted upon, discover that the present Parliament is not competent to deal with this question? The peace treaty lays down that this law must be passed before the treaty is ratified. The Roumanian Houses have already ratified the treaty, and yet have not voted the law provided for in Article 28. Perhaps Article 28 may be interpreted in the sense that the law must come into force before the treaty is ratified by all contracting parties instead of by the Roumanian Parliament only. It remains a fact that the Roumanian government have raised objections of a constitutional nature just at the very moment when they ought to have come forward with their law. Thus it is clear that they have the intention to once more postpone our question and leave the manner and method of its solution to the Constituents.

Now it may be questioned whether the Roumanian government really purposes to violate the treaty outright and leave the requirements of Article 28 unfulfilled. It appears to me impossible that they would do so. In spite of the bad news I have received I therefore believe the Roumanian government will yet bring forward a law. We were of the opinion that a peace treaty simply overrides all internal laws of a country that go against its enactments—even if they are of a constitutional nature and that what it decrees is valid on all points. We were also well aware that the Roumanian Constitution has this Article 7. We did not, however, give consideration to the matter, we did not thresh it out in hair-splitting juristic debates for the very reason that we, as aforesaid, thought that the enactments of a treaty would have full force of law. Now, however, the Roumanian government, ignoring all their former statements and the attitude they are known to have taken up, raise the question of the Constitution. They assert that Article 28 cannot be valid before it has been voted upon by the Roumanian Constituents, and Article 7 has been altered accordingly. This is what Mr. Marghiloman is saying today, and yet on June 3 he stated to the union of native-born Jews that as a result of the law which would be passed the Jews would be able to vote in the forthcoming elections for the Constituents.

The question now is, What is going to happen? Will the government grant the Jews the rights which Article 28 entitles them to by force of an edict and not a law, as is expressly required by Article 28? A decree will, however, have even less validity than a law. How can the government be thinking of settling the matter by means of an edict at the very moment when they are declaring that even a law would be "without any practical value" because it would violate the Constitution. And such an edict would only be issued by a ministerial councill

If the government had had the courage to adopt a new policy towards the Jewish question by declaring that native-born Jews are not aliens the present Parliament could then have settled the question without any difficulty whatsoever. The government need only have called to mind Article 44 of the Treaty of Berlin and the formal public promises made by Roumania to the Great Powers in a series of diplomatic notes during the years between 1879 and 1889, and they could have effected a simple solution of the question. During those years Roumania solemnly promised not to regard the native-born Jews as aliens but to consider them as genuine native-born inhabitants, which they have always been from ancient times, and which they were legally recognized as by the Parish Act of 1864. As aforesaid, the native-born Jews are, in fact, not aliens, consequently they do not come under the heading of Article 7, and therefore the Jewish question could have been allowed to have been settled by an ordinary Parliament. That would have been a policy that would have been historically correct, and honorable and courageous as well. However, the Roumanian government go their old ways in the matter of our question. They continue to consider us as aliens and consequently place Article 7 (and now also Article 28) as a stumbling block in our path.

We are now in a blind alley. The fact that the Roumanian government themselves have raised constitutional objections will result in the entirety of public opinion adopting this standpoint and pronouncing null and void the law or edict which will be voted or simply published by the decision of a Ministerial Council. As aforesaid, I hope that, in spite of the "Jassy" article, the government will not dare to directly violate the treaty and refuse to bring in the law. It is, however, a question whether that will be of any use, i. e., whether those Jews who are declared to be citizens as a result of the law passed in consequence of Article 28 will be permitted to vote for the Constituents, as it has already been stated that such a law would be "without any practical value". We have even more right to ask ourselves this question should an edict take the place of a law.

Our enemies in the country will joyfully take refuge in the Constitutional problem, and will assert that any law passed or edict issued must be without validity because we as aliens have been given citizen rights as a consequence of Article 28 but without any alteration of Article 7.

According to the Roumanian Constitution we should still remain aliens. But if the settlement of the question is put on to the new Constituents, we are exposed to the danger of having to face an uncertain future; we know then that the question will remain unsolved for an indeterminate period, and we shall be compelled to undergo a series of fierce new struggles. We shall be once more in the midst of real chaos. We have always said that the Jewish question in Roumania is technically one of the most complicated and difficult to solve. Added to this is the fact that the governing classes of Roumania are the bitterest and most obstinate anti-semites that have ever existed. As I remarked in my "Memorandum on the Modality of Solving the Jewish Question in Roumania", this class has learned nothing from the events which have happened. Its members are blind to all that is now taking place. They cannot understand that it is in the interests of their ravaged country that the Jews should be granted equal rights and should have them quickly. They do not realize that they ought not to try to deprive them of their citizen rights under the excuse that some of them are of Galician or Podolian origin, that they ought not to suddenly raise objections of a constitutional nature and make use of all sorts of petty methods to fight against this reform, which has to come in the end.

I do not know what steps the Roumanian government will finally and definitely decide upon, whether they will have a law voted upon or issue an edict. whether they will then apply the same or not, or whether they will throw the whole question onto the Constituents and the time at their disposal. But whatever they may do, one thing is now certain, that the Constituents will have to deal with our question because Article 7 is going to be altered. Therefore in any case the Roumanian Jewish question will once more be placed upon the order of the day.

This means that we shall be compelled to undergo some very long struggles; in fact, we shall have to go on fighting until the moment when it pleases the Roumanian authorities to submit the question to the Constituents. Naturally it depends upon the energy we must continue to show in the struggle whether the Roumanian government will submit the question of the alteration of Article 7, i. e., the Jewish problem, to the Constituents immediately after they have met or later, in a year or two perhaps after the agrarian, electoral, press and other questions have been settled I do not need to emphasize the fact that the final form of the Emancipation Act will have to be decided by the Constituents. Therefore it is still a long, long way. . . . That is the unexpected and unwelcome result of the attitude the Roumanian government have suddenly assumed.

Statements Made by Mr. Marghiloman in a Conversation Accorded on June 3, 1918

The solution of the Jewish question has not proceeded without difficulties or concessions. We thought you would be satisfied with the solution arrived at, especially as we did not limit its benefits to those Jews who were sent to the front but granted them to all who were affected by the mobilization, no matter for what service they were called upon.

The Austrians have been your warmest protectors; you could not have any more zealous champions.

Everywhere there are persons outside the pale; in Germany also there are stateless persons who have even been born in the country. On the other hand, you can hardly imagine the enormous difficulties attendant upon the solution of such a question as well as upon the transition from the old order of things to a newer and juster one.

You must not forget the situation with which we have to reckon with in Moldavia and the neighboring districts. The psychology of the Moldavians is a peculiar one; everybody there has his own Jewish bosom friend or entertains Jews at his table; but this does not prevent him from taking a very unfavorable view of the Jewish question as such and being a violent anti-semite.

I do not let my feelings influence my political actions, and have always declared that it is incomprehensible to me how in a country of 7,000,000 souls like Roumania there can exist a class of 2-300,000 people looked upon as strangers; this state of affairs, however, is a defect in the Constitution.

I am against individual naturalizations which only gave the possibility of acquiring citizen rights to those who have influence or can bribe deputies and senators.

A secret clause has been added to the peace treaty and will considerably facilitate and expand its enactments; for instance, proof of date of birth may be furnished by personal testimony, according to civil law. Applications for naturalization to be deposited, together with the necessary documents, with the administrative court of the town, which is to enter the registration. In case of refusal appeal may be made to the court.

Possibly certain individuals, as for young students, may have been surprised by the war while abroad and remain excluded from the scope of the law. Their number will, however, not be very great, and means will be found to naturalize them individually or by ministerial decree. Those mobilized in 1913 are automatically included in the categories created by the treaty.

You have spoken just now of the position of the Jews in Russia. I do not think you would have been best pleased to have received citizen rights under such conditions. Also I do not think your state would have been an enviable one if it had been the Liberals who had had to solve your question.

I am convinced that nine-tenths of the Jews will receive naturalization rights. You cannot, however, demand that Jews driven out of Galicia and Podolia should also be naturalized. It is not the most enlightened and educated Jews that have come to us from those places; they will therefore not be able to be received as citizens. In general, I find a great difference between the Moldavian Jews and those resident here.

In any case, the scope of the Jewish question will be expanded at the general peace conference.

When working out the bill I will take your opinions into benevolent consideration; whenever you wish to speak with me I shall be pleased to receive you. I know that your Union represents the majority of Jews resident in the country, and I am always pleased to converse with people who wish to discuss serious subjects with me.

The bill will come up for discussion in the coming Parliament, and I hope that the question will be settled before the elections next autumn, so that the Jews can take part in them.

I believe that the Jews will infuse a good element and more activity into the political life of the country. Among the ranks of the Bucharest lawyers there are many excellent men whose names have come to my ears, and who will certainly be a source of strength that can be used.

I know perfectly well what the Jews resident in Moldavia have had to suffer during the war; I am also aware of the doings of Colonel Moruzi in Bessarabia, where the investigations and inquiries which I ordered were consistently balked. In order to insure a strict investigation being carried I am compelled to nominate from here the general who shall be entrusted with it.

Lately I was compelled to intervene with all severity, the Jewish Directorate of Botosani, I believe, having requested me to do so quickly.

I intend to solve the question:

1. Because I wish to really carry out the terms of the peace treaty.
2. Because I am not afraid that a body of seven million souls will fail to absorb 2-300,000 people.
3. Because I am convinced that the Jewish youth which has contributed so much to the solution of this question will confer the greatest benefits upon the country.

Please submit to me your memorandum; I will give it every consideration; do not forget to include in it the children of fathers who have been mobilized; they must be included within the scope of the law, as must also those who took part in the campaign of 1913.

For the journey to Moldavia you must make application to the Germans; I will immediately grant you a free passage.

II.

The Article Taken from the Official Organ "Jassy"

The Naturalization of Aliens.

Let us use this euphemism in order to avoid naming it by its real name. We know perfectly well what the real point at issue is.

Article XXVIII of the Treaty of Bucharest enacts that "before the ratification of the peace treaty a law shall be issued whereby all stateless persons who have taken part in the war, either by active military service or by performing work of national importance, or have been born in Roumania and are resident there and are the offspring of parents born there, shall, without further formalities, be deemed full Roumanian citizens and shall be able to inscribe themselves as such at the law courts of the country".

A Law Shall Be Issued

These words appear clear enough, but in reality they will provide much matter for Parliamentary debates. How shall this law be issued and by whom? The present Parliament can only work upon the basis provided by the present Constitution, and can issue no laws which are not in complete accordance with the prescriptions of the Constitution. Now Article 7 of the Constitution, which the present Parliament has no mandate to alter, lays down certain conditions as necessary for naturalization, and only if these conditions are complied with can a law relative to Naturalization be permitted.

Should present Parliament, acting upon proposals of the government, pass a "Naturalization of Aliens" Law—even without going outside the scope provided by the Peace Treaty—such a law would be null and void.

In that a new law for the naturalization of aliens should accord with the prescriptions of the Peace Treaty and at the same time be able to acquire validity, the Constitution would have to be altered accordingly. Only thus would any such law become valid. As, however, an alteration of the Constitution is not within the powers of the present Parliament, the latter must first be dissolved and another Parliament elected on a revision mandate. Such a one would be the only elected body empowered to pass a Naturalization Bill—after having altered Article 7 of the Constitution.

For the present the government, in order to comply with Article 28 of the Peace Treaty, will issue a Naturalization of Aliens Law. This law will be without much practical value for the moment, but will acquire a complete and actual validity after having been ratified by a new Parliament. Such a proceeding will enable us to fulfill our obligations without violating our Constitution.

There can be no doubt that whatever method of procedure be adopted for the final solution of a question that has occupied us for a very long time, and however much our feelings may suffer because our rights as an independent state have been violated on its account, we will fulfill our obligations with all good faith. Let it not be forgotten that we ourselves are also somewhat to blame if today we find ourselves compelled to pass laws at the dictates and according to the interests of foreigners instead of being able to follow our own views and interests on such points. If we had applied a timely solution to the question that has occupied us for so much time, with some modifications dictated by our right to an unimperiled national existence, nobody would have now any cause to interfere in our affairs in the name of principles which may be in general good ones but which may turn out very bad in particular instances.

In any case, even if the Central Powers had not been the first to press us to sign a treaty relative to the naturalization of aliens, later on England, America, France and Italy—if those powers should have the chief right to speak at the general peace conference—would have imposed similar conditions upon us. Would the pill have tasted any sweeter then?

We know well enough that the Bratianu-Take Jonescu government hastened in July of last year to officially inform our ministers in London, Paris, Rome and Petrograd that His Majesty the King had pledged his word that "all who have fought for our country or suffered in consequence of the war, should receive the same and equal rights with Roumanian citizens".

The elected representatives of the nation will pass a law that will impart validity to the King's words.

An Extract from a Letter Received by Me Some Days Ago from the Central Committee of the Union Roumanian Jews

. . . Today I am in a position to inform you that our fears regarding the unwillingness of the Roumanian government to effect a sincere and honorable solution of the Jewish question have unfortunately been and are justified. Mr. Marghiloman, who was brought up and has grown old in the Roumanian political school, is as insincere as all the others, and it is extremely unlikely that he will keep his promise. To the delegation of the Union which he received about a fortnight ago he promised to lay the bill before Parliament and to have the whole question settled by next autumn's election. Yesterday, however, there appeared in "Jassy", the newspaper published in the town of that name as the official organ of the Roumanian government, an important article, a translation of which follows, declaring that the law relating to the Jewish question will be promulgated by means of a decree, that the Roumanian Parliament will indeed discuss this question, but that the newly elected Constituents will be the first to give legal sanction to the bill, so that the Jews will not take part in the elections, which will be carried out under the old electoral franchise still in force.

The contradiction between the terms of the peace treaty and this postponement of the question are clear enough. It portends no good to the poor Jewish population, but shows that the old Roumanian system of bamboozling the whole world is to flourish and continue. For indeed what else can Mr. Marghiloman's action imply? Let it be considered that there are not ten members in the two legislative bodies who will oppose him; the majority he has behind him therefore enables him to do what pleases him. We can therefore only see in his step bad will and a dishonorable intention to disregard the ruling of the peace treaty.

The Chambers now sitting will have two to two and one-half months' time before them, perhaps even three months. At the earliest, the newly elected Chambers will not meet before November. What guarantee have we that these latter, who will find themselves confronted by vast problems, will not have work to do that will take them a year or two to accomplish? In that case we may anticipate with certainty that the Jewish question will be the last of all to be discussed, so that the will of these gentlemen will be done and it will emerge in a thoroughly mutilated form.

A fortnight ago Mr. Stere told us that he expected Marghiloman to assume a mystifying attitude in the matter, and another member of the present Roumanian Parliament informed us three days ago that there was not a single Roumanian politician in whom he had any confidence.

Like all genuine Roumanian politicans, Mr. Marghiloman is thoroughly insincere as regards every other question he deals with (agrarian reform, the franchise, the expropriation question). He will carry out these reforms only partially and very incompletely.

The time for exposing to the world at large the sordid machinations of these politicians has now arrived. We beg you, therefore, to immediately take further action in the matter.

Enclosed please find copy of King Ferdinand's declaration to our representatives at Jassy, the text of Article 4 of the new Bessarabian Constitution and of the statement made by Mr. Marghiloman to our delegation on June [illegible]

We have sent a memorandum to Mr. Marghiloman (translation of which will shortly follow). We have had the text published in the papers here. We have also forwarded a petition to the Chamber and Senate. A reproduction of the text will shortly appear in the papers; we are sending you a copy. We have sought out various Deputies before their departure and asked them to discharge their mandates; we handled them copies of the memorandum, and gave them all information on this unhappy question, about which they seemed to be absolutely ignorant In spite of all the steps we have undertaken the results we may expect are very problematic because there is absolutely no evidence of any honorable intention to redress an injustice.

JEWISH WIDOWS' AND ORPHANS' HOME.

The school enters the child with the kindergarten, and has classes through the high school department, fitting the child for entrance to standard universities.

The type of instruction has been such that applications for admittance were far beyond the school's capacity. For several years children had to be refused admittance because of this lack, until it became apparent to the committee that the time had come when it was imperative to enlarge the school so as to accommodate those seeking admittance Accordingly the Board of the Home voted an appropriation of some $90,000 for this purpose. The work is now in progress, with hopes that it will be finished in time for the opening of the school session in October.

The committee has secured the services, beginning with the fall session, of Mr. John W. Gurtiss as Superintendent. Mr. Curtiss comes to the school from Memphis, Tenn., where for a period of eleven years he was the principal of the vocational school, which he started, the attendance of which grew to over 1,100 pupils.

Thus it will be seen that the incentives which inspired the birth of this institution are still adhered to. and every effort is being made to further the noble ideals of those who founded the institution.

The present officers of the Home are:

Joseph Kohn, President.

Jonas Hiller, First Vice-President.

Joseph S. Loeb, Second Vice-President.

Maurice Stern, Treasurer.

Sol H. Kahn, Secretary.

had furnished a home to the victims of the Inquisition, the old restrictions were reintroduced in 1814. The Jews had to live in the ghetto and had to sell all real estate outside of it which they had acquired during the French period. They were excluded from public office and even from public schools. It is indeed one of the comforting facts that we learn in history that in this kingdom of Sardinia, where even such elementary rights were denied to the Jews up to 1848, such a wonderful change took place within a half century. While a Jew could not be town clerk in 1847, the Jew, Luzzatti, became minister in 1891 and premier in 1910, and the Jew, Ottolenghi, by the way an observant Jew, was minister of war in 1902, both of the last quoted facts being without parallel up to this time in our history. Times do change occasionally for the better.

PROTEST PERSECUTION OF HEBREW AND YIDDISH

Jewish members of the Austrian Parliament have made representations to the Minister of the Interior regarding the new regulation requiring Yiddish newspapers in Galicia to submit to the censor, before publication, a copy translated into German, and also concerning the prohibition to enter Yiddish or Hebrew as mother tongues on census forms at Lemberg. It is also noteworthy that the prohibition of Hebrew and Yiddish letters continues to figure in the postal agreement among the central powers and Russia and Ukraine.

JEWISH POPULATION

The Jewish Year Book places the Jewish population of the world at 13,980,715. Of these, 9,986,447 are in Europe, 3,094,309 are in America, 499,679 in Asia, 380,865 in Africa and 19,415 in Australia. New York's Jewish population is estimated at 1,350,000; Chicago's at 250,000; Philadelphia's at 175,000; Boston's at 75,000; Cleveland, 75,000; Baltimore, 60,000; Detroit, 40,000; St. Louis, 50,000; San Francisco, 30,000; Cincinnati, 30,000. The Jewish population of Russia is 6,946,000, or practically half the total Jewish population of the world.

The B'nai B'rith Free Employment Bureau of Chicago

By OTTO G. FINKELSTEIN

The altruistic aims and principles of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith are imbedded in a splendid personnel and have been prolific of many essential and constructive undertakings. Its membership has embraced and numbers many visionaries with ability to approximate national and community needs.

A group of Chicago members recognized the economic and social importance of providing suitable employment for our co-religionists, and thirteen years ago, Oct. 11, 1905, to be exact, formally opened the B'nai B'rith Free Employment Bureau of Chicago.

It was primitive in its inception, for the worker in charge alternated between interviewing an applicant and attending to personal commercial duties, but the essential nature of its work and the community interest assured a steady growth.

Co-extensive with the work of the B'nai B'rith Employment Office, the Jewish Charities of Chicago, through its Relief Department, maintained employment facilities for its handicapped and other relief cases. Both organizations found there was a duplication of effort and expense, and felt the need of an efficient employment exchange, independent of charity features.

The two offices were amalgamated and on Oct. 18, 1909, the unified organization was incorporated under the name of the B'nai B'rith Free Employment Bureau.

The bureau is managed by a board of seven directors, three of whom are appointed annually by the Central B'nai B'rith Council, three by the Jewish Aid Society, and the six thus appointed select the seventh member. The funds for its maintenance are derived from appropriations by the B'nai B'rith and the Jewish Aid Society.

That the operation of the bureau is placed in capable hands, and that it is governed by sage counsel is attested by the mere mention of its present directorate.

Directors 1918-1919

Toby Rubovits, President (seventh member).

Adolph D. Weiner, Vice-President (B'nai B'rith).

Gustav Hochstadter, Secretary-Treasurer (Jewish Aid).

Jacob M. Loeb (Jewish Aid).

William Lowenbach (Jewish Aid).

Albert F. Mecklenburger (B'nai B'rith).

Hon. Philip Stein (B'nai B'rith).

Mr. Rubovits has been a director since 1909, and has been entrusted with the office of president for the past seven years.

The work of the bureau is purely benevolent, and all possible efforts are made to find positions for the applicants, and to fill the needs of the employers who favor the bureau with requests for help. Strenuous efforts are made toward rehabilitating the newly arrived immigrants, and at all times toward caring for those individuals who, by dint of irregular employment, lack of vocational training, seasonal work or other maladjustment or financial stringency find themselves unable properly to care for themselves. The bureau seeks to find suitable employment for those who through lack of work or disability have to be taken care of by the Relief Department of the Jewish Aid Society, or other organizations, and it endeavors to readjust the conditions of those who through stress of circumstances are compelled to seek lodging and sustenance at the Hebrew Sheltering Home. Large numbers of physically and other handicapped cases are given attention, and efforts made to provide them with work of a suitable nature.

The bureau is accomplishing its purpose in numerous instances. Many men, heads of large families, have been placed in positions where they can provide for their dependents without the necessity of outside assistance.

Immigrants have been given the opportunity of becoming self-supporting and of adjusting themselves to their new surroundings.

Many boys and girls have procured positions that will prove of future benefit, and quite a few derelicts were given a helping hand by being provided with employment.

With the above in view, the bureau has a man as superintendent, a woman as assistant superintendent, and a corps of four other workers. The workers alternate between being in the office, interviewing the applicants and going into the field and interviewing various employers, thus endeavoring to secure their co-operation with the work of the bureau.

Each applicant is registered on an application card, and a record is kept thereon of every subsequent interview. When an applicant is sent to an employer, the name of the employer is entered on the card together with the result. Daily record sheets are kept of every person interviewed in the office, the places to which they are sent, time, result, etc.

On an employer's requisition blank is notated the demand for help, and all other necessary information. The name of every applicant that is referred to an employer is entered on the requisition, with the result in each case.

Each applicant, when sent to a position, is given a form letter addressed to the employer, together with a printed post card, with instructions to fill out and return said postal, showing whether or not the applicant secured the position. The employer is also called up in the endeavor to have a double verification of the result in each case. It is frequently necessary to write to the employers and the applicants, and also for the workers to call upon either of them in order to procure accurate information.

In procuring work, outside of the solicitations by the field workers, it is constantly necessary to make use of the telephone, and call up various firms from the classified lists in the telephone book. Many requisitions are received direct from the employer to the office, when co-operation has been established. A tickler is also maintained of co-operating firms, and this file is utilized in the effort to procure work. The applicants' registration cards show fully their qualifications, and frequently applicants are sent for in order to fill the employers' demands.

A free employment exchange differs from all other social work, in that you have a third party to deal with, namely, the employer, and efforts must be made not only to secure the employer's cooperation for the bureau, but when complaints arise, as they frequently do, that the workers act conciliatory toward the employer. Furthermore, discrimination must be used in the handling of applicants, and circumspection in their selection before sending them to the employer.

The problems of employment enter into so many ramifications that space does not permit a categorical exposition of these problems.

Fundamentally, a Jewish employment office functions along the same lines as a governmental exchange, and its basic causes are involved in the same general economic conditions with the exception, however, that Jews find any problem accentuated by the fact that we are Jews, and it is surely needless to digress on this point.

It may be pertinent to set forth in a few main divisions the class of applicants who call at the bureau:

1. Immigrants.
2. Persons skilled in some occupation who are out of work because of a present scarcity in their line, locally or otherwise.
3. Persons out of work on account of a general dearth of opportunities, either locally or nationally.
4. Persons seeking their initial occupation, thus requiring vocational guidance and vocational placement.
5. Those who may be called industrial sub-standards, and are therefore the first ones to be laid off and suffer from irregularity of employment. .
6. Handicapped.

Jewish immigrants undergo considerable hardships, not only in finding employment, but also in procuring regular or indeterminate work.

Non-Jewish immigrants in general are handicapped by their inability to speak the English language and the crudeness of their occupations, if they have any, as compared with the methods in this country. Nevertheless, they are usually robust and can readily accept work at hard physical labor.

The Jewish immigrant, however, including the two above mentioned, labors under the following difficulties:

(a) Lack of knowledge of the English language.

(b) Lack of a skilled occupation or a very rudimentary knowledge of the same.

(c) Religious scruples such as dietary laws and observance of Sabbath and holy days, etc.

(d) Unfitness for work of a strenuous nature.

(e) An aesthetic aversion to unclean and odoriferous work.

(f) Dominant feelings of caste, pride and ambition which prompt a Jewish immigrant to particularize in his selection of work.

(g) Prejudice of employers, economic and racial or religious.

The last difficulty, under classification g, is pertinent to all Jewish applicants, and is the unfortunate line of demarkation in the work of a Jewish employment bureau.

Anyone who has tried to find employment for a boy or girl of Jewish persuasion, who stands with the first flush of a graduating diploma in their hands, and finds the invisible sign of "No Admittance", will readily realize the weight of this condition. Many industries are tacitly barred to Jewish applicants.

The foregoing analysis perhaps suffices to impart in a small measure the demands which the bureau endeavors to meet, and the purposes it strives to accomplish.

The bureau has been experiencing a splendid co-operation from employers, social agencies and individuals. The Young Men's Jewish Charities have organized an employment committee for the express purpose of co-operating with the bureau in the placement of difficult cases.

In the fiscal year ended April 30, 1918, 850 separate firms engaged help through the bureau. It registered in this same period, 3,897 individual applications, 6,489 cases were referred to employers, and work was provided for 3,093 cases, at a cost of $8,623.27.

There were received in this period 3,390 incoming calls for help, 2,784 demands were obtained by the workers telephoning the employer, 1,045 requests were procured by the workers visiting the employer in person, making a total of 7,219 demands for help, calling for not less than 13,051 persons.

Twenty-seven per cent of the placements made during the year consisted of difficult cases, 585 were either sick or disabled, 65 were mentally deficient, and 107 were either penal or delinquent cases. The bureau also placed 41 homeless men and 38 Sabbath observers. Let each one estimate the economic value of such placements and picture the energy expended in each case.

Unemployment is largely a problem of normal times, for it is a coefficient of modern industry.

Some of us misunderstand the individual who is looking for work. Others fail to visualize the volatile forces which cause tremendous "labor turnovers." Perhaps these misinterpretations would be clarified if we translated unemployment into terms of money. Is the average individual looking for work or is he looking for its sum total—money?

When we realize that it is purchasing power that every man seeks and not work for its own sake, we are in a better way to estimate each individual's economic value and to interpret the important employment factors. The background of many of our social ills has its inception in employment problems.

Occupations for the handicapped is a subject that is receiving much attention nowadays. Few of us realize how great is the number of industrial cripples that is constantly with us. The problem is being intensified by the terrible havoc which the war is causing. The subject is very broad, but it may be pertinent to mention that if the war is prolonged, there will be many handicapped soldiers and sailors. Their functional education and re-education will be preliminary to their placement. The bureau will no doubt find it necessary to exert all its energies and resources in finding suitable employment for war scarred soldiers and sailors.

COMMUNICATED.

Editor B'nai B'rith News:

While on a trip to Cleveland, June 10, I met a friend who was financially embarrassed and unable to cash a check. Lacking necessary identifications, he asked me to identify him at the Hotel Statler, where I was stopping while in Cleveland. I tried to do so, but I being a stranger in Cleveland, my guarantee was not accepted. My conversation with the manager was overheard by Mr. A. Lowenberg of Wabash, Ind., who was a stranger to me but well known to the manager of the hotel, who voluntarily stepped up and endorsed the check, guaranteeing same. I was taken by surprise by the stranger's action, but soon recognized a B. B. button which he carried on his lapel. We soon became warm friends. I am sure a mention of this in your monthly issue will show the public at large the warm friendship in the I. O. B. B.

The National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives at Denver, Colorado

Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, Patron Society

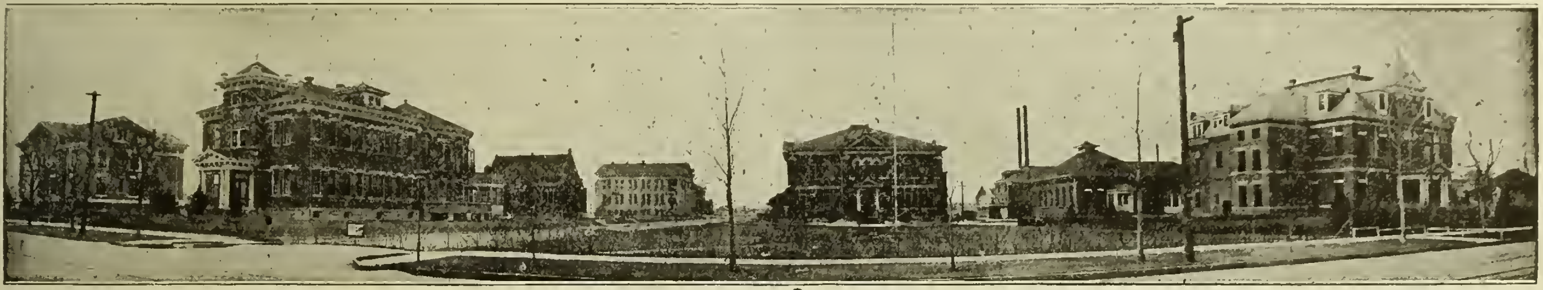
One of the real achievements of the I. O. B. B. was the opening of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives in Denver on Dec. 10, 1899. District No. 2 of the order lent its support to the carrying out of the long hoped for consummation of an institution for the care of tuberculous poor in the wonderful climate of Colorado. Through the efforts of District No. 2, Brother Samuel Grabfelder, at that time of Louisville, Ky., was prevailed upon to accept the office of president of the institution.

They builded better than they knew in procuring the services of our great-hearted brother. From that day until this, the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives has been the labor of his life, and through his great efforts an institution that is second to none in the world has arisen from that little beginning of one building which held forty-five patients.

While the B'nai B'rith did not take over the institution as its own, it still was the foster parent that nursed and cared for it until it had arrived at such a stage when it could fight its own battles.

The B'nai B'rith is the patron society of this institution, and is proud of the young giant that has grown from the puny, struggling infant institution, which so badly needed the help and encouragement which was cheerfully extended by the order.

The hospital has now been in existence for eighteen years, and its achievements have been greater than anyone who assisted in the early struggles of the institution could possibly have anticipated.



From one small building which itself has been almost entirely reconstructed, and which has been dedicated in honor of Dr. William S. Friedman, who gave the hospital its first impetus, there are today eleven buildings. The last and crowning glory of the hospital is the Grabfelder Medical and Administration Building, which the president of the hospital presented with full equipment to the institution. The laboratories, X-ray department, examination rooms and splendid administration quarters are the last word in medical and administration equipment.

The Joseph E. Schoenberg Memorial Industrial School Building, with its $25,000 endowment, presented by Mr. Harmon August, son-in-law of Mr. Joseph E. Schoenberg, is fully carrying out the object that its name implies.

From the Dudley C. Schoenberg Memorial Farm the milk and eggs of the institution come fresh each day.

All of the latest innovations that make for efficiency in tuberculosis work have been installed in this institution; the graduated work system, a cafeteria system for the dining room, preventorium work for children, as well as all other latest methods of medical treatment.

A Research Foundation Committee, composed of great tuberculosis specialists, recently met in the City of New York to consider the organization of a research foundation in connection with this institution. The work will be instituted not later than the coming winter with a great bacteriologist in charge, and it is hoped that through this work greater light will be thrown on the methods of prevention and cure of tuberculosis, and such other scientific work as pertains to research work for the discovery of the causes leading to this dread disease.

The hospital has admitted over 3,700 patients. It is too bad that we have not been able to keep track of the discharged patients of the institution. We are constantly running across people who were at one time inmates of this institution, and who are now living in affluence; and its beneficent effects are more far reaching than we are in a position to show.

Only recently a young woman from Chicago called at the hospital, and in reminding us that she had been a patient here nine years ago, told us of her splendid recovery and her success in business. She left a contribution of $50 for the hospital, which was received with the very greatest pleasure.

During the past year fifteen children have received preventorium treatment in the hospital with the greatest success.

Mrs. Seraphine Pisko has for seven years been the National Excutive Secretary of the hospital, and under her regime the financial affairs of the institution have been kept in the best possible shape.

In 1917 Dr. Saling Simon was installed as superintendent and it is due to his efforts that many great improvements have been inaugurated.

Mr. Ben Altheimer, an active member of the order, has been the faithful treasurer of the hospital during the greater part of the existence of the institution, he having succeeded Mr. Louis Anfenger of sainted memory, who was the first treasurer.

Many of the members of our order have been active in the work of the hospital from its very inception, and it is to these men together with their co-workers in Denver and other cities that the great success of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives is due.

The terrible struggle through which the world is now passing has greatly magnified the problem of tuberculosis. Not only have many soldiers been returned from the various camps as tuberculous, but a very large number of young men who never suspected that they were afflicted with this dread disease have found through their examination for the army that they have tuberculosis.

This discovery has made the work even more necessary than was realized by the medical world. The National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives has opened its doors to tuberculous soldiers, and has already received quite a large number. The institution is closely cooperating with the Red Cross in this work.

That the climate of Colorado is considered by the greatest experts a great factor in the cure of tuberculosis is evidenced by the fact that the largest tuberculosis institution in the world is being built in Denver by the United States Government for the care of tuberculous soldiers.

That the State of Colorado and the city of Denver are eager that the world should know the health-giving qualities of its climate was amply demonstrated bv the fact that every department ot the state and city made most strenuous efforts to get the so-called "Recuperation Camp" for Colorado.

Thus has the judgment of our order in helping to open the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives at Denver been justified in the eyes of the world, and the record of the work of the National Jewish Hospital is sufficient justification for all the assistance and encouragement given the institution by the order.

Should the Research Foundation, which will be established as soon as the necessary funds for the work will be available, be the means of discovering either the prevention or cure of this "White Plague", then indeed will the work of this institution of which the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is the patron society, be one of the greatest that the world has known. That it is in the province of medical science to make this discovery, whether it be in this institution or another, there can be no doubt. Should it be our good fortune to be the instruments to this great end, we would indeed have much reason to be proud and grateful.

The Jewish Orphan Asylum of Districts Nos. 2 and 6, I. O. B. B.

Cleveland, Ohio

This year marks the conclusion of the fiftieth year in the history of the Home.

In the year 1863 District Grand Lodge No. 2, comprising then the territory of the present Districts Nos. 2, 6 and 7, proposed to meet in the city of St. Louis in regular convention. Owing, however, to the disturbing incursions made by General Morgan of guerrilla war fame, the delegates elected found it impossible to reach their destination, and the convention was held in Cleveland. Here the first step towards the founding of a Home for orphan children was taken by the adoption of a law calling for an annual contribution of one dollar from the brethren of the District for the purpose of establishing and maintaining such a Home. Assisted by the members and aided greatly by woman organizations in the leading cities of the District, this contribution grew within a few years into a fund deemed sufficient for the realization of the plan conceived, and at a meeting of the Grand Lodge held in the year 1867 in the city of Milwaukee, a committee consisting of Messrs. Abraham Aub, William Kriegshaber, Isidore Bush, A. E. Frankland and Abraham Wiener (all of blessed memory with the exception of Abraham Wiener whose fine service we are still enjoying today) was appointed and empowered to select and to purchase a suitable site for a child caring institution. Many were the cities that competed for the honor of harboring the future wards of the Order, but Cleveland was chosen, and the property known as the Dr. Seeleye Water Cure Sanitarium was purchased.

July 14, 1868, witnessed the dedication of the building to its noble purpose, and great was the rejoicing of the vast concourse of people at the fulfillment of their fond hope. At the first meeting of the Board held the very day of the dedication, 38 children were admitted, and from this small beginning the Home, presided over by Abraham Aub, zealous champion of the orphan child, and managed by Louis Aufrecht, whom the Board had elected superintendent, prospered and grew into the stately dimensions it commands today.

During the fifty years of its existence the Jewish Orphan Asylum has enjoyed in the capacity of presidents seven men—Messrs. Abraham Hart, Abraham Wiener, Abraham Hart, David Adler, William Stix, Louis S. Levi and Philip Stein. These names are not mere sounds to you, but their mention brings before your mental eye that fine type of Jewish manhood which, broad-minded, big-hearted and capable, has always been ready to devote its God-given powers to the uplift and succor of the less fortunate and needy fellowmen, and in keeping with the high class to which belong the presidents was the membership of the Board of Trustees and Directors from whose midst they had been chosen. Noblesse oblige has been the watch-word of our Directorate and unselfishly and unstintedly, ability, means and time have been devoted by them to the furtherance of the welfare of the beloved institution. It is but natural then that with the intelligent co-operation of such presidents and members the work of the superintendents should have produced the results to which we today point with such grateful satisfaction.

Louis Aufrecht, the first superintendent, seems to have been a man unusually qualified to perform the sacred duties entrusted to him. He was a man of high intelligence and of splendid education, and possessed of an intense desire to prepare his pupils well for the struggles of life, he devoted his fine capabilities continuously to the improvement of the conditions of the Home. After ten years of fruitful activity he felt constrained to resign his position because of his wife's failing health, and was succeeded by Dr. Samuel Wolfenstein. Thirty-five years Dr. Wolfenstein was privileged to devote his energies to the sacred cause our Home represents, and the work which he performed during the period of a generation is so familiar to you, his former co-oworkers, and has been set forth so clearly and disinterestedly in the book he recently published as a testimonial of a lasting devotion to the Home, that I refrain from expatiating upon its fine merits. Dr. Wolfenstein, owing to advanced years, relinquished his position Oct. 31, 1913, and retired to a well earned rest. May many years of life and good health be granted unto him in the bosom of his family.

During the fifty years of the Home's existence 3,581 children have found shelter under its protecting roof, and were admitted according to the following table:

Year.	Admitted.	Discharged.
1868-78	481	261	220
1878-88	582	495	307
1888-98	881	689	500
1898-08	848	855	494
1908-18	789	781	500
	3,581	3,081

Of these 3,081 have been sent forth, 1,843 as graduates, i.e., after completing the regular course of our school; 1,199 were returned to the surviving parent either because of improved economic condition or because of re-marriage, and 37 boys and girls were taken from us by death according to the following table:

You will be interested to learn that of our wards 2,215 hailed from District Grand Lodge No. 2, 1,139 from District Grand Lodge No. 6, and 227 from District Grand Lodge No. 7.

2,871 were American born and 710 saw the light of day on foreign soil.
41 were the children of members of the Order.
2,960 were half orphans.
366 full orphans.
4 of unknown status.
240 children of demented parents.
41 children of divorced parents.

The last mentioned came to the Home according to the appended table which tells a tale of its own:

1868-78	4
1878-88	22
1888-98	42
1898-08	57
1908-18	85

The graduates who have gone forth from our school have proved themselves worthy of the training and are with but a vanishing exception a credit unto their Alma Mater. Ten years ago in the annual report presented to you by my predecessor you were told what had become of the boys and girls who were the wards of the Home during the past forty years, and I am happy to tell you that the graduates of more recent date have upheld the reputation established for them, and are, almost one and all, useful members of society. They are pursuing trades, occupations and professions of all kinds, and quite a number have met with telling success. I am, unfortunately, not able to give you a report on every one of the boys and girls who were graduated during the last ten years, but can definitely state that:

158 of them are doing office work.
71 are engaged in business pursuits.
31 pursue trades.
30 are students.
5 follow a profession.
6 own a business.
20 are keeping house.
40 are in Army or Navy.
44 are married.
1 is in a correctional institution.
2 have grown insane.
1 is in a school for feeble-minded.
8 have died.

The remaining 41 have not been reached by me, but I feel safe in asserting that these also are doing their bit towards upholding the reputation of the Home which has sheltered and reared them. Great is the temptation now to dwell upon the vast influence this Home is and will be exerting through its graduates upon this and coming generations. but I must resist and leave it to you to picture to yourself the multitude that will sooner or later come under its spell because of the training it has given to more than three thousand human beings.

Regarding the children at present under our care I beg to submit to you the following statistics:

Total number of children received at the J. O. A. since its founding in 1868	3,500
Present population, boys	300
Present population, girls	200
Half orphans—fatherless	163
Half orphans—motherless	206
Admission due to parents' unsound mental condition	75
Full orphans	56
Number of families represented	205
Accepted during the year	82
Dismissed during the year	71
Average age of children—boys	11.7
Average age of children—girls	12.4
Number of children hailing from District No. 2	271
Number of children hailing from District No. 6	117

The health of the children has been very satisfactory during the past year. There was little illness, and the little proved not of a serious nature. In the school work fair progress may be reported. The pensa assigned to the various subjects were duly taken and covered, and the frequent tests given throughout the year gave us ample opportunity for testing our pupils' mental growth. Almost all of them have been benefited much by the conscientious work of their teachers, and, therefore, will be permitted to continue the work in more advanced grades. The older boys and girls attending either the city high school or our own commercial class, have maintained throughout the year the high standard of work and many are the encomiums bestowed upon them both by school authorities and employers to whom the members of the commercial class render temporary service.

YOUR LAD AND MY LAD.

Down toward the deep blue water, marching to throb of drum, from city street and country lane the lines of khaki come; the rumbling guns, the steady tread are full of grim appeal, while rays of western sunshine flash back from burnished steel. With eager eyes and cheeks aflame the serried ranks advance; and your dear lad and my dear lad are on their way to France. A sob clings choking in the throat, as file on file swept by, between those cheering multitudes, to where the great ships lie; the batteries halt, the columns wheel, to clear toned bugle call, with shoulders squared and faces front they stand a khaki wall. Tears shine on every watcher's cheek, love speaks in every glance; for your dear lad and my dear lad are on their way to France. Before them, through a mist of years, in soldier buff or blue, brave comrades from a thousand fields watch now in proud review; the same old Flag, the same old faith—the Freedom of the World—spells duty in those flapping folds above long ranks unfurled. Strong are the hearts which bear along Democracy's advance, as my dear lad and your dear lad go on their way to France. The word rings out; a million feet tramp forward on the road, along that path of sacrifice o'er which their fathers strode. With eager eyes and cheeks aflame, with cheers on smiling lips, those fighting men of '17 move onward to their ships. Nor even love may hold them back, or halt that stern advance, as your dear lad and my dear lad go on their way to France.—Randall Parrish.

RUMANIA AND THE JEWS.

In the House of Commons Mr. King asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he was aware of the civil and political injustices under which Jews had hitherto suffered in Rumania and the efforts of the late Marquis of Salisbury to remove their injustices; whether the treaty of peace recently signed by Rumania guaranteed full and equal rights to Jews; and, if so, whether he would give an assurance that this country had no intention of setting this article aside:

Lord Robert Cecil—If the honorable member will read these treaty stipulations with care he will observe that the enfranchisement obtained for the Jews is of a most limited and conditional nature, and that the clauses have, in tact, been framed solely in order to give Germany an additional pretext for interfering in the internal affairs of Rumania. His Majesty's Government has the fullest sympathy with the cause of Jewish enfranchisement in Rumania and elsewhere, but it is to the full program of liberation which the Rumanian government had themselves adopted prior to this treaty, and not to this restricted scheme that His Majesty's government will adhere.

Anent 75th Anniversary of the I. O. B. B.

A SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY

The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is the only international Jewish fraternal organization in existence. It is American in its origin. As its uses in latter years became recognized abroad, European lodges were called into life. The Order is no longer, in every respect, what it primarily was intended to be. While it links together Jews of all nationalities and religious interpretations by the common Jewish bond, takes a part in the defense of the good name and inalienable rights of Israel and maintains philanthropic institutions of various kinds, the insurance feature, which was once one of the most prominent—if not the most prominent purpose of the Order—has been supplanted by more unselfish social activities. The B'nai B'rith, because it has made good, should never be permitted to decline in power. Much is being done at the present time everywhere for the increase of its membership. Its leaders have wisely made a drive for new recruits among the younger people who have either themselves of late immigrated into this country, or are the children of recent immigrants. There are those who are given to criticizing all institutions, and have therefore not spared the B'nai B'rith. Their strictures, be it understood, are surely not merited. The most loyal son of the Order will not claim perfection for the institution; but he declares with justice that in these days of storm and stress all institutions are being carefully weighed in the balance. The B'nai B'rith has made every effort to find itself in the newer Jewish polity steadily developing. Who knows but what, while other organizations tend to divide Israel into opposing factions, the B'nai B'rith will serve as a unifying element, provided, of course, it does not meddle in the solution of certain disturbing issues. Let its fundamental principle always be "In Jewish unity there is Jewish strength". Under such conditions the three-quarters of a century already lived by the Order will be but the beginning of a glorious career, perhaps extending over centuries and promising an ever-increasing usefulness.—Jewish Comment.

THE B'NAI B'RITH.

The celebration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Order B'nai B'rith is not only a local event worthy of notice, but is of general importance, as the Order B'nai B'rith has largely influenced the development of Jewish affairs in this country, as well as abroad, during the last half of the nineteenth century. At one time the Order B'nai B'rith was the best and most solid Jewish organization in the world. It was, to be sure, never as brilliant as the Alliance Israelite Universelle in the first years after its organization, nor as epoch-making as the Zionist organization, but it was a solid body of Jewish men of conservative tendencies, who aimed to preserve Judaism as much as possible and to reconcile it with the ideas and inclinations of modern times.

It seems to us that to the present day the Order B'nai B'rith is the best organization of the Jewish middle classes. Its fate and development are therefore dependent on the development of the Jewish middle classes. When the Jewish middle classes were inspired by lofty ideals and displayed keen Jewish sentiments, the Order B'nai B'rith was active, idealistic and full of motion; when the idealism of the Jewish middle classes decreased and their cultural level became somewhat lowered, the order was the first to feel it. This explains best why the Order B'nai B'rith is not today what it was thirty or forty years ago, when our middle classes were still inspired by Jewish traditions and were better acquainted with original Judaism than they are today, when they know Judaism chiefly at second hand. Today, the Order B'nai B'rith is less a center of Jewish ideals than a center of Jewish activities; but, to the honor of the order be it said, all its activities in the various fields of Jewish endeavor—philanthropic, social and political—are pursued in the spirit of duty and carried out programatically according to certain definite plans, as befits a solid organization. It has seldom happened that the Order B'nai B'rith has failed to carry out a fixed policy upon which it has embarked, or to realize a definite resolution which it has adopted. It is the fineness of administration and organization and the honesty of purpose prevailing among the leaders of the order that give it today the high position it holds among Jewish organizations.

One may sometimes fail to agree with the position taken by the Order on the various political questions, but one is always aware of the fact that the Order, with its conservative tendencies, finds it hard to reconcile itself to ideas which seem radical. Just because the Order is not a radical camp it is often in a position to mediate between the various parties. The Order has done this on various occasions, the last time during the Congress controversy. For this reason, the Order B'nai B'rith is useful, not only as a social and philanthropic organization, but also as a political one.

Next to the Zionist organization, the Order B'nai B'rith is the only international Jewish organization which is one not only in name but in fact. There are branches of the Order in England, Germany, Austria, Bulgaria, Turkey, Palestine, etc., and now the leaders of the Order announce their intention of extending their field of activities to Russia. Since the Order is not centralized, as is the Zionist organization, through lack of a definite political program, its character in every country is a different one. While in England the lodges of the Order are outspokenly Zionistic, in Germany they are centers of assimilation and often refuse to admit a Zionist member. In the Balkans and in Palestine the lodges of the Order are centers of modern conservatism, and in Austria the B'nai B'rith members belong rather to the liberal section of the Jewish population. However, the lodges are doing good work of every kind everywhere—either philanthropic, as is the case in this country, or philanthropic and intellectual, as is the case in Europe. The Order can always be proud of the manner in which its various activities are carried out.

Whether the Order will flourish in the fourth quarter of the century of its existence, and whether it will succeed in holding its position in the future as it has done in the past, remains to be seen. The second decade of the twentieth century differs greatly from the middle of the nineteenth century both in character and general tendencies. The Order is a distinct product of the time in which it was founded; in order to grow and flourish, it must assimilate the ideas of the time and keep in touch with the reality of life. The driving power in history is no longer the vague liberalism of the middle of the nineteenth century. Humanity is confronted today with quite different problems—the problems of the formation and determination of states, races and groups—and is witnessing at the present moment a new order of things. If the Order B'nai B'rith means to remain a force in Jewish life here as well as abroad, it will have to adapt itself to these new tendencies of our time and adjust its work to modern conditions. If, for instance, the question of settling tens of thousands of Jews in Palestine comes up the Order B'nai B'rith, no matter what its attitude to Zionism is, will have to participate in the work. The same is true of many other questions of momentous character which will have to be solved in the near future. For the sake of the Order that has a right to be proud of its seventy-five years' work in the past, it is to be hoped that it will realize what the moment requires of it, so that it may adjust itself to new conditions and grow and flourish in the future as it has done in the past. Thus it may remain a powerful factor in Jewish life—representing it and helping to shape the destinies of the Jewish people.—American Jewish Chronicle.

THE B'NAI B'RITH

Conventions of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith have just been held in the East and in the West, and in each instance the proceedings of the conventions have proven the immense good that is being done by the Order for Jewry. In all its activities the B'nai B'rith is regardless of partisanship, but lends its aid wherever neded with only the desire of the advancement of Jewry at heart.

The Order has been criticized for its stand on various questions. It has been rated for its part in the recent controversy over soldier welfare work, although it must be admitted that the B'nai B'rith work in this state has progressed far more rapidly than has the work of the national welfare board. The stand taken by the B'nai B'rith in that matter was taken solely because of its belief that it could administer the activity in an effective manner, and its achievements in the city of Chillicothe bear out its contentions.

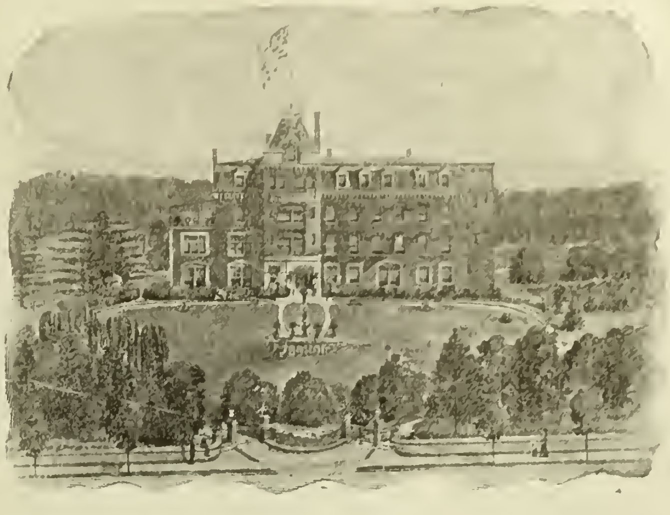
The great principle that stands out in the work of the B'nai B'rith is the unity of its efforts. There are various forces in Jewry who are striving to do good and beneficial effort, but their activities are usually governed by some individual interpretation of Judaism, or are shaded by the personal ideas and belief of their leaders, but the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith stands as a great unifying force in the welfare of the Jewish people. It is this singleness of purpose that has enabled the B'nai B'rith to do what it has done.

American Jewry may well follow that path blazed by this order. In its sincerity of purpose lies the answer to its progress, and in its purity of ideals lies love of all its members. The pioneer in many charitable works, and a strong and able supporter of everything Jewish, the B'nai B'rith stands today as one of the most potent forces in the development and successful progress of the Jewish people of this country.—Toledo Israelite.

"OUR PRIDE"

The Home for Aged and Infirm of District No. 1

Our institution situated in the city of Yonkers, N. Y., is shown below, not in all its splendor, but from the picture thus presented you can imagine its beauty, when its rolling lawns, its magnificent trees, its arbors covered with growing, flowering vines assume their summer garb—a scene which beggars description. A spot ideal, a home indeed, standing out majestically, one might say, on a hill overlooking the Hudson river, it gives to our brothers, their wives and ofttimes their widows, a private garden of nine and one-fourth acres in which to pass in peace and quiet, surrounded with all comfort, the balance of the span of life allotted to them.



And lastly see those smiling faces showing clearly how well our sentiments are founded and demonstrating the joy of those who in their old age have found a "Home" worthy of its name.

A few statistics and we have told our story. Dedicated on July 5, 1881, it has sheltered to date 415 inmates, the oldest of whom at present is 92 years, the youngest but 52, and it is interesting to know that it gave shelter to one brother for over 30 years.

For its maintenance there has been expended over $600,000.00 of which the District has contributed more than $540,000.00, the balance being supplied by donations, etc. This does not take into account the monies gathered and so generously devoted to the work by that band of willing workers, the Ladies' Auxiliary Society who supplied the linen and other household necessities.

Our Home for Aged and Infirm found its inspiration in the minds and hearts of those loyal souls whose memory we revere as founders of our beloved Order. Back in the dim past, in 1857, a general fund was created by the contribution of $1.00 per annum to effectually carry out what is best described in the charter granted the B'nai B'rith Benevolent Society in 1859.

"To establish an institution for the support, care and maintenance of persons, who, by reason of old age, sickness or other infirmities, are unable to provide for themselves and also a home for poor widows."

Again in 1878:

"To provide edifice or edifices in which members of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith or any of their families, who through protracted illness, old age or extraordinary occurrences, have become unable to gain a livelihood."

It is justly termed "The Pride of the District", for it has lightened the load and brightened the road of those of its members who through stress of circumstances found it necessary to enter its doors.

ZIONIST MEDICAL UNIT ARRIVES IN PALESTINE

The Zionist Organization of America received a cable on September 3d, announcing the arrival in Palestine of the American Zionist Medical Unit, which departed from this country in June last. Headquarters have been established at Tel-Aviv with branches in Jerusalem and Jaffa. The unit consists of a general director, a medical director, 15 physicians, 15 nurses, a sanitarian, two mechanics, two pharmacists, and a dental staff. Its equipment for 100 bed hospital, ambulatory clinics and dispensaries, $40,000 worth of medical supplies and 33,000 garments for the poor inhabitants of Palestine, is en-route in a British steamer, which was due to arrive at Alexandria, Egypt, on Sept. 1st.

ENGLAND AND THE ROUMANIAN JEWS

Foreign Secretary Balfour's declaration that England will do all she can to obtain a just and lasting solution of the Jewish question in East and Southeast Europe has created a deep impression amongst the Jews of the Central and neutral countries. The Jewish Press in Europe sees in this declaration a new proof of England's friendliness towards the Jews, and it attacks the Central Powers on account of their attitude towards the Jewish question in Roumania. The Neue Lemberger Zeitung writes:

"The prestige of the Central Powers has greatly suffered through the Treaty of Bucharest, which has aroused the anger of the Jews throughout the whole world against them, while England, by her new declaration, has won a great political victory."

ORPHAN ASYLUM DIAMOND JUBILEE

The Cleveland Orphan Asylum was from its inception and is today, in spite of the fact that it holds a separate charter, a B'nai B'rith institution. Its funds in the beginning were derived entirely from dues paid by the members of Districts 2, 6 and 7, I. O. B. B., and voluntary subscriptions and donations of the same men. Later the annual subscriptions and donations became by far the larger part of the asylum's income, but these are in large measure derived from members of the order, although naturally so splendid and deserving an institution receives numerous gifts from non-members. Still, on the whole, the credit for establishing and maintaining the asylum is practically due entirely to the B'nai B'rith Order.—American Israelites.

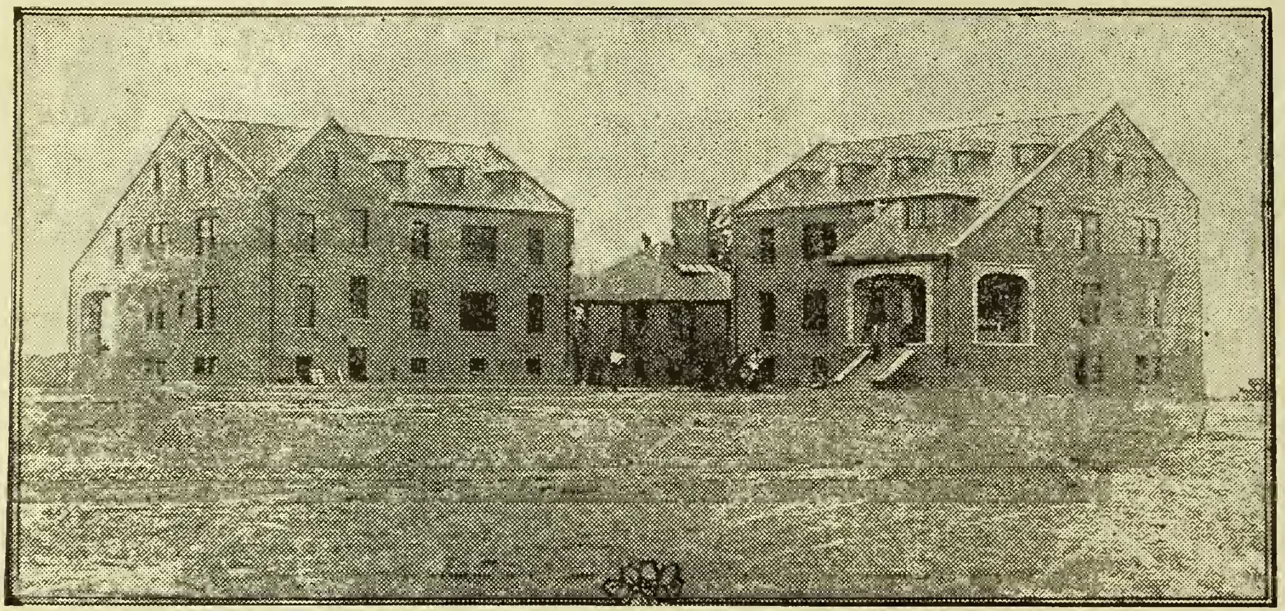
B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless

Children of District No. 3, Erie, Pa.



At the convention of the District Grand Lodge No. 3, I. O. B. B., held in Atlantic City in January, 1908, the Committee on Charities was directed to report to the next convention recommending a permanent charity, and at the Pittsburgh convention in January, 1910, the committee unanimously reported in favor of the establishment of an orphanage and home for friendless children. This report was approved and a committee of five, named as the Site Committee, was appointed to select a location. As a result, Erie, Pa., was selected, subject, however, to the condition that buildings should not be erected until a maintenance fund of $10.000 annually have been guaranteed. In January, 1912, at the convention of the Grand Lodge, held in Atlantic City, the per capita tax of the charity fund of the Grand Lodge was increased to $2 per year, and this tax, together with the guaranteed fund which has already been raised, a maintenance fund of $10,000 a year was at hand. Immediately a charter was applied for, directors elected, by-laws adopted and forty governors named, the Board of Governors to have full charge and control of the institution.

On July 4, 1912, a temporary home was dedicated at Avonia, Pa., ten miles from Erie, and on the day of the opening one boy and two girls were admitted, Miss Nettie Eichenbaum having been selected as the matron.

A Building Committee having been appointed, with Mr. A. J. Sunstein of Pittsburgh as chairman, they selected Mr. Harry Allan Jacobs of New York City to prepare plans for a permanent structure on the cottage basis, and some few months thereafter plans had been accepted and building begun.

The Jewish citizens of Erie, elated over the preference given them by the Site Committee, presented to District Grand Lodge No. 3, I. O. B. B., a farm of ninety-five acres upon which to erect the buildings.

On Aug. 30, 1914, in the presence of more than a thousand visitors from all sections of the district, the permanent buildings were dedicated, the late Rev. Dr. J. Leonard Levy of Pittsburgh delivering the dedication address, but owing to a severe winter and the lack of a supply of water, light and power, the buildings were not occupied until May 27, 1915, when our twenty-seven children who were sheltered in our temporary home moved all their belongings to the new buildings. Since the temporary home was opened we have sheltered sixty-five children, as enumerated, from the following cities; of this number forty-five still remain with us:

Atlantic City, N. J	2
Altoona, Pa	5
Erie, Pa	2
Farrell, Pa	4
Jersey City, N. J	3
Johnstown, Pa	3
Martinsburg, W. Va	4
McKeesport, Pa	2
Paterson, N. J	5
Philadelphia, Pa	2
Pittsburgh, Pa	14
Pittston, Pa	2
Scranton, Pa	2
Trenton, N. J	6
Wheeling, W. Va	4
Wilkes-Barre, Pa	2
Wilmington, Del	2
York, Pa	1

Miss Nettie Eichenbaum, our first matron, who is now matron of the New York Orphan Asylum, was succeeded on Feb. 1, 1916, by Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Krohn, superintendent and matron. This couple remained with us until July 1, 1917, and were succeeded by the present superintendent and matron, Rabbi and Mrs. Jacob B. Pollak of Monroe, La.

Our institution is conducted on a strictly Kosher basis. Many serious problems confronted the Board of Governors during the early stages of the construction of our permanent home owing to the lack of finances for construction purposes, and it is to the credit of the moral responsibility of the Jewish citizens of Erie that a large sum of money was advanced by the Marine National Bank of Erie to enable the buildings to be completed. At the present time a large part of this loan has been paid, and it is hoped that in the near future our institution will be free of debt. In justice to the Board of Governors residing in the City of Erie this article would not be complete if their efforts in behalf of the home was not specially recognized. They have ever been ready and willing to take their places as workers in the interest of the orphan and friendless, for while the Jewish citizens of District No. 3 have a special interest and pride in the home, yet it is for the members of the local board at Erie to shoulder the responsibility and to assume the burden and care of its maintenance and up-keep.

The officers of the Board of Governors are as follows:

Hon. Isador Sobel, Erie, president.

Mr. Max Rothschild, Pittsburgh, vice-president.

Mrs. E. P. Marks, Erie, secretary.

Mr. Isador Simon, Erie, treasurer.

The officers of the board of directors are as follows:

Mr. Morris Schaffner, Erie, president.

Mr. Marcus Feuchtwanger, New Castle, vice-president.

Mr. Isador Simon, Erie, secretary and treasurer.

STATUE OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, FAIRMOUNT PARK, PHILADELPHIA
Presented by the I. O. B. B. to the American People

DID SHAKESPEARE KNOW THE JEW?

An Examination of the Historical Facts and Sources for the Inspiration of the Character of Shylock.

By Milton N. Grass.

Dr. William Furness, than whom no greater Shakespearean scholar has lived, has shown in his Variorum Edition of the Merchant of Venic, that the weight of authority ascribes the date of the production of that classic to the year 1594.

By a decree of Parliament, the Jews were banished entirely from England in 1290. Oliver Cromwell, that great fighter for religious tolerance, appointed a commission on Feb. 20, 1657, to consider the advisability of allowing the Jews to resettle in England and enjoy equal rights with everyone. Between the years of 1290 and 1657, a period of over 350 years, legally, no Jew was allowed to settle or trade in England. It has never been shown or suggested that Shakespeare ever traveled to the Ghettoes of the Continent to secure material for any of his plays. From what sources then did he draw his character of Shylock?

Wherever the drama has flourished Shylock has always been a favorite character for great acting. From the sublime to the ridiculous, from "High-brow" gatherings of Litterati to "Low-brow" burlesque, off-stage and on, the word Jew and Shylock have been almost synonymous terms. Shylock has been interpreted as a villian and a demi-god, a clown and a tragic, much-wronged sufferer, a "low-comedy" part, and a soul inspiring "character lead"; in fact, it has been played in every conceivable and actable mood which the amount of passions could produce.

Shylock, Hamlet and Othello are considered the greatest male characters the Bard of Avon has conceived. Did he draw the character of Shylock entirely from his imagination, did he plagarize or steal it from some other author, or did it, like Topsy, just grow?

There were no professed Jews in England until after 1657, for during the 350 years of their exile the laws concerning this prohibition were religiously observed. In the year 1657, Manasseh ben Israel, a Rabbi of Amsterdam, interceded with Cromwell for the readmission of the Jews. He based his claims on two arguments, first; that England would gain greatly in the volume and prestige of her foreign trade, through the fact that the Jews had commercial connections over the face of the globe. And, second, that before the arrival of the Messiah, whose advent was then being proclaimed, the Jews must be scattered in every portion of the earth, and since they were not allowed in England, the prophecy of the reunion of Judah and the Ten Tribes could not be fulfilled. It being held by the Puritans and Roundheads, that the dispersion and collection of the Jews must first be made, before the arrival of the Messiah.

No act of Parliament was passed at that time, revoking the decrees of 1290. but Manasseh ben Israel was given to understand by Cromwell that they would be allowed to come in, settle and trade, and that they would not be molested. On this basis then, after 1657, they resettled in England, 60 years after the ascribed date of the first production of the Merchant of Venice and Shylock.

There was, however, in England, at the time of Shakespeare, a family of Marranos or secret Jews by the name of Lopez, the head of which, Dr. Lopez, was private physician to Lord Leicester of Essex, and to Elizabeth, Queen of England. With the Earl of Essex he lived on terms of great intimacy, and it was because of this intimacy that Shakespeare must have most certainly become acquainted with him. Dr. Furness says that Lord Leicester frequently summoned to Kenilworth, his home, a number of actors from the neighboring town of Stratford. They were called the "Earl of Leicester's Company of servants and players". To this company Shakespeare belonged throughout his career.

Dr. Lopez, who never practiced his Judaism, in 1592 became involved in a court intrigue with a certain Antonio Perez, a pretender to the crown of Portugal, and the Lord of Essex. Lopez was arrested, incarcerated in the Tower, found guilty of treason, and condemned to death by hanging. At the trial his Jewish ancestry was brought forth, and he was taunted with being a Judas, a "Jew," and every imaginable vile epithet in the dictionary of race hatred. His hanging created a great sensation, and pamphlets were printed and distributed covering every phase of his execution.

Since he was the physician of the Earl of Leicester at the same time as Shakespeare, there is no doubt that they were acquainted with each other. Dr. Lopez

FIFTH ARTICLE.

Historical Unity—An Encouraging Word to the Jewish World.

I am coming to the conclusion: we have three self-conscious parties for the revival of which we know the ways and means; an unknown part also must be taken in consideration, for which it is difficult to find a remedy; I will call it "erev rav", "a mixed multitude", or "melting-groups", which have no definite direction, which are mostly found in the ranks of the money and intelligence aristocracy; they do not want to go with the people and have not the courage to refuse openly; they think that they are able to force us to follow them. They have influence in the high circles; there they declare themselves as leaders of the people, not as deserters; they play the part of false prophets who are impelled not by the spirit of the people but by selfish motives.

When we will be united, then we will have the power to stand up against them; we must declare to the whole world that we reckon little with individual caprices; the will of the people of Israel is firm and cannot be shaken; the power of treachery cannot break us; we must stand in closed ranks and start with a lively pace.

We must take the world mechanism as an example how to begin our movement. Our globe moves in a double direction; it completes a daily circulation; at the same time, it also makes a broad extensive annual circuit. The course of the nations goes the same way.

In the daily life we are more or less organized; we must continue the usual course of development.

In the historical life we have for a long time remained behind; we must now begin to make our appearance upon the historical stage; for this purpose we must be well organized. We must unite all the parts of our people's body. All the three parties represent in themselves the heart, the body and the brain of society.

Even in our ideal strivings we can work in harmony of union; we must begin a living movement.

The answer to the question, "Who are they that shall go"? is fixed. "Young and old", without exception. The young generation comprises the "advance guard", the old generation our arrierguard; both together stand in firm connection; we move from different directions towards one trysting place.

I imagine it to be according to military order: a voluntary army shall be established, the religionists are our infantry, the nationalists our cavalry; finally, the radicals represent our heavy artillery. Altogether we form a corps, then we begin our maneuvers; we must break down the iron wall, the rocky fort of gross materialism, and come nearer to our goal, so we can begin our historical progress.

According to the order of our general staff, which reads: "Not by military might, nor by physical force, but by the divine moral spirit", we have one command only.

We have no modern ammunition nor the latest howitzers, but we can name forces in the world of our antiquities which are mightier than all the destructive powers; they are named "clean hands and a pure heart"; with these howitzers we will take "Mount Zion" by storm.

We must strengthen and encourage each other and begin our historical line of march.

SIXTH ARTICLE.

An Appeal to the Nations of the World.

A twofold tragedy is being played upon the world stage. With the general tragedy you are in some measure acquainted, but do you know the condition of the inner tragedy, which shows its reflection upon the entire globe?

For thousands of years we have suffered persecutions for the sake of our faith, for our particular moral doctrine; now we are exposed to the danger of becoming totally annihilated. The nations are fighting each other; between both fires our race is condemned to be consumed.

The martial nations suffer in consequence of their Chauvinistic cult; we are a peace-inclined people; we have higher moral conceptions; why do they force us to commit acts of murder?

We are forced to murder our own brethren who are perfectly innocent in this bloody catastrophe. The German Jew knows the sufferings of his brethren who are on Russian soil; the Russian Jew knows how to esteem the intelligence of his German coreligionists; why are we compelled to commit such brutal fratricide? We are forced to help with our own hands to destroy our best youthful forces; surely man's conscience is turned to stone.

We can justly demand: Let our people alone; the children of Israel must not be destroyed; it is neither their gain nor your advantage; you yourself can profit little by it.

It is time you should look around you. The Greek-Roman cultures brought little help to humanity. The superficial modern civilization cannot lead it to happiness.

The world is lacking the inner civilization which can be found in the archives of the ancient "Zion classics" and in the bearers of their culture.

It is not necessary for you to dig up art works of stone in the lap of the earth; we can show you monuments which were buried alive; in the trenches of the battlefields you can find them; you should place them upon their historical ground to continue the cultural work of their forefathers—the historical Israelites.

You see mistakes in us; this is the dust of the goluth, the influence of the environment, there, upon our historical soil, we will be healed of the contagious bacilli with which humanity is infested; there we will make ourselves useful to the whole world, when we will be given a place for free development.

The martial nations are blood intoxicated; we doubt whether they will listen to our voice. We must turn to the neutrals; they shall come to our help.

If it is possible that the fighting sides shall consent to peace, then our rights, the material as well as the moral, shall be recognized.

In case they will continue their aimless battles, then to our children shall be given "cities of refuge" upon the land of our fathers; they shall be permitted to be free to serve their God by peaceful undertakings and not by works of destruction.

We demand liberty of conscience, not in the narrow circle of religious ceremony; we wish to have it in a wider form; a possibility should be given to us to develop freely the peaceful forces of our people; our ideal strivings should also have a free course of development.

We should have a possibility to realize the ideals of our sublime prophets, to tread out a way of peace for all civilized mankind, there in the place of our past, also of our historical rebirth.

Zion demands the return of her children; will humanity come to our help?

I distinguish two directions for all humanity—the idolatrous and the Jewish.

The nobler parts of humanity, who are Jews in spirit, will answer our appeal which we make in the name of our liberator, in the name of the God of Israel.

CONCLUDING WORD AND A BUSINESSLIKE EXPLANATION.

The Establishment of an Organization for the Realization of Our Historical Model Colonization.

I will now talk with you in a business way. Others will be displeased with me; they are too much occupied with other business. Why do I disturb them in their rush? For this reason: I must explain to you that I will only give you warning in the right time.

I will call your attention to the fact that you are riding with too much haste in the political chariot; you also depend too much upon your mail-coated automobiles.

I will advise you: pull in the lines of your overheated carriers, stop the steam of your too swiftly racing machine, that it shall not miscarry you too far.

There have been times when the synagogue sexton waked you to selihot (penitential prayers); you did not pay much attention to him and you very quietly continued your slumber.

Now the sexton of history is waking you; as deaf as you are you must hear the hard knocks. Do you not wish to wake up before the fire surrounds you?

The historical stiff-neck has been tolerated up to a certain time; the "day of judgment" is coming which will close up the accounts with you: either you will bend to the higher will, which demands of you creative historical work, or you will all be destroyed, therefore find good counsel as long as it is not too late.

It is not my object to read a moral lesson to you; to pour water upon your faint souls, while you sink swooning to the ground. I only wish to advise you to strengthen yourself and open the eyes to see what can be done for the deliverance of us all.

It is my duty to say to you a word of warning and to point out to you the way which can bring nearer our common help.

We must exert ourselves and see to it that the best forces that we have shall be gathered so that we can break through a new way.

The Organization of a Peace League and the Formation of a Financial Institution.

At present we need two things: a moral-psychological instrument, a society of youths shall be founded of traditional peace idealists, who shall hold high our flag and go in front of the people; they shall look for a uniting middle way between the extremes and find a settlement between them.

And in the second place, a historical experiment fund must be created, or a "treasury", a kind of a financial ministry in our Jewish government machinery which shall form the foundation and create the uniting material substance for our future historical structure.

The treatment of the first we will leave for later. I will first consider the real corporation; first, because I do not think much of a soul without a body here on earth; second, we must make a test to see how it stands with your historical willingness to bring sacrifices.

I give you credit: you are charitably inclined, ready to establish benevolent institutions in goluth which are pouring flour into a sack full of holes, but do not possess the power to elevate the people, so that our name shall be appreciated.

You are also used to pour empty ears of grain into the political millstones which fabricate enough wind.

But are you also willing to bring grains of corn which shall produce nutricious food? Ciphers you have created more than enough, are you also ready to furnish historical numbers which stand for some round sum?

A new leaf must be opened in our historical account book. Let everyone of you place his figure; we will add up and draw the last line on the debit and credit side of your own handwriting, then we will know the correctness of the account.

Do not make fools of yourself with child's play. Either you do some positive, honorable and grand work or you will fall singly in the desert. Your fate is in your own hand.

It only remains for me to wish that everyone should try for himself to enlarge his own as well as the general credit and to bring nearer the help by free willingness to make sacrifices.

I have yet to state now how desirable it would be that the material apparatus be arranged.

The Treasury or Historical Experiment Fund.

It is necessary that a double financial institution be founded: an aristocratic grounders' fund, participated in by the higher intelligence, which shall have the function to finance the undertaking and to work out the technical and mechanical basis of it.

In the second place, we must have a popular fund, which shall be raised in the form of shares for small amounts, say of five dollars each, which could be paid off in small payments during one or two years' time, so that the poorer people shall have access to it, which shall have the function to furnish the men material with the necessary knowledge and working ability.

These two corporations shall mutually complete each other. The first will contribute higher sums with more intelligent readiness to bring sacrifices; the other more talent, physical force and earnest desire to work.

It shall be arranged in the following manner: Each one or two hundred shareholders shall have the right to send their man, as a pioneer-delegate, who shall be elected by ballot under such a rule that those who do not wish or have not the ability to go to work there shall surrender their right to the group which shall pay them for it a certain sum as indemnity, which amount shall be covered by the person who will be elected to this place.

This means to say, that the poorer classes who risk a few dollars in this undertaking shall have a prospect to cover their loss with a tenfold profit.

This is the best means to attract the people to this undertaking, where everybody shall know that he can find reward for a good deed not only in heaven, in the other world, but also here, in this terrestrial world, and can see with living eyes the fruit of his noble work; then the people will not run away from us but return to us from all sides.

In such a manner we can bring out the best we have and an organized ideal-economic army can be formed which shall be able to do historical work.

If we wish to rebuild the land of our fathers, which was devastated by inner forces of destruction, it is possible in no other way than in the way of inner peace and free action.

The Guardian of Israel has not yet lost the creditability; all we have to see to is that we ourselves shall not remain behind; that we begin to pay our debt voluntarily and our work will be crowned with success. For this I can give you the best assurance.

In the name of the God of our fathers, this is positively the safest guaranty.

APPENDIX.

Businesslike Political Position and Demands for Freedom.

One who was once our field marshal gave utterance to the following call: "Let us prove strong for our people and for the cities of our God." Inspired by this call an inhabitant of Chicago expressed the wish in public that a Jewish expedition shall be formed under the direction of an American staff, which shall be sent to Palestine to help in the conquest of our independence.

Although it is yet premature to talk about it, for we are just passing through the period of preparedness, and it must take time until we will know clearly what we have to do, yet from this it is evident that the thought is beginning to mature in our midst that something must be done on our own initiative.

In reality, when we contemplate the position more thoroughly, we see plainly that with the entrance of America into the midst of the conflict of the nations, we will be forced to take part in the fight whether we want to or not.

And so the question appears: Why shall we not exercise our influence and energy for the purpose that something positive shall be done for the safety and future of our people?

We must take time to reflect what stand we shall take in respect to the general position as well as regarding the fate of our historical land.

We must consider the fact that America is not interested in the conquest plans of any land; she is supported exclusively by idealistic principles; this fact is also our limitation; we, too, must reckon less with our own material but more with general ideal requirements.

The same stand which the general American nation is taking concerning the safety of the international rights of nations, it is also the duty of the American citizens of the Jewish faith and race to assume and to take care that like that, just as the general international rights of the nations, the general international rights of the Jews shall also be secured I do not mean to separate these ideas, but to complete them in the fullest sense.

We can foresee the end of the general strife: the final fate of the present battle of the nations will not be according to the weight of the cannons, but more so according to importance of the principles of justice which are being defended.

When our just demands will be supported, it will increase the credit of the American people, thereby also assure the general victory.

It is therefore our moral brotherly and general human duty to speak out boldly in public about the demands which the Jewish people in general is justified in presenting.

Palestine shall be placed under the protectorate of the United States. This is satisfactory to us. All our brethren can have more confidence in America than in the European powers.

All we have to see to is, that this shall be realized; that no changes shall take place regarding it.

In regard to the conquest plans of Palestine, we should make the proposition that a chance should be given to us to purchase our honor by independent activity. We do not want to obtain it gratuitously, as a present, but we wish to earn it through an honorable combat.

It can be formulated in the following manner: In the multitudes of the allies our brethren, single members of our people, lose themselves; our existence is not noticeable. As a whole living organism our honor suffers by it; up to now we made no claims; we have not expressed the wish for independent action; we have considered exclusively our duties to the countries where we find ourselves separately.

Now it is a question of our future

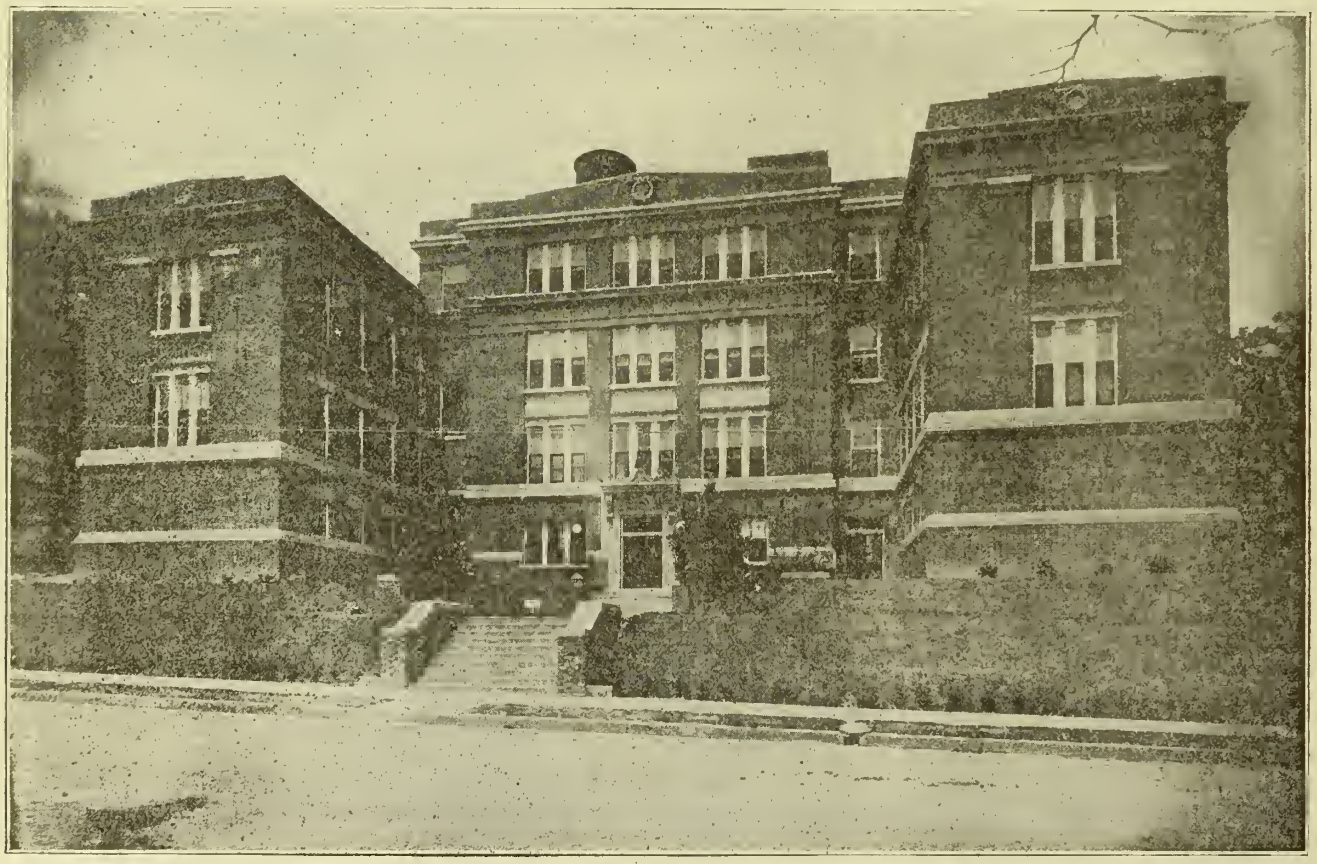
The Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital

Hot Springs, Arkansas

By Rabbi A. B. Rhine

The picturesque city of Hot Springs, in Arkansas, derives its name from the thirty-five hot springs that bubble up from the depths of the earth, and are concentrated within a space of about a half a mile. These hot springs have acquired a wide fame for their therapeutic properties, and attract thousands of health seekers from every part of the country. It is not my intention to advertise the hot springs in this article, or to extol their therapeutic properties. Suffice it to say that thousands of people are firmly convinced of the efficacy of these waters, and are attracted by them in such numbers as to support a resident population of 15,000 that derives its maintenance from the patronage of the visiting public. That the hot springs are actually beneficial in the treatment of certain diseases is attested to by many reliable physicians, and by the United States government, which owns the hot springs and maintains an army and navy hospital on its reservation, which includes all the hot springs.

I am speaking of Hot Springs as a health resort. While it is true that many visitors come to Hot Springs in search of recreation and, in winter, to escape the rigorous northern climate, the great majority of the visitors are health-seekers. Now, it is inevitable that among thousands of well-to-do and self-supporting health-seekers there should be a large number of poor who are in need of assistance. In their despair at their failing health, and in their eagerness to seek a cure, hundreds of poor sick, and I am speaking here of the Jewish poor, will leave their homes with little or no means, manage to obtain railroad fare in one way or another and arrive in Hot Springs in utter destitution and often in a state of physical helplessness.



Now, to provide for the sick poor that were stranded in Hot Springs was a problem that confronted the small Jewish community of Hot Springs for many years. At first this community tried to solve the problem locally; that is, by shouldering the entire burden, and by taxing its members for the relief of many strangers within their gates. As the number of these stranded poor increased, and it became absolutely impossible to care for them at the expense of the local community, District Grand Lodge No. 7, with characteristic B'nai B'rith eagerness for new fields of usefulness, appointed a Hot Springs Disbursement Committee (1904) to handle this problem, placed some of its own funds at the disposal of the committee, and authorized it to raise other funds in the name of the district. This committee continued its activities for about eight years, and took care of upward of a thousand cases, 60 per cent of whom were entirely cured, and the balance, with very few exceptions, were benefited more or less. The best physicians of Hot Springs usually placed their professional services at the disposal of the committee, and the bathhouse managers frequently issued bath tickets at the request of the committee. The result was that the committee obtained splendid results at a very low cost per patient.

Despite the results accomplished by the Hot Springs Disbursement Committee, those closely in touch with the work realized that, in order to do full justice to the sick poor who have to receive the hot water treatment, a hospital was an absolute necessity. The unsanitary condition of the cheaper boarding houses, the lack of proper nursing, the total absence of supervision of the conduct and diet of the patient, often nullified the effects of the treatment. Moreover, it was ascertained through inquiry that there were hundreds of cases of deserving poor sick who would gladly be sent to Hot Springs by various Jewish charity organizations, and thus restored to health and usefulness, if there were only an institution in Hot Springs that would give them the proper care.

Prompted by these considerations of still greater services to humanity, District Grand Lodge No. 7, with the approval of the Constitution Grand Lodge (1910), authorized the organization of the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital Association, whose object it was to build a charity hospital in Hot Springs. The name of Leo N. Levi, the peerless leader of the B. B., who was a son of District No. 7, it was felt, should be properly linked with an institution established by the B'nai B'rith, upon the initiative of District No. 7, in which he spent the greater part of his life. This association was incorporated in 1910, and, as a result of the indefatigable labors of Mr. Emil Nathan of St. Louis, a fund of $70,000 was raised within two years, and the erection of the hospital was begun in March, 1912. The building was completed early in 1914, and opened its doors for the reception of patients Nov. 1, 1914.

That the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital supplied a long felt need is proven by the fact that in the less than four years since the hospital was opened it took care of 810 patients, 577 in the hospital and 233 in the clinic, opened Jan. 1, 1918. These patients come from all parts of the country, a large proportion of them were cured, and the majority were benefited by their treatment in the institution. Some cures accomplished are striking. I am quoting the following from an article prepared by Dr. J. B. Goodsen, medical director of the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital:

"As an example of the true benefit coming from the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital, a charitable institution maintained by the B'nai B'rith at Hot Springs, Ark., the following case is cited. For obvious reasons the true names are not given, but nevertheless this is an actual case and a part of the hospital records.

"This concerns Esther S. Her father and mother, emigrants from Russia, chose to make their home in Chicago, and it was there that Esther and her brother Samuel were born. Their family life and struggles were a typical and familiar American picture, only fully appreciated by those who have gone through the same vicissitudes. While Esther and Sam were still young the hand of death deprived them of their father's assistance, but the mother courageously carried on the struggle, bringing the children to an age where they could by their labors maintain the little family. Esther, seventeen years of age, had ambitiously made of herself a stenographer, while Sam, now twenty, was engaged in a large mercantile house. The little family of three seemed to have weathered the early storms, and to be in a fair way to comfort and happiness.

"But now came misfortune, which meant privation and sacrifice, unwelcome associates. It was Esther—rheumatism, the doctors said. A high fever and intense illness, subsiding finally only to leave Esther bedridden, with stiff, enlarged and painful joints. The neighborhood physician did all he could, but Esther did not improve. The small savings were soon consumed, and Sam with filial devotion turned in his all to help as best he could.

"Kind friends made possible Esther's stay at a large metropolitan hospital under the care of the city's best specialists. Sometimes she seemed to improve slightly, and then discouragingly fell back to her seemingly hopeless state. All that could be possibly done was of no avail, and Esther was returned home, a burden of sacrifice to her mother and Sam.

"It was at this time that her case came to the attention of the Jewish Aid Society. It was they who arranged for her admission to the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital at Hot Springs, Ark. Hopeless as her case seemed, they wished to offer her even that which remotely gave promise of benefit.

"Esther made the journey on a stretcher, accompanied by her mother, and Sam's earnings were sufficient to maintain the mother in Hot Springs while Esther was in the hospital. The nurses were many times touched by the girl's uncontrollable tears, brought on by the realization of her helplessness, but soon these tears became less frequent—the hospital doctors counseled the best use of the waters, and notice of even light improvement in one joint turned the tears of despair to a smile of hopefulness. It was a proud Esther who one day stood on her weakened limbs, even though it were but a moment—then a step or two with assistance. Farther along Esther could manage quite well ith crutches.

"Esther came to Hot Springs in September. The nurses waved her a good-by in February as she walked to the depot with her mother, carrying her own grip. The emaciated, hollow-eyed little patient, who had come in on a stretcher, left with health and strength, a sparkle in her eyes and the bloom of youth that lighted her pretty face. Left the hospital to go back to her work in the offices she had left over a year before, and to complete a family circle that it is hoped will not again be blighted".

The following statement has been officially accepted by the Medical Board and Board of Managers of the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital as an authentic report of conditions most benefited by Hot Springs treatment:

"Experience and careful observation have shown that the beneficial effects of the natural thermal waters of Hot Springs, Ark., are due in all probability to their action on metabolism and elimination, and that the medical conditions most benefited are those in which the disturbance is due to a toxemia either of bacterial or metabolic origin.

"Under the first heading may be classed the infectious diseases (rheumatic) (both gonorrhoeal and acute articular), syphilis and malaria. The second group includes gout and chronic arthritis, neuralgia, all forms of emphritis, chronic skin diseases, especially the squamous varieties, and chronic cardio-vasculo renal disease, with increased arterial tension.

"Benefits may also be expected in anemia and other diseases of the blood and blood-forming organs, diseases of the ductless glands and catarrhal conditions of the gall bladder, bile passages and gasto-intestinal tract.

"The baths are distinctly of no value in all forms of tuberculosis and malignant neoplasma."

"Admission to the hospital of all the above mentioned cases, regardless of their severity, is not, however, contemplated. Its facilities will not be extended to mild and transient cases which would yield to ordinary ambulatory treatment, but are reserved for those of a serious and obstinate character, which, though resisting ordinary methods of relief, promise a rapid and permanent recovery from the use of the waters of Hot Springs".

The facilities of the hospital are open to every lodge, and every lodge is urged to take advantage of them. Application blanks may be obtained from the secretary. The hospital is growing in usefulness year by year. With the cooperation of the B'nai B'rith lodges of the country there is every reason to expect that the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital will become one of the greatest national philanthropic institutions ever fathered by our beloved Order.

SPIRITUAL RESULTS.

If towns continue to respond in this spirit, the $15,000,000 for War Relief and the $2,000,000 for the Jewish Welfare Board—the goal of the committee—are assured. But that is not the only, nor perhaps the chief, achievement. Prejudicial barriers cannot resist such onslaughts. It is a well-known psychological fact that we develop affection for those whom we help. Everywhere a new and unprecedented harmony has sprung out of the drive for Jewish War Relief. While the campaigns are saving those who are destitute, while they are developing a more unselfish character in the American Jew, perhaps their most permanent contribution is that in the direction of greater tolerance and cooperation. There can be no doubt that the rest of the year will see this significant work gather increased impetus with new campaigns in the cities where drives are still to be made.

PRESIDENTS I HAVE KNOWN FROM 1860-1918.

A New Volume by Simon Wolf.

Mr. Simon Wolf again exemplifies the truth that the righteous bring forth fruit in old age. On passing the fourscore mark this veteran champion of Jewish rights looked back upon his rich experience of the past sixty years in affairs of national and international importance, and produced an instructive and delightful book, under the title "Presidents I Have Known". His recollections were first printed in the American Hebrew, New York. They appear in this volume considerably enlarged and supplied with authentic documents.

In the course of his long residence in Washington, and particularly in his capacity as representative of the Board of Delegates of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, of the B'nai B'rith and other organizations, Mr. Wolf came to know the successive Presidents of the United States from Lincoln to Wilson. Of the skill with which he relates his experiences, Justice Wendell Phillips Stafford has this to say, in the foreword to the book:

"You will find here a large company of distinguished people aside from the Presidents themselves, whom you are especially invited to meet. You will find yourself refreshing your recollection of a great period in American history. You will get many glimpses of what was going on behind the scenes in Washington. You will listen to delightful stories. You will be touched by pathetic incidents. You will be moved to laughter and perhaps to tears. You will see the anxious face of Buchanan, the haggard, far-away look of Lincoln; the narrow, self-willed expression of Johnson; the imperturbable demeanor of Grant; the gracious personality of Hayes; the large, magnetic presence of Garfield; the courtly bearing of Arthur; the indomitable figure of Cleveland; the cold self-possession of Harrison ;the winning smile of McKinley; the restless and virile movements of Roosevelt; the massive form and bland good fellowship of Taft, and accomplished ease and dignity of Wilson. You will find yourself present at many interesting meetings, where your presence will not hinder the free disclosure of personal traits in these and other noted characters of the time, and as you move through the changing scenes you will come to have a warm admiration for your conductor—so witty, so ffull of intelligence and kindly human interest, so frank and engaging in his revelation of himself and his activities, so devoted to the welfare of the people, so indefatigable in his efforts, so eloquent in his appeals, so broad in his sympathies, so unqualifiedly American in all he does and says."

This book, while of general importance to the student of American history, is of particular value to the Jewish reader, inasmuch as it presents the inside story of many important events in American Jewish life. In his preface Mr. Wolf writes:

"Especially marked among these recollections are those of the Roumanian Mission; the famous Kishineff petition, the preventing of more than one hundred thousand worthy immigrants from being deported, and the continued struggle against the enactment of the literary test for immigration which ended, for the time being, in the passage of that absurd piece of legislation over its third presidential veto in February, 1917; the Statue of Religious Liberty erected in Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, under the auspices of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith; the many years of agitation for the validation of the passports of American Jews in Russia, which culminated in the abrogation of our discredited treaty with the Czardom in 1912 the malicious slurs on the Jewish people as having shown a lack of patriotism and courage during our Civil War, set in circulation from time to time after its close, which impelled me to the publication of my book, 'The American Jew as Patriot, Soldier and Citizen', in refutation of that calumny in 1895, and various other episodes of a like nature".

A chapter on "Humorous Incidents" at the end of the book contains several good laughs. The book is printed in bold and clear type, on heavy paper, and contains a large number of illustrations. It forms a valuable addition to American Jewish history, and should find a hearty welcome in every Jewish home.

WILLIAM H. TAFT,
New Haven, Conn.
Pointe-a-Pic, P. Q., Canada,

Aug. 13, 1918.

My Dear Mr. Wolf:

I thank you for sending me your book on "The Presidents I Have Known." It is full of most interesting matter. Your personal experiences with the presidents whom you have known will, I am sure, be of great usefulness to the historian. The correspondence which you publish reflects much light on the struggle of the Jewish people against religious prejudices. It is one thing to grant in a constitution, and in the forms of law, the fullest recognition of religious freedom, and it is another thing to achieve complete equality of opportunity in the political, social and business fields of activity, unobstructed by traditional reeligious prejudice. You have been on guard for your people in Washington through many administrations, and it must be a source of greatest satisfaction to you to realize how much you have accomplished in bringing to the attention of the presidents whom you have known instances of official discrimination based on religious bigotry and racial prejudice, which the presidents thus informed have been able to condemn and remedy. I felicitate you on this work which you have completed after you have passed your eightieth milestone.

With the hope that you may continue to enjoy your green, useful and graceful old age for many years, believe me,

Sincerely yours,

WM. H. TAFT.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF A PROLETARIAN.

honor, where it reaches the gates of our former residence, we cannot be indifferent to the situation; the fate of our historical center is near to our heart; we must consider our duty which we owe to our God, to our people and to our Holy Land; so we must be bold to come out with demands for freedom.

We wish to be active, not as fragments among the groups of nations, but as a united living people we want to participate in the struggle for our honor and historical independence.

We have a right to express our demand that a special Jewish army be formed with its own officers. Also with its own chief commander, who shall stand under the order of the American war staff. In this way shall we begin our military operations in Palestine.

The first thing we will demand of Russia will be that all our brethren who are in her camps shall be sent to the borders of Palestine; the same thing we will demand of France, Italy, etc., that they shall also send out all their private soldiers and officers who are Jews to the same rallying point, so we will have a sufficient number of common fighters and the officers whom we need. Such main men like "Captain Dreyfuss", who are in the lines of the allies, will be able to lead our legions to brilliant victory.

In such manner we take a voluntary part in it, which means, not as slaves, as blind tools in the hands of others, but as free, independent Jews shall we participate in the fight for the conquest of our Holy Land.

When this shall take place, the government in Washington will no doubt aid us in it; then we will earnestly consider the proposition that an expedition of our volunteer brethren in America shall be formed under the direction of the American war staff, which shall be sent to Palestine to assist there in our general fight for honor.

There still remains the possibility that Palestine shall be occupied before, or that the Turks will evacuate it of their own free will; in this case, our troops shall take possession of the country in order to preserve the neutrality.

Our independence must at all events be defended.

Thus we have high problems before us, which with the help of God and of the United States we are in a position to solve practically if we are only firmly determined to do it.

I will close my arguments. The above quoted valiant call of our former hero, who, by the way, was the first to ascend the "Zion Tower", will fully fit our condition and be in the right place when we will have before our eyes our living historical fighters.

For the present we still have a previous problem before us—we must arouse the people and wake them from their historical sleep.

We must come to our brethren with the word of God: "Consider your ways; is it a time for you yourselves to dwell in your ceiled houses, while this house lieth waste"? "Ye looked for much, and lo, it came to little, etc." Why? Because of My house that lieth waste while ye run every man for his own house. (Haggai I:4,5,9.)

I have for you one advice only: Open the eyes, do not be blind; see the historical reality; open the ears, be not deaf, hear the divine voice of the prophets and finally you will feel the inner coherence with the infinite and reach the perfect unedrstanding, then the position which we must occupy in the historical service will become clear to you; not the blind gods of nature or natural forces shall reign over you; you shall walk in the light of the Jews and you shall be guided by the Allhighest living historical moral force.

The God of Israel will take you under His protection when you will fulfill His wish.

An Explicit Preliminary Condition.

But it does not go so quickly; we still have hard problems before us. Political freedom alone is not able to secure our existence; we must first secure the inner moral freedom.

God takes care of the external goluth; we must only assist Him in His work. From the inner goluth we alone must free ourselves, which means to say that we are in need of both a moral and political movement for freedom.

The hour of the historical "return unto Zion", the return of Israel to the God of his fathers, has struck; the divine voice calls unto you: "Return unto Me and I will return unto you".

If you are willing to take the first steps towards it, then give a practical answer.

ENTERTAINMENT FOR SOLDIERS BY B'NAI B'RITH OF TACOMA

On Saturday evening, July 7, 1918, the happy crowd of soldiers who attended the strawberry festival given at the B'nai B'rith Club House enjoyed once more the real home atmosphere. The program included a dance and serving of refreshments. which were much enjoyed by the boys in the service.

On Tuesday, July 2, 1918, Dr. Nathan Fasten, of the University of Washington, was the principal speaker on the program. His talk was followed by a discussion which proved of much interest to all. A splendid musical program was also rendered.

Every Saturday evening a dance and entertainment is being arranged at the B'nai B'rith Club House in Tacoma for the benefit of the soldiers.

JEWISH WELFARE BOARD, U. S. ARMY AND NAVY

Furloughs for the Holidays will be granted to men of Jewish faith, according to a letter which the Jewish Welfare Board has received from the Third Assistant Secretary of War. The following order has been sent to all Department and Division Commanders and Commanding Generals of the Philippines, Porto Rico, Panama, and also to the Commanding General, American Expeditionary Force:

"The Secretary of War desires that furloughs be granted to members of the Jewish faith for the New Year from noon, Sept. 6, to the morning of Sept. 9, and for the Day of Atonement from noon, Sept. 14, to the morning of Sept. 17, if it does not interfere with the public service. If military necessity prevents the granting of furloughs, provision should be made for them to hold divine services wherever possible on the days mentioned.

"(Signed) E. P. KEPPEL,
"Third Assistant Secretary of War".

AMBITION.

majority of his countrymen had doomed him, a number of his disciples endeavored to persuade him to escape. He refused. During all this period, the master taught loyalty to the state. Not covetousness, nor self, but to elevate the youth of Greece, was his ideal.

Washington must have been ambitious, else he could not have achieved what he did—attain so much fame and glory and ultimately become the first president of the New Republic. His aspiration was, however, tempered with self-control. After setting the colonies free from English rule, and becoming the most popular and the most exalted personage among his countrymen, he might have assumed royalty, secured for himself and successors a crown, a throne, and become "The George I" of the new nation. But, like Moses—his prototype as liberator—Washington scorned royalty and title. He was, as Edward Everett Hale puts it, "The magistrate who knew no glory but his country's good". Even as president, he voluntarily declined the nomination for a third term. Worker, yes; benefactor, also; but any spurious yearning, no. The title of "Father of the Republic" is certainly more glorious than that of despot, autocrat, Caesar, Czar, Sultan, Kaiser or King.

Lincoln was truly ambitious. From obscurity, poverty and ignorance, he rose to the highest office in the gift of the people. Like all benefactors of the race, he was master of himself. The dynamic propulsion in his great career was expressed in New Orleans when, at the age of twenty, as a flatboat hand, he observed how negroes were sold on the auction block to the highest bidder, the humanitarian youth expressed the ambition of his life: "If I ever get into power, I will hit this evil good and hard". The love for mankind resided in his breast; love for others and social guidance determined his ambition. Some time after his election to the presidency, Lincoln said to Speed, his oldest friend: "Speed, die when I may, I want it said of me by those who knew me best, that I always plucked a thistle and planted a flower, when I thought a flower would grow."

Lincoln could have compromised with principle to satisfy a selfish ambition—as others have done—and lived the allotted span of life, instead of dying untimely a martyr's death. But, like Moses and Socrates, his aspiration was to live—if necessary, to die—for humanity's sake. Like a skilled physician, the erudite lawyer, or the born teacher, strives for the social good of others, so the real ambitious hero lives and struggles for the benefit of his fellow men.

Who were humanity's great men: Alexander, Caesar, Napoleon and Arnold on one side, or Moses, Socrates, Washington and Lincoln on the other? Whom would you hold up before the youth as worthy examples, the first or the second group?

Honor to those whose words and deeds,
Thus help us in our daily needs,
And by their overflow,
Raise us from what is low.

Longfellow.

IV

The Jew, during his long and unexcelled career, has been extremely ambitious. His leaders, judges, lawgivers, prophets, scribes, bards, sages and merchants were all aspiring. Notwithstanding what the anti-Semite says that the Jew craves wealth, this same enemy is compelled to admit for the obvious reason, as experience and open records prove it, that he is the most charitably inclined. Says John W. Mead, former governor of Vermont: "Learn from the Jew charity; learn from him brotherly love. . . . It is my firm opinion that the Jew comes much nearer the Christian to living the Golden Rule. . . . I know of no race of people so charitable as the Jews". Mammon was a Gentile deity—although idealized among all peoples, in all climes and by all tongues. The Jew's dynamic propulsion has been to serve mankind. to assist the struggling world upward to God and onward in the march for social justice. The Bible, the Decalogue, the Psalms, the Golden Rule, yea, the God idea, are but the symbols of his readiness to serve; they are Israel's gift to the nations through which he yearned to serve them and thus to save them.

Two works of fiction will illustrate our philosophy of life. In her story, Mrs. Shelley depicts Frankenstein, a student of anatomy and other branches of science who resolves to collect material in dissecting rooms and churchyards, thus artificially creating a human being. Then the student breathes into it the breath of life. But the monster so created develops into a being of gigantic powers and so hideous and ugly, that none would associate with or tolerate him. To the surprise and disgust of Frankenstein, the monster so plagues him, first killing his best friend, then his baby brother, and finally his bride on his wedding day, that his life became unbearable. As there was no other motive for its being than the creator's mad ambition, the creature mastered the creator, the fiend tortured the scientist. Even so, spurious ambition masters and plagues all who project it. Little wonder that the title "Frankenstein" has come to be associated with unholy ambition, that slays the spurious aspirant.

On the other hand, in his short story, "The Great Stone Face," Hawthorne tells us of an image of a stone face carved by nature in a mountain. There was a tradition, that somewhere in the neighborhood one would be born, whose countenance in manhood would bear an exact resemblance to the Great Stone Face, and who is destined to become the greatest and noblest personage of his time. Of all youths, Ernest alone, resolved to lead such a pure, unselfish, helpful life, that he might be worthy to meet the great man. At last, after following many false models, capitalist, soldier, statesman, finally a poet, the villagers realized that this same Ernest who so lived, as to be worthy of association with the expected prophet, really resembled the Great Stone Face. Living a life of self denial, and not of selfishness, Ernest's ambition was the greatness of purity, of social service, and of sacrifice—a benefactor to the race.

To return to our text. The Rabbis in imagery and in the language of the parable meant to convey to us the lesson that history and experience convey. The moon came before the Creator with the plaint that it was not meet for two luminous bodies to be identical in splendor and dimensions. The Queen of the Night thus intimated that she deserved promotion. Prompted by inordinate ambition, she received the rebuke: "Descend then and be the lesser". Spurious aspiration deprives one of even the good qualities he or she possesses. The lesson is as old as the Creation itself: "Inordinate ambition leads to self destruction".

What a chasm yawns between the voluntary sacrifice of his life in triumphant martyrdom for humanity—for an ideal, and the reckless subordination of every higher good, for self—for material gain! There is more true glory in one homely act of self denial, in one deed of thoughtful kindness, in one moment of patient serving of another, than in all dominion, command and mastery. It is not, then, the high and lofty place that is necessary; the exalted and elevated position that is required; nor the coveted or envied station that is indispensable. Rather, is it the magnanimous service and generous helpfulness, sweet and loving kindness that signalizes one's position and station in life.

To sum up: Ambition is a natural tendency. Striving tends toward achievement. All improvement, political, social, economic, scientific, and religious are the resultant of this irresistible yearning.

However, ambition has a dark side, fatal and harmful. Spurious longing leads to excesses. Human existence is an enigma. "One must be either hammer or anvil", says Nietzche. Life is a strange combination of material and spiritual. Noble and ignoble ambition generally struggle for mastery. Man is a dualism—a composite of these mutually exclusive and conflicting inclinations. History and experience adduce illuminating examples of varied achievements, attained by those of the one or other tendency. The line of demarcation is self-control; the dividing boundary is self-mastery. Prompted by selfishness, where mastery and command be made life's motive, ambition is subversive of humanity's best interests. Guided by altruism, making glory and honor the ideal, crowns ambition a blessing.

"I cause from every creature
His proper good to flow;
As much as he is or doeth,
So much he shall bestow".

"Euphrates, you are so stately, and yet so calm". I need no publicity to attract attention; you plant a tree in my bosom and it blooms in thirty days; you sow a seed on my banks and it sprouts in three days; my works carry my fame to the end of the world. Not so with its sister Hidekel (a minor tributary of a stony bed); it wheezes and hisses and is heard from afar, lest no one take cognizance of its existence.

THE AMERICAN JEWISH YEAR BOOK 5679.

The American Jewish Year Book for 5679 (1918-1919), which is edited for the American Jewish Committee by Dr. Samson D. Oppenheim, and issued by the Jewish Publication Society of America, contains, in addition to the usual features, a number of timely and interesting articles.

Considerable space is devoted to the war, as is evident from the events, which cover about two hundred pages, and from the articles dealing with the collecting of Jewish war statistics, the Jewish Welfare Board and the Jews of Serbia.

The article on Jewish War Statistics is from the pen of Julian Leavitt, who is in charge of the Division of War Statistics of the Bureau of Statistics and Research. Mr. Leavitt gives an admirable description of the method adopted in collecting Jewish War Statistics. While it is yet not feasible to give definite statistics of the number of Jews in all branches of the military and naval service of the United States, it may be confidently stated that the figures when fully analyzed will show conclusively that the Jews of America are worthily acquitting themselves in this war as soldiers and citizens.

In the article on the Jewish Welfare Board, written by its Executive Director, Mr. Chester J. Teller, we are given an outline of the manifold activities of this organization. Mr. Teller describes the work done by the two hundred regular workers in the American camps and the countless volunteers, who, as occasional or regular visitors to the camps, have conducted services, visited the sick in the hospitals, entertained men in groups and cheered and comforted them individually. He also gives an account of the numerous buildings which the Welfare Board is erecting in order to carry on the administrative work in the various camps and cantonments. An important feature of this work is the distribution of tens of thousands of Bibles and Prayer Books among the soldiers and sailors.

A vivid sketch of the life and activities of the Jews of Serbia is contributed by Dr. I. Alcalay, Chief Rabbi of Serbia. In this admirable survey Dr. Alcalay gives the history, the character, the occupation and mode of life of the Jews of that country. The entire Jewish population of Serbia before the present war amounted to 35,000, of which more than half came to Serbia after the Balkan War of 1913.

In the article on the Jewish population of the United States, the editor, Dr. Oppenheim, describes his methods of arriving at a new estimate of the Jewish population in the United States. He divides his work into two parts: one dealing with New York City, and the other with the rest of the country. An accurate estimate of the Jewish population of the United States is at present particularly important, as it helps to determine the proportionate contribution that the Jews are making to the war. In his article will be found a mass of figures showing, in tabular form, how the Jewish population of the country is distributed; much enlightening statistical data concerning the Jewish population of various classes of American cities, together with an exhaustive and novel treatment of the Jewish population of New York City, which, as is known, contains almost one-half of the Jews in the United States. It may be of interest to mention that according to the best estimates the Jewish population in the United States amounts to over 3,300,000, while New York City alone has 1,500,000 Jewish inhabitants. Dr. Oppenheim reports that New York City, which contains the largest Jewish community that has ever existed within the confines of a single municipality, has over 2,200 congregations, 180 religious schools with 41,403 pupils, exclusive of about 14,000 who attend private schools. It has over 100 recreational and cultural agencies, more than 1,000 mutual aid societies, 965 lodges, 193 economic agencies, and 164 philanthropic and correctional agencies. Dr. Oppenheim gives a list of nine cities, exclusive of New York City, containing an aggregate of over 9,200,000 inhabitants, of which 900,000 are Jews. The cities in order of population are:

Chicago	225,000
Philadelphia	200,000
Cleveland	100,000
Boston	77,500
St. Louis	60,000
Baltimore	60,000
Pittsburgh	60,000
Newark	55,000
Detroit	50,000

It may be observed that New York City is not percentage-wise the most Jewish city. Chelsea, Mass., has a general population of 46,000, and contains 13,000 Jews, or a Jewish population of 28 per cent. Rosenhayn, N. J., has a general population of 600, and contains 300 Jews, or a Jewish population of 50 per cent, while Carmel, N. J., has a general population of 750, and contains 450 Jews, or a Jewish population of 60 per cent. Woodbine, N. J., is practically entirely Jewish in population.

Dr. I. Edwin Goldwasser, the Executive Director of the federation for the support of Jewish Philanthropical Societies of New York City, gives a brief but illuminating account of the formation of the Federation in New York City.

The events of the year are especially replete with information of items of Jewish interest in the United States, England and Russia. From the list of Promotions, Honors and Elections, it will be seen that this year's appointments of Jewish commissioned officers in the United States amount to over 1,500.

Other valuable features are the Calendar of the year, the Calendar for One Hundred Years, the list of National Organizations, the list of Jewish Periodicals, the list of Jewish Federated Charities, the list of Jewish members of Congress of the United States, and the Statistics of Jews throughout the world. Appended are the annual reports of the American Jewish Committee and of the Jewish Publication Society of America.

DID SHAKESPEARE KNOW THE JEW?

was hanged in 1592, two years before the first production of the Merchant of Venice. Shakespeare wrote for his contemporary public, and Lopez' death being discussed everywhere, the indications point that he had him in mind when he drew the character of the Jew to fit one of the plots he discovered.

Shakespeare was never lost for a plot. A pamphlet, a legend, a collection of short stories or a poem sufficing to give him a plot which he remodeled into a play of his own. In the Merchant of Venice there is interwoven two stories, "The Bond or Pound of Flesh Story", and "The Three Caskets Story". It is only the "Bond" story which interests us at present.

In Bishop Percy's "English Reliques" there is reprinted a ballad with the following title: "A new song, showing the Cruelty of Geronitius, a Jew, whoLending to a Merchant a Hundred Crownes, would have a Pound of his Fleshe, because he could not pay him at the time appointed". The story of this ballad is practically the same as the "Pound of Flesh" theme in the Merchant of Venice, and the date is most commonly ascribed to the early part of the 16th century.

There is contained in an Italian collection of short stories, published in 1378, known as "Il Pecorone", and written by Sir Giovanni, a novel, with the title of "The Jew of Venice". The plot of this novel in so far as it refers to the bond story, Shakepeare's Merchant of Venice is an exact replica.

"Gesta Romanorum", a collection of legends, stories and popular traditions, compiled in England toward the end of the 13th century, contains a story where a young girl, disguised as a man, appears in a suit before a judge, where a pound of flesh is to be cut from a knight in payment of a debt. However, the merchant who demands the payment of the pound of flesh is not a Jew.

The plots mentioned are not the only sources, and it is not within the scope of this article to go into details with all of them, but simply to show that the story of the Pound of Flesh was not original with Shakespeare. Neither is the purpose to criticize, disparage, find fault with or decry in any way the Merchant of Venice as a play, as a work of art or as dramatic literature. The intention is simply to point out some of the sources of the plot and character of Shylock, the historical facts concerning the Jews in England and Shakespeare's facilities for observing them and drawing a true Jewish character.—(The Argus.)

WHAT THE JEW STANDS FOR

By Rabbi Martin Zelonka

There are three things for which the Jew has stood, now stands and always will stand. First, there is the faith in a one and indivisible God, the faith that is now accepted by most of the civilized world; second, purity of the home and sanctity of the marriage tie; third, freedom of thought and action. The Jew always has stood for democracy, a government by the people, for the people and of the people; and he was the first to proclaim the doctrine of tolerance, that believe after the dictates of their own hearts. These are the essentials for which the Jew has suffered and fought, and for which he will continue to fight and suffer, if need be.

OFFICIAL VISIT TO THE LODGES IN WESTERN CANADA—INSTITUTION OF LODGE IN REGINA, SASK.

Pursuant to instructions of the President, acting in conformity with the resolutions adopted at the last meeting of the General Committee, Brother A. B. Seelenfreund and myself made an official trip to Western Canada to visit the lodges in that section of America. Brother Seelenfreund left Chicago on the evening of Aug. 2 and I joined him at St. Paul on the morning of Aug. 3. We arrived at Moose Jaw at noon Aug. 4 and were met by Brother David Beckerman, formerly of Winnipeg and a past president of Winnipeg Lodge, but now in business in Moose Jaw. He had arranged for a large number of the brethren-to-be to come in autos from Regina to meet us. This was a distance of 48 miles. Shortly after noon six cars of coreligionists appeared, and after tendering us a dinner at the King George Hotel at Moose Jaw, escorted us in autos to Regina, where late in the afternoon we instituted the lodge. Thirty-two members-elect were present and ten more are on the charter roll, but the lodge members have promised us at least fifty members before the convention. The lodge will be known as Louis D. Brandeis Lodge No. 833. Brother Seelenfreund conducted the organization work, and a complete set of officers were elected and installed. This lodge bids fair in our estimation to be a real progressive link in our chain, and we felt that the long, arduous trip was well repaid by seeing the enthusiasm of these new brothers.

In the evening a banquet was held at which Brother Seelenfreund spoke upon the work of the order and the duties of every member. I spoke upon the responsibilities which the war has thrust upon our co-religionists, and how the order was helping to work out the problems brought on by these newer responsibilities.

At midnight we left Regina and arrived at Saskatoon for breakfast. Here we met Brother John Feinstein, deputy for Saskatchewan, and also met a number of brothers of the lodge, with whom we spent the day in going over the lodge work and instructing them in their duties. In the evening we had a well-attended and most enthusiastic meeting of the lodge, followed by an informal supper. This lodge is in good condition. The brothers are enthusiastic, understand their work and have good leaders. They promise at least twenty new members before fall. We were well pleased with the work of this lodge and know that the ideals of the order are in good hands here.

At Saskatoon Brother Seelenfreund spoke upon "Co-operation" and upon the work of our order in unifying the various forces in Israel; while I spoke upon the activities of the order and outlined the work that the lodge was expected to do.

We left Saskatoon Tuesday evening and took a long trip into the most northerly part of Canada to Edmonton. Brother John Feinstein, who was leaving for his vacation to the Pacific Coast, was prevailed upon to go with us, and remained with us until the following Sunday for the balance of the trip.

We arrived in Edmonton Wednesday morning and were met by twenty of the brethren at Edmonton Lodge, which in our estimation is one of the best organized and most progressive lodges we have found anywhere in Canada, and among the best on our side of the line in our district. This community is specially well organized for all Jewish purposes. There seem to be no factions whatever—all work for a common purpose under able leadership, and the ideals of the members of this community are high.

We were royally entertained all day and in the evening were tendered a splendid banquet at the McDonald Hotel. Brother Seelenfreund addressed the lodge at this banquet upon the principles of the order and its accomplishments, and especially emphasized the new work which the order is doing. I spoke upon the philosophies underlying the Jewish ideals for which the order stood and for which the order was working, and explained the part of the order in carrying out and solving the problems of modern Jewry.

At midnight we left Edmonton for Calgary. We were given a splendid day in Calgary by the brethren, who had a well-organized, active and efficient lodge. Many Twin City brethren are located in Calgary and the surrounding territory, and all are members of the lodge working hard for the interests of the order. In the evening we had the largest attended banquet of the whole trip. Brother Seelenfreund spoke upon the order and its work, its history and its ideals, dwelling particularly upon its philanthropic and general work for the benefit of Jewry. I took up the work of the order at the point where he left off and told of the new problems confronting our people, and how the order is trying to do this work to carry out the ideals of Judaism. From Calgary we returned home.

As a result of this trip we have obtained a new insight into conditions in the lodges in Western Canada. We found them as a whole well organized, ready, anxious and fully prepared to carry on our work. We believe that the trip was of great benefit to the members, in that we instilled in them a new spirit, pointed out to them new ideals and new methods of work to carry out these ideals.

We were met with the utmost enthusiasm and firmly believe that the order is greatly benefited by our trip, and that our brethren are better able to carry on the work of the order, and also that there will be a noticeable increase in membership as a result of our work.

The trip was a long hard one, with many tiresome delays, long, arduous trips over prairie country, with no scenery to vary the monotony but flat lands. There were many disappointments that we had, but we feel amply repaid for the trip in the wonderful reception given us by every brother we met, by the lodges and their representatives, and by the splendid enthusiasm which we saw manifested everywhere that we went.

I have refrained in this report from making reference to any particular person or officer who extended courtesies to us. So much was done and so many contributed to the pleasant part of our trip, and so many are doing such good work there, that it would be an injustice to mention any names unless everyone connected with the lodges had his name specifically written herein.

To the brethren, one and all, and even to the ladies' committees which assisted, our sincerest thanks are due. As stated before, the trip was a long, hard one. I covered about 3,300 miles, and Brother Seelenfreund 800 miles more—probably the longest single trip ever undertaken in a single American district by any official. But we have learned so much of conditions and were so happily greeted all over, that we feel well repaid for having made what sacrifices were necessary to carry out the trip.

HIRAM D. FRANKEL.

CHANANIAH LODGE, NEW YORK.

One of the finest entertainments ever given at the Home at Yonkers was the one by Chananiah Lodge No. 165, on Sunday, June 9. Bro. Albert Weiss, Past-President of Chananiah Lodge, made a few happy introductory remarks and introduced Vice-President Maurice Bloch as the presiding officer of the afternoon.

Bro. Samuel Loewenstein, President of the Lodge, delivered a beautiful address on the occasion, as did also Past-President Henry Weiss. Governor Bro. Henry Meyers and the Treasurer of Chananiah Lodge, Bro. Emanuel Stern, addressed the assemblage. Remarks were also made by Gov. Henry Gutenstein.

Refreshments were served and patriotic songs were sung amidst great enthusiasm. It was inspiring to see the old people rise in a body and sing the patriotic songs with the fervor and enthusiasm of school children.

One of the brothers present, Sigmund Eisner, presented a substantial check to the Home in honor of the occasion. There was an unusually large gathering present.

Special prayer was offered up for the recovery of the Superintendent of the Home, Bro. Bernard Davis, who has been confined to his bed for several weeks.

B. F. PEIXOTTO LODGE, SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.

A very attractive entertainment was the Liberty Celebration and Dance given under the auspices of B. F. Peixotto Lodge No. 421, on the evening of Thursday, June 6, at the B. B. Hall, for the benefit of the wounded, crippled, homeless and starving in the war zone. There were booths representing the following countries, beautifully decorated in the styles of their respective nations, with the following ladies in charge: United States, Mrs. Simon Bamberger; France, Mrs. Louis Simon; England, Mrs. Louis Smith; Belgium, Mrs. William Rice; Italy, Mrs. Fannie Frumkin; Palestine, Mrs. S. Baskin. An address of great interest was delivered by Gov. Simon Bamberger on "Patriotism Among the Jews." There was an unusual attendance and the affair proved a great success, both socially and financially, and a huge sum was netted. The entertainment committee deserves a very high credit for their efforts to make the affair attractive.

WHAT OAKLAND UNDERSTANDS BY SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' WELFARE

By I. J. Aschheim

In the line of welfare work among our soldiers and sailors, Oakland distinguished itself in a manner that make San Francisco look more as if it was trailing, rather than leading, which, by rights, is universally expected of the metropolis.

I witnessed scenes in our sister city last Saturday evening and all day Sunday that firmly convinced me that our transbay friends have raised hospitality to the dignity of a cult, especially hospitaltiy that has a patriotic background to it.

Oakland Lodge No. 252, I. O. B. B., constituted itself the host of about 250 soldiers from Camp Fremont and the Presidio, many of them having temporary headquarters at the Oakland Defense Club, and approximately seventy-five sailors stationed at Vallejo and Yerba Buena Island, and right royal a host was Oakland Lodge.

Saturday evening a number of families had each their soldier guests at dinner, after which they were taken to Covenant hall, where they were joined by youth and beauty, and where a merry evening followed that lasted until midnight, when, as the program had it, "lights went out."

Again the men in uniform were taken to private homes, given comfortable and, I dare say in many instances luxurious, shelter. Sunday morning, after a sumptuous breakfast, came an early boat ride on the beautiful and placid Lake Merritt, then a dip at the Piedmont baths, and at 12 o'clock an auto drive to Niles canyon for an afternoon's outing, where the time was spent in athletic games and dancing. At the grounds was a cafeteria in regular form and order, except that the viands were prepared by "mother at home" and all was of the choicest the market afforded.

Is there a town or city anywhere in this great country that has a record for more whole-hearted and unstinted welfare work among the boys—the Nation's hope and pride?

Hope Lodge of Stockton was represented by at least fifteen of its leading members and their families.

It is a well-established axiom in life that "things don't do themselves." Somebody has to do them, and you may rest assured that the "somebodies" were in evidence. Any one acquainted with the communal situation in our sister city knows for a surety that, whenever a problem presents itself that requires patience and industry for success, it must be in the hands of our ardent friend, Morris N. Schneider, who, on every occasion, is ready to give of his time, means and strength. His estimable life companion does not only second him in his work, but in many instances inaugurates and leads, and together they represent what is most loyal, self-effacing and disinterested in communal activity.

Two ladies, Mrs. Jos. L. Daube and Mrs. I. S. Brill, recent acquisitions from the city of Chicago, are proving invaluable adjuncts to Jewish social life across the bay. They have brought with them a warmth and spirit of comradeship one would hardly expect from the windy city. But then I am reliably informed that that is quite conventional where they come from.

As first assistants in the undertaking we may mention Mrs. J. S. Green, Mrs. Harry Jacobs, Mrs. D. Moscowitz and Mrs. P. Van Mourick. All of these ladies were at the beck and call of the generallissimo, who, however, must never be lost sight of in any array of names.

B'NAI B'RITH OF OMAHA.

On Sunday evening, June 23, Omaha Lodge tendered a program and reception to the young men of the Jewish faith who have been called to the colors. This program was held in a public park, and a large gathering of Omaha Jewry attended to pay tribute to our boys on the eve of their departure.

Every Jewish boy who joined the colors was presented with a package containing cigars, cigarettes, socks, handkerchiefs, soap, candy, etc. All left for various camps in the best of spirits after such a "send-off" as was given them by the Jewish community of this city.

On Thursday evening, July 11, Omaha Lodge held an open meeting for members, ladies and their friends. The lodge was fortunate in having as its guest for the evening Dr. Wm. Rosenau of Baltimore, who delivered an interesting talk on the work of the Jewish Welfare Board at the various forts and cantonments.

On Thursday evening, July 18, the officers-elect of Omaha Lodge were duly installed in their various stations.

SILVER TROPHY CUP PRESENTED TO PINE BLUFF LODGE, PINE BLUFF, ARK.

Mr. Louis Cohen of Fort Smith, Ark., a member of the General Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 7 and State Chairman for Arkansas, offered a silver trophy cup to the Lodge in his state showing the greatest interest in B'nai B'rith work. Pine Bluff Lodge was the winner in the contest, and Brother Cohen transmitted the cup to the Lodge, accompanied by the following letter:

Fort Smith, Ark., June 11, 1918.

Rabbi Raphael Goldenstein,
President Pine Bluff Lodge No. 279,
I. O. B. B.,
Pine Bluff, Ark.

Dear Rabbi:

It is with profound pleasure that I am this day forwarding to you by parcel post a silver trophy cup for Pine Bluff Lodge No. 279, Independent Order B'nai B'rith, which has been awarded this cup for making the largest increase in membership for the year 1917.

As State Chairman for the general committee for Arkansas I offered this cup to the lodge showing the greatest interest for the B'nai B'rith, and I herewith present this cup to your lodge and its faithful members for the interest you have expressed in a most practical manner for the great and noble order of the I. O. B. B.

The Order is such a big institution in the life of every Jew that it should not only inspire him to do his part in the work at hand, but it also becomes the duty and obligation to push our endeavors to the utmost. Stop a moment and think of our suffering co-religionists across the seas. Then you will realize the unbounded privileges we enjoy in this great and free country of ours and really appreciate those privileges by making our endeavors more useful and do our part as we rightfully should.

In presenting this cup for past endeavors, I trust that it prove to be an inspiration for future endeavors for the Order, and surely this small token of my personal appreciation will serve a most worthy purpose. It would have given me a distinct pleasure to have been with you on this occasion, but as that is impossible at this time, I hope that this message will bring home to each and every one of you the importance of our work and why it becomes necessary, especially in these trying times of war, to work harder and more courageously for the cause than ever before.

In closing I thank you again from the bottom of my heart for your loyalty to the Order, and hope the coming year will bring you more members, together with more inspiration for the Independent Order B'nai B'rith.

Fraternally,

LOUIS COHEN,

State Chairman for Arkansas General Committee.

REHOBOTH LODGE, NEW YORK.

Bro. William Klapp of the Intellectual Advancement Committee was unanimously elected Vice-President of Rehoboth Lodge No. 38, to fill the unexpired term of Bro. Harry Aron, who has been called to the colors.

In April last Bro. Clarence Y. Bachrach, Chairman of the Intellectual Advancement Committee, assigned Brother Klapp to visit Rehoboth Lodge to speak for the good and welfare of the Order and also in behalf of the Third Liberty Loan. The members of Rehoboth were well pleased with Brother Klapp's visit, and prior to his leaving they made a demand upon him to withdraw from Maccabee Lodge No. 71 and affiliate himself with Rehoboth, inasmuch as they were greatly in need of his services and that he is a Bronx resident. Brother Klapp is well known to all the members of Rehoboth, and after being convinced that his services would be more effective, he responded to their call.

Brother Klapp is a lawyer and assistant clerk of the Municipal Court of the Bronx and is a very active young man in Bronx affairs. He has the best wishes of his many friends and admirers for his successful efforts in behalf of Rehoboth. Word has reached us that he has already secured seven new members for the Lodge. Keep it up, Brother Klapp, and good luck to you.

JACKSON, TENN.

Several members of Abraham Levi Lodge No. 554, of Jackson, Tenn., in conjunction with the delegation of members from Memphis initiated a class of twelve candidates in Corinth, Miss., on June 11, 1918, as members of Abraham Levi Lodge.

Mr. Clarence Frohlich of Memphis acted as representative of the Grand Lodge.

B'NAI B'RITH OF CLEVELAND.

The officers of Cleveland Lodge No. 16 were installed at a meeting of the lodge held in the B'nai B'rith Building on Aug. 1, 1918. The installation ceremonies were conducted by Mr. Alfred A. Benesch, second vice-president of the district. Short addresses were made by the newly installed officers pledging their untiring efforts to carry on the work that the B'nai B'rith is doing.

A forum in which questions of the day will be discussed is being formed under the auspices of Cleveland Lodge by its secretary.

Tuesday, Aug. 20, was a most ideal day for the outing of Cleveland Lodge, No. 16, held at Euclid Beach Park. A large crowd was on-hand throughout the day, and the athletic events, under the direction of Max M. Ozersky, proceeded without a hitch. Races for married and single women, fat men's races, pie-eating contest, swimming contest, a baseball game between the single and married men, moving pictures, carousel rides and other events were features of the day. Thrift Stamps and one Liberty Bond were given as prizes to the winners of the various events. In the evening dancing took place in the old log cabin. The grand march, which started at 9 o'clock, was led by Mr. Philmore J. Haber, president of the lodge, and Mrs. Haber. Soldiers and sailors who were at the park were invited guests of the lodge. The log cabin was decorated for the occasion. Representatives from other lodges in adjoining cities were on hand. The Mothers' Club of the Council Alliance were also the guests of the lodge.

The B'nai B'rith Band, which is now under the direction of Prof. Philip Saginor, holds rehearsals at the building every Monday evening. All those who play instruments and wish to affiliate themselves with the band should write to Professor Saginor, see him in person at the building, or consult with the secretary of the B'nai B'rith.

Maurice Kahn, secretary of the B'nai B'rith, was appointed by the Mayor's War Board as one of the Four-Minute Men. He will speak at the various moving picture places and theaters.

A public meeting of Cleveland Lodge, No. 16, was held at the B'nai B'rith Building on Sept. 21. The meeting took the form of a patriotic rally and was largely attended.

Arrangements are now being made to extend the hospitality of the B'nai B'rith building to the Jewish soldiers and sailors who may happen to be in Cleveland on a visit or furlough.

President Philmore J. Haber of the Cleveland Lodge is at work on the various committees that will have charge of the various activities in the B'nai B'rith building this coming fall and winter.

On Thursday evening, June 13, Cleveland Lodge, No. 16, held nomination for officers for the ensuing term.

The reports of the delegates to the convention that was recently held in Akron were listened to with interest, and each delegate received hearty applause. Delegate Schlesinger told of the big ovation the convention gave Max Meisel when it was announced that he was elected trustee of the Cleveland Jewish Orphan Asylum, and the thunderous applause when Alfred A. Benesch was elected second grand vice-president of the second district.

Delegate Max Meisel spoke on the social welfare work that the Order is doing. Delegate Abe Kolinsky was elated over what he considered a personal victory. He introduced a resolution asking the order to indorse the British declaration favoring a Jewish homeland. The resolution passed after a slight change, this being the first time in the history of the Order that it has shown any active interest in the Zionist movement, and Kolinsky, who is an old and enthusiastic Zionist, feels gratified and expressed himself in that manner.

Delegate Benesch spoke optimistically of the Order in general, the work that it has done for Jewry throughout the world, and what it is doing now with ten times the burden of former times on account of the war. He spoke enthusiastically of the activities of the Cleveland Lodge and expressed a belief that in spite of the heavy inroads that the war has made on the membership not only of this organization, the future will see an increased membership. Expressions were heard on every side that with the selection of Max Meisel as trustee of the Orphan Asylum and Alfred Benesch as second grand vice-president, the Cleveland Lodge was doubly honored.

Music for all entertainments of Cleveland Lodge that will be held from time to time in the B'nai B'rith Building will be furnished hereafter by the B'nai B'rith Conecrt Orchestra. The orchestra consists of twenty members, under the leadership of Mr. L. Cowen. Mr. Cowen, in conjunction with the secretary of the B'nai B'rith, will arrange concerts that will consist of classical numbers. Rehearsals are taking place every Wednesday afternoon.

Mr. Maurice Kahn, secretary of Cleveland Lodge, has been recommended to represent the lodge on the Jewish Welfare Board for the local service committee.

A special meeting of Cleveland Lodge, No. 16, was held in the month of July for the purpose of installing the officers elected for the ensuing term.

The officers of Cleveland Lodge, No. 16, elected for the ensuing term were installed at a special meeting held on Thursday evening, July 18, 1918. The installing officer was Mr. Sidney G. Kusworm of Dayton, Ohio, first vice-president of District Grand Lodge No. 2.

The children of the Jewish Orphan Asylum were the guests of Cleveland Lodge No. 16 at their outing held at Euclid Beach Park, Aug. 20, 1918. A large number of members of the lodge tendered their automobiles to carry the children from the institution to the beach.

On Tuesday, Aug. 20, 1918, Cleveland Lodge held an old-fashioned family gathering at Euclid Beach, which took the name of "Getting Better Acquainted" with the other members and their families. The program included free moving pictures and free carousal for the children, athletic events for the grown-ups and dancing in the evening at the Log Cabin.

KITTANNING, PA.

Service Flag Dedication by Armstrong Lodge

A service flag was dedicated by Armstrong Lodge No. 770 on Sunday afternoon, July 28, in honor of fifteen young men who are in the service of our country. The function was attended by the largest audience in the history of Kittanning Jewry. The flag was presented in a most masterly manner and a patriotic address by Hon. J. Daugherty of Kittanning, and was accepted in behalf of Armstrong Lodge and Jewry by M. Feuchtwanger, president of District Grand Lodge No. 3, I. O. B. B. In addition to the regular program, addresses were made by Bros. J. L. Apple and Jacob Einstein, the latter acting as chairman of the meeting.

MEMBERSHIP CAMPAIGN IN DISTRICT NO. 1

President Maurice P. Davidson, Vice-President Charles H. Shapiro, Brother Joseph H. Ullman of New Haven, Brother Charles Hartman and Brother Clarence G. Bachrach, chairman of the Intellectual Advancement Committee, assisted by the various district deputies, are maturing plans for a membership campaign on a large scale, to take place this fall.

A great many of the members of the district are in the service of the United States Army and it is found necessary to secure new members so as to continue the good work of the district and the Order.

President Davidson has sent a very urgent appeal to the members of the district, asking each one to bring in at least one new member. It is believed that a great many will respond enthusiastically to the earnest and urgent appeal of Brother Davidson, who is very popular all through the district and who has the hearty co-operation of all the devoted members.

President Davidson has also secured the co-operation of the lodges for the Fourth Liberty Loan campaign. It will be recalled that in the Third Liberty Loan campaign Brother Davidson and his enthusiastic helpers sold upwards of a million and three-quarters worth of bonds.

THE CINCINNATI LODGE, CINCINNATI, OHIO.

Dedication of Service Flag.

On the evening of June 10, Cincinnati Lodge, No. 4, dedicated a Service Flag containing thirty-four stars with appropriate ceremonies. The speakers of the evening were Rev. Dr. Louis Grossmann, who delivered the principal address; Captain James P. Easley, and Rev. Dr. David Philipson, who dedicated the Service Flag. All the speakers were most eloquent in their talks and carried the audience with them. Varied musical numbers were excellently rendered by the Rockdale Temple choir. The audience joined in the patriotic songs. President Sidney L. Rosin presided.

Class Initiation.

At the last meeting of the Cincinnati Lodge No. 4, B'nai B'rith, held on June 24, in the Assembly Hall of Rockdale Ave. Temple Annex, a class of nine candidates was initiated into the order with the usual impressive services, conducted by a special degree team.

At the business meeting preceding the initiation it was decided unanimously and with great enthusiasm that Cincinnati Lodge shall purchase $500 worth of War Savings Stamps. The lodge has already responded to the extent of its means in the purchase of Liberty Bonds of the various issues.

In his closing remarks President Sidney L. Rosin urged upon the large attendance present the necessity for continuing during the summer intermission efforts to secure new members. Like all similar organizations, Cincinnati Lodge has remitted the payment of dues for its members who are in the service of the country on account of the war, the number is not small. To help the lodge bear this unforseen expense and to keep its efficiency up to its high standard is the main reason for urging a very large increase of membership, although the Diamond Jubilee of the Order, to be celebrated in October, calls for pronounced activity on the part of the membership if the lodge is to make the usual good showing for which it is known.

The first half year of President Rosin's term has been very successful and he has been fortunate in winning to his support the aid and encouragement which his disinterested and sincere efforts merit.

AKRON LODGE, AKRON, OHIO.

A meeting of the Lodge was held Wednesday evening, June 19. There was read a lengthy and enthusiastic set of resolutions sent by the Grand Lodge expressing appreciation for the excellent management of the convention held in Akron and for the rare hospitality of the Akron people, both Jewish and non-Jewish. Mr. Henry Fuerst, chairman of the convention committee; Mrs. S. M. Levy, head of the committee for the entertainment of visiting ladies; Mayor Meyers, and Mr. Francis Seiberling were among the Akron people mentioned with warm ecomium, besides Mr. Samuel Friedman, who has just given up the Presidency of the Lodge. A communication was read from Mr. Friedman himself, who is now among the enlisted men at Ft. Hancock, Georgia. Mr. Friedman's letter, besides expressing sentiments of ardent patriotism, voiced appreciation for the token presented him at the time of his enlistment.

The convention committee reported a balance of $150 in the convention fund. The committee is to use the money either for the purchase of a Liberty Bond or as a contribution to the Soldiers' Welfare Work. The Initiation Committee reported that a class initiation was held on Sunday evening, June 9.

A drive for 200 new members is soon to be started. There will probably be a large patriotic meeting connected with the drive. Joint solicitation in connection with other Jewish activities of Akron, imitating somewhat the principles of the recent War Chest campaign, was discussed.

Further steps were instituted to provide with gifts all Lodge members who have joined the country's fighting forces.

DANMARK LODGE, COPENHAGEN, DENMARK.

Rabbi A. B. Rhine, of Hot Springs, Ark., was the orator of the occasion, and other speakers also participated.

Rabbi A. B. Rhine, of Hot Springs, in his excellent address, spoke of the many opportunities offered the Jew in America to become a living factor in the industrial, social and fraternal world of this country. He said that in no other land is there as much freedom enjoyed as is offered those who live under the protecting folds of the United States flag.

He paid a glowing tribute to the residents of the small Jewish community of Forrest City and the several other smaller towns adjacent thereto, and referred to the unity and harmony existing among the Jewish people of these communities as a rare occurrence, and related that it was an example that could be followed by many other sections. He said that such a unison of brotherhood should be encouraged, and offered his services whenever needed to further the interests of those constituting the united Jewish communities of Eastern Arkansas.

L. Barnett made a few appropriate remarks in welcoming the visitors, and told of some of the work being accomplished by his co-religionists in Arkansas.

In concluding his remarks he dedicated an eight-star service flag to the members of Barnett Lodge No. 754, I. O. B. B., who have entered the United States military service. These young men are H. K. Rosenbaum. The committee worked most industriously and was rewarded by adding over $400 to the funds of the lodge devoted for benevolent and charitable purposes.

ZION LODGE, COLUMBUS, OHIO.

A patriotic spirit dominated the meeting of Zion Lodge No. 62 on Monday afternoon, June 10, 1918. The meeting was held for the first time at the Southern Hotel, the new meeting place of the lodge.

The reports of the delegates to the Akron Convention, and the general report of Secretary Karger were received with intense interest by the membership of the lodge, displaying a general interest and enthusiasm in the work of the order. Throughout the reports and discussions, which dealt in a large measure with work in the camp, conservation, etc., the note of patriotism ran high.

A membership compaign for the near future was announced by President E. J. Schanfarber, who said that a larger membership was necessary to properly carry out the work as outlined for the lodge.

Rabbi Jos. S. Kornfeld stirred the members with his remarks on the Flag. He spoke of the inspiration of the American Flag, terming it "The Flag of God—The Flag of Man". He pointed out the great contrast in the ideals of the American Flag and those of the German flag, showing the radically different conceptions regarding the flag in the minds of the American people, and the Kaiser and his German subjects.

The trustees were also directed to invest all surplus funds in new Liberty Loan bonds. The lodge unanimously resolved that subject to the approval of the Grand Lodge and the Executive Committee of the Order, the entire dues collected and to be collected from candidates who have joined or will join the lodge during the year 1918 should be paid over to a patriotic fund of the Order for the purpose of purchasing field hospital equipment or hospital ambulances for the presentation to the Government as a token of the loyalty of the lodge on the occasion of the Diamond Jubilee celebration of the Order.

In place of Leander Marx, the secretary, who, owing to government work, will be absent from the city, his father, Mr. Solomon Marx, was elected to that office by a rising vote. The installation of the officers took place at a well attended meeting of the lodge, held on July 29, 1918.

The installation of officers of Barnett Lodge No. 754, of Forrest City, Ark., took place on Sunday, July 14, 1918. A class of three members was initiated on that occasion.

Mr. Ernest R. Bernstein, of Shreveport, La., past president of District Grand Lodge No. 7, has been placed by the War Department on the reserve list to fill an important position in the work of purchasing supplies for the United States Army.

HENRY JONES-LEBANON LODGE, NEW YORK.

A splendid address was delivered by Bro. Joseph Levenson at a recent meeting of Henry Jones-Lebanon Lodge on "Some Jewish Contributions to American Political Thought". The address was both interesting and illuminating. Bro. Levenson promised to give a second talk on some subject later in the fall. Bro. L. Silbert, past president of Amos Lodge, No. 121, of Boston, Mass., was a guest at the same meeting and received the fraternal and cordial greetings of the members, with their best wishes for his safe return. Brother Silbert has volunteered his services to the Aviation Corps. The following brothers of Henry Jones-Lebanon Lodge recently volunteered: Privates Moses C. Abruza, Cecil Anhalt, Benjamin Brown; Lieut. Abraham Cohen; Privates Emil Freundenfels, Harold Greenblatt, Isaac Hellerman, Julius Kirschstein, Morris Phillips, Morris Rosen, Benjamin Weingart and Alex. A. Winett. Bro. Louis G. Schwartz has been appointed secretary of the Henry Jones-Lebanon Lodge to take the place of Bro. Benjamin Weingart, who recently volunteered.

PITTSBURGH, PA.

A meeting of the representatives of the B'nai 'Brith Lodges of Western Pennsylvania, was held at the Wm. Penn Hotel on Sunday, August 25, 1918; twenty-eight delegates representing thirteen lodges.

Mr. Marcus Feuchtwanger of New Castle, president of District No. 3, Abraham Berkovitz of Philadelphia, H. S. Platovsky of Philadelphia, F. R. S. Kapan of McKeesport, and the officers of the Social Service committee of the district were also present. The meeting was opened by Mr. Berkovitz. The gathering then subdivided itself into three groups, the Adult Welfare Committee, the Big Brother Committee and the Educational Committee. These committees elected their officers, who will compose the Executive Board of the entire organization.

The officers elected by the Executive Board for the ensuing term are: S. I. Fink, president; Robert Davidson of Homestead, secretary, and Adolph Edlis, treasurer.

The organization intends to carry on such social and educational work amongst the Jewish residents of Western Pennsylvania that is not being taken care of by the other Jewish organizations.

The entire meeting was very enthusiastic and the officers of the district felt satisfied that this will prove a very successful body.

B'NAI B'RITH OF ST. LOUIS.

Ebn Ezra Lodge No. 47 held an important meeting on June 13, 1918, which was well attended. Short talks were made by prominent members of the lodge and visiting brethren of Missouri Lodge No. 22. The meeting was held on Flag Day. Bro. Judge Samuel Rosenfeld addressed the gathering on "The Significance of the Anniversary of Flag Day".

An analysis of the recent convention of District Grand Lodge No. 2, held at Akron, Ohio, was given by Past Presidents Emil Mayer and Karl Vetzburg.

An impressive initiation was conducted by a specially selected degree team on a large class of candidates.

GULF LODGE, NEW ORLEANS

Gulf Lodge, No. 221, held its regular meeting on July 25th, and it was well attended. The most important work was the installation of the newly installed officers, which was done by Bro. Archibald A. Marx, treasurer of the District Grand Lodge and second vice-president of the Constitution Grand Lodge. A rising vote of thanks was tendered him.

Felicitous remarks were made by newly installed officers, other members and visitors, after which the lodge was closed and refreshments partaken of.

ETHAM LODGE, SACRAMENTO, CAL.

The June meeting of Etham Lodge No. 37 took the form of a social evening devoted mainly to an entertainment and dance at which a delegation of fifty members from Hope Lodge of Stockton, Cal., were present. Sergeant Fitzgerald made some stirring patriotic remarks and Mr. Herman Davis urged all present to join the order.

At the regular meeting of the lodge, held on June 11, an interesting discussion took place on the draft question of foreign-born citizens, in which a number of members present took part.

KANSAS CITY LODGE NO. 184, KANSAS CITY, MO.

The B'nai Brith Lodge has adjourned for the summer months. The several committees are giving time and attention to the renewed efforts that will come with cooler weather. The membership committee is arranging for a vigorous, snappy campaign to commence September 8 and last one week. At least one hundred new members will be the goal of this campaign. The members of the committee are George Goldman, chairman; Meyer Denebeim, Herman Passamaneck, Ben Actenberg, Max Emrich, Si Frohlich, Harry Levin, Lothar Friedlander, and Jack Weinberger.

SAAR SHOLEM LODGE OF PITTSBURGH, PA.

Saar Sholem Lodge No. 154 of Pittsburgh, Pa., dedicated a service flag embodying six stars, representing its members in service of the United States, at a public meeting held on Sunday morning, Aug. 4, 1918.

Mr. Frank R. S. Kaplan was the principal speaker of the occasion. Other well-known B'nai B'rith leaders were also present and addressed the meeting. A number of members from sister lodges of Pittsburgh and surrounding cities were in attendance.

BARZILLAI LODGE, LAFAYETTE, IND.

The I. O. B. B., like most purely Jewish organizations, is founded upon that form of benovelence which gives without stint and without the question, Are we not giving too much? and upon that form of Brotherly Love which is the steadfast foundation of Judaism.

This is the spirit of the B'nai B'rith Lodge through its long life, and Barzillai Lodge No. 111 has not fallen short in these ideals. To enumerate all that has been done in the past would take weeks of reviewing and tabulation, but in the past twelve months the activity of the Lodge in war work has been great, considering the limited membership and the small dues paid.

The Lodge during November of 1917 sent a package of the luxuries which the government cannot afford to furnish to the entire army, to our boys in the service, who at that time numbered thirteen. These were highly appreciated by our soldiers, as is evidenced by the many letters we receive from the boys addressed to the lodge.

In February of 1918 a one-dollar smilage book was sent to each of the B'nai B'rith soldiers that they might enjoy the high-class form of entertainment furnished by the Federal Commission on War Camp Recreation.

And the Lodge is now keeping in touch with all members in the service, by personal letter wherever the address is known, keeping the boys posted upon matters which would ordinarily not be written by their loved ones who have too many other things to write about.

The Lodge has ever been ready to serve its members, not as a charity organization, but in true Brotherly Love and Fellowship, and now that we are at war there has been added an intensified fellowship, known as Patriotism.

Barzillai Lodge owns $600 worth of Liberty Bonds, has raised over $600 for the Jewish Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare Fund, and just recently entertained, in conjunction with the Jewish Ladies' Aid, eighty-five soldiers from Camp Purdue. The lodge also gave aid and recognition to the Jewish Young People's Center, giving its support whenever asked.

INSTITUTION OF B'NAI B'RITH LODGE AT MT. PLEASANT, PA.

A new B'nai B'rith Lodge was organized in Mt. Pleasant, Pa., on Sunday, June 30, through the efforts of Mr. Edward Hemple, Secretary of District No. 3, I. O. B. B., of Philadelphia, Pa., and Mr. Samuel I. Fink, of Pittsburgh, Pa.

The initial organization was attended by the entire community, and the following officers were elected: President, Mr Jerome Kobacker; Vice-President, L. Miller; Secretary, Wm. Rakusin; Treasurer, Myer Posner.

This new B'nai B'rith organization promises to become the center of activities for the community and a new Sunday School has already been organized to impart religious instruction to children of the community.

PATRIOTIC MASS MEETING

Patriotism and war service were the keynotes of a rousing rally which took place on July 17, 1918, in B'nai B'rith hall under the auspices of the Committee of Fifty, representing the nine B'nai B'rith lodges of San Francisco. Milton Marks, assistant city attorney, presided.

The speakers included representatives of the allied nations and thrilling stories from the battlefront were related by men who had seen action.

Patriotic airs were rendered by an orchestra and the audience engaged in community singing.

ZION LODGE, COLUMBUS, OHIO.

An important meeting of the lodge was held on Monday evening, June 24, 1918, at the Southern Hotel. A class initiation was a feature of the meeting.

THE JEW AND SELF-DETERMINATION

An Address Delivered at Sinai Temple on the Seventy-fifth Anniversary of I. O. O. B.

By RABBI EDWARD N. CALISCH, Ph. D., Richmond, Va.

"Not by power, nor by might, but by thy spirit, saith the God of hosts" (Zech. 4-6).

Though filled with a sense of pride for the privilege that has been accorded me to voice the message of this historic occasion, it is with a sense of sorrow that I realize that this is possible by reason of the illness of the honored leader, whose place I occupy, but do not fill. There is no need to dwell upon the profound scholarship and courageous eloquence of Dr. Emil G. Dirsch. We greatly mourn his absence today. It is our fervent prayer that it may be the sovereign will of Him on high that he be speedily restored to unweakened health and strength, that for many, many years he may continue that wonderful leadership that has been so powerful an inspiration, so truly a glory, to all Israel.

We are celebrating today the diamond jubilee of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith. We, who know the Order and what it has accomplished, present its record to an inquiring world with a feeling of proud satisfaction. It is a record of seventy-five years of unfailing faith and loyalty of a most valuable unifying usefulness and influence during the past three-quarters of a century during a critical period of Israel's history. The B'nai B'rith is typical of the Jewish people in the same manner as is the Jewish people of the human race. It has gathered men of differing ideals, of varying customs and opinions and welded them together as one body for noble philanthropic and educational work. To the casual non-Jew all Jews look alike. But there are differences among them as there are among other peoples. But all differences and variations of habit and thought were eliminated in the lodge room of the Order. Here was found one brotherhood, a covenant for altruism that held in abeyance all variations of ritual, custom, culture, training or nationalistic tradition. It was and is the great spiritual clearing house of the Jew, where the contributions of each class were brought to a common treasury and made to serve a common cause. And as the Order is thus to the Jew, the Jew is to humanity, the token and impulse of a world-brotherhood founded, not for might nor for power, but in the spirit of the common Father of us all, for the establishment of a world made safe for democracy, not merely politically, but intellectually and spiritually as well.

Among the phrases that this world-war has brought to the surface of consciousness is "self-determination". Whatever fine discriminations different definitions may bring forth, it may be broadly defined as the right of every group of people to work out their own destiny unhindered by objective compulsion and unrestrained by any stronger power outside of themselves, as long as their development does not infringe upon the rights or liberties of any other people. A survey of history will disclose that the recognition of this principle is a very new thing. The whole trend of human activities hitherto has been in opposition thereto. From the very dawn of time, when the primitive savage emerged from his prehistoric cave to encounter his fellow-savage, the ambition of men has been for power, for dominion over their fellow-men. Through the ages the struggle of men for universal sway has filled the pages of history with war and bloodshed. Groups of people grew from family to clan, from clan to tribe, from tribe to nation, from nation to empire, from empire to race, and with each stage of this growth there grew also the desire for world-power.

The earliest conflicts and conquests were limited in scope. But each succeeding imperial attempt took on wider proportions and influence. Babylon was succeeded by Egypt, and Egypt by Assyria, and Assyria by Persia and Persia by Greece. Greece in her turn gave way to the mightiest civic movement of ancient history, the Roman republic and its immediate successor, the Roman Empire. Here first was fully evident the budding of the flower of self-conscious world-dominion. Almost all the habited world paid tribute to Rome. Seated on its seven hills, spanning the tawny Tiber, the eternal city was the controlling center of the circle of ancient life, whose circumference rounded from the Pillars of Hercules to the white cliffs of Albion, and from India's tropic sands to the present incarnadined fields of Picardy and Flanders. The roadways of Rome ran, almost literally, from Bagdad to Berlin and from Africa to England. But this dominion was not destined to be permanent. Pricked by the swords of savage tribes from the north, by the spear-points of Hun and Goth, the bubble of Roman splendor burst. But not with it the irridescent dream for world-dominion.

Within the following centuries there were other attempts. A Mohammed, a Charlemagne, an Otho, a Charles Martel, a Barbarossa, are the figures that loom large on the canvas of that mediaeval history. But over them spread the shadow of a greater threat. The church sought to secure dominion over both spiritual and temporal worlds. The Holy Roman Empire, which, as has been well said, was neither Holy nor Roman nor an empire, was the great effort that secured a fairly successful result. It too was doomed to failure. The Protestant Reformation gathered head in the 16th century and shook the European world into discordant and warring fragments. When the pangs of that titanic birth were done an impulse for universalism in brotherhood sprang up. It grew till at the close of the 18th century a wave of humanism swept over the continent, affecting its whole life. Politically it culminated in the French revolution, whose cry for Liberte, Egalite et Fraternite, was the tocsin of a noble ambition, but which degenerated into a tumult of tyranny, of wild excess and fearful fratricide. In literature a school of humanists gave expression to the regnant passion. As Rousseau in France with his ideals of a republican Utopia, so Lessing in Germany voiced the sentiment, "I am not a citizen of Germany, but of the world. National patriotism is a false creed. There is no fatherland but the whole earth." Napoleon sought to build on the crest of this humanistic wave the fabric of a continent-embracing empire, like that of the Roman empire that had twice fallen, first politically under the onslaughts of vandal savages, and then religiously, beneath the lightnings of that storm that gathered head in Luther's cell at Wittenberg.

With his defeat the pendulum swung backward. There followed a reaction along nationalistic lines, a deepening of national consciousness. Here in America this was evidenced by the Civil War, whose immediate cause was the slavery question, it is true, but whose real cause was the developing national consciousness, the conviction expressed by Lincoln, that a nation could not be divided against itself. To continue, it had to be one, not only in political form, but in thought and ideals as well. On the fierce anvil of war, under the sledgehammer blows of mighty battles, north and south were welded into one. The federation of states had become a nation. Five years later the founding of the German Empire, and the unification of the several Italian states into one Italy, gave evidence that across the sea the national consciousness was thoroughly awakened and developing into strength.

But the last decade of the 19th century saw the beginnings of another phase of the desire for dominion. There arose an impulse for mastery on the basis of racial sympathy, and ethnic unity. In this movement Russia sought to take the lead. Much of its cruel activities, the persecutions of Poles, Jews, Stundists, etc., and the so-called protectorate over the eastern Balkan states must be viewed in the light of its Pan-Slavic program. Pan-Slavism was a lever that Russia hoped to use as the motive power for larger dominion. Thus, too, Germany laid stress upon the beauty and advantage to the world of Teutonic supremacy, with the spiritual hegemony of Prussian Kultur. And Japan sought, through China and Korea, to make eastern Asia a basis for wider Nipponese conquest. We cannot deny that England and America had dreams of an Anglo-Saxon culture that would lead and guide the world, though we did not seek to impose that culture by force upon any people but rather to spread it by the influence of example.

It was with the great powers of the world thus divided and thus aligned that the second decade of the 20th century was to witness the curtain rung up on the greatest tragedy that has ever blotted the pages of history with the tale of its terrors and atrocities, or dewed them with the tears of its agony and its sorrow. Back of the lines of this ethnic ambition there throbbed the impulse for economic mastery, for a new dominion over the material resources and riches of the earth. There might have continued, if not a generous rivalry between the nations, at least a peaceful struggle for this economic dominion, had not one nation conceived that it could secure it by force of arms, by the power of sheer brutal might. Germany has written the latest chapter in the history of the struggle for the mastery of might. Whether it shall be the last chapter time alone can tell. But what we can state is that for this generation at least, and doubtless for several generations to come, humanity has realized the truth of the prophetic utterance, "not by power, nor by might, but by my spirit, saith the God of hosts."

With everything in her favor, at the beginning and for the first four years of the war, that thorough preparedness, painstaking foresight, and studious ingenuity could give her of military and material advantage; with everything in her favor that unscrupulous use of great power, heartless indifference to human suffering or the loss of human life, sheer brutality, perfidious treachery and defiant disregard of all laws of honor or truth or decency could give her against opponents who restrained themselves by scrupulous regard for law and honor and decency and justice, yet has Germany come to the edge of the abyss of utter failure, and the shadow of the doom of her damnation by God and man draws ever nearer and nearer. Within our own day and before our own eyes is it being conclusively demonstrated that it is not by power nor by might, but by the spirit of Jehovah that the problems of humanity shall be solved and the perfected destinies of the nations achieved.

In what manner has this aught to do with Israel, or with the self-determination of the Jew, or what part has he played in this world-drama? Simply that it is his hope and his loyalty that are now being vindicated, for it is his law and his doctrine that are now being rescued out of the ruins of our present civilization. It has been the unique place that he has occupied in history, the patient and persistent presentation of his God-conception and his world-philosophy that has earned for him a spiritual leadership, though as yet unrecognized and perhaps himself unconscious of it. His is in miniature the universal experience. He had been family, he had been clan, he had been tribe, he had been nation, but these are all closed chapters in his history. He has become the world-citizen, the universal cosmopolite. Bound by no political bonds, held within no territorial boundaries, or national limitations, scattered over the earth, child of every clime, citizen or subject of every government, he is yet united by the power of the spirit. He shows a solidarity of spiritual cohesiveness, a unity of hopes and ideals that are token of a genuine human brotherhood. His family is that of humanity. His kingdom is that of priestly service. His empire is the empire of faith, whose ruler is the one king of all kings. What modern Balaam is there that can stand upon the peak of the present, and looking down o'er valley of the buried centuries upon the record of the house of Israel, but that like Balaam ben Peor of old, he must perforce bless where he desired to curse, praise where he would like to blame, and again cry out, "How goodly are thy tents, Oh Jacob, thy habitations, Oh Israel."

As the bud holds within the narrow compass of its convoluted folds the potency of the full-blown flower, so within the narrow compass of Israel's limited numbers is the promise of the full-blown flower of humanity's happiest achievement. Consider the cosmopolitanism of the Jew, the democracy of his spirit, his universality of sympathy born out of the travail of his sorrows; consider his intellectual hospitality, his mental acumen and adaptiveness, his readiness to seek all truths, to serve art and science, knowledge, literature, statecraft, drama. Consider his intensiveness in the application of his faculties, his self-surrender to the cause he serves or the goal he seeks. As Emma Lazarus has phrased it, if there be conjugations among men, as in grammar, then the Jew is the Piel of humanity, the incisive, the vivid, the intensive worker in the fields of human effort. Consider his faith, unshaken by a thousand martyrdoms, unweakened by a myriad of persecutions, undeterred by endless antagonism and opposition, unyielding in the face of the fiercest sufferings. Consider his loyalty, unwavering and undiminishing, not only among the generous nations in the lands of freedom, but even in the step-fatherlands of persecution and discrimination. Then finally consider, what is the goal he seeks with all these qualities of mind and heart, what is his ambition, his ideal of accomplishment, not as an individual, but as a people. It is not to rule, but to serve, not to dictate, but to bear witness, not to swing the sceptre of material dominion, but to justify the ways of God to man and to vindicate the guiding pillars of providence upon the highways of history.

It may be said here in passing that as the Jew serves the world so does the I. O. B. B. serve the Jew. It has emphasized for him the cardinal doctrines in the catechism of humanity. It accentuates the fundamentals of the structure of civilization, democracy, faith and loyalty.

Democracy. Through the undiscriminating doors of welcome it invited him into an atmosphere of self-reliant brotherhood. There were many varieties of social, intellectual, cultural and economic conditions. The brotherhood of the B. B. ignores them all. Each man brings the gift of his own talent, of his native vigor and power, and together they build the common temple of their united benevolence, brotherly love and harmony.

Faith. In the ritual of the order two ideals are emphasized, faith and loyalty. The one requisite of admission is faith. No matter what his interpretation of the doctrines of Judaism, no matter what the manner of the expression of the faith that is in him, whether orthodox or reform, Zionist or anti-Zionist, as long as there is faith in his heart, and his lips are framed to utter Sh'ma Yisroel, he who seeks admission is welcomed and given part and place in the purpose of Israel. This insistence on faith was no idle whim. Centuries of experience have taught that only the ages of faith have been the ages of constructive achievement, that only those movements were pregnant with the power and permanency of truth that were inspired from the one great source of all truth. By the facts of life has the utterance of the psalmist been justified that it is "the fool who saith in his heart that there is no God". The records of every people are evidence. Perhaps the most vivid illustration is that of the French people during the period of the revolution. The tremendous material prosperity of the preceding centuries had turned the heads of rulers and people alike. "Yeshurun had grown fat and kicked". The conduct of the kings and courtiers, their intrigues, their dissoluteness and debaucheries had poisoned the whole nation with the virus of moral degradation. The revolution came. It was in itself a moral madness, an ethical insanity unparalleled in history save in the Bolshevikism of Russia of today. The leaders of the revolution, drunk with power, set up a denial of God. They threw the priests out of Notre Dame. They set up a painted harlot within its walls and amidst indescribably shocking rites acclaimed her as the Goddess of Reason. They turned the churches into stables, made it a crime for priests to officiate. But the end was bound to come. The people grew sick of blood and rapine. They saw that their fair capital city had become a charnel house, its courts of law mere shambles, their national honor trailed in the dust, themselves a reproach and a byword. The folly passed. Blinded eyes were opened. Obdurate hearts were melted. Belief crept back. Faith reascended her throne. One morning Paris awoke to find its walls placarded, "The nation believes in God", and France was saved.

To a less degree and in similar manner the world of yesterday was repeating the folly of France of the 18th century. In America and in Europe there was a turmoil on the surface of society that told of the seething unrest that was below. Nihilism and anarchy, godless creeds and cults and theories, the arrogance of wealth, the violence of labor, were all indices that all was not well within the body politic. Drama and literature lent their aid to portray and interpret the sensual lasciviousness and the moral laxity that resulted from a weakening of the restraints of religion. There was an exaltation and a magnification of man and his achievements, a minimizing of God and His power. Though in a way men supported and attended church and synagog, it was more through the inertia of tradition than by the impulse of conviction. The God that men worshipped was an idol of their own creation.

To her other sins can leadership in this be ascribed to Germany. In spite of the apparently blasphemous utterances of the Kaiser about divine aid, his hypocritical protestations of reliance upon God, we realize that it was the leaders of German thought who crystallized and voiced the unfaith of the age. It was Schopenhauer who laid the foundations of religious pessimism by declaring that only negative ethics are possible, and that this is not the best, but the worst possible of all worlds. It was Haeckel who furthered this pessimism by basing the structure of ethics upon the foundation of the theory of evolution and the anthropoidal descent of man. It was Nietsche who went a step fruther, and said, "Die Koetter sind tod. Es lebe der Uebermensch". The gods are dead, only the superman survives. It was Treitschke who glorified the superstate, the arrogant aggregation of supermen. And it was the unholy ambition of this superstate, this arrogant aggregation of supermen, who, seeking to place the yoke of their sovereignty upon the neck of the world, brought about the present world-catastrophe.

But in this very world-cataclysm we see how God moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform. The crash of cannon has pierced the religious deafness of the age. It has awakened the moral sense. It has cleared the eyes of the mists of folly. It has pounded the purposes of God into the dullest intellect. A sense of genuine religious sentiment has filled the breasts of men. In the trenches, in the billets, in the barracks, in the cantonments, on the battlefields, in the hospitals, men have come to know God, to realize His nearness, to learn of the divine Schekinah whose ever present presence should find an ark in every human heart, an abiding place in every soul. And those back home are learning it too. With far less sacrifice, but none the less with sacrifice, men and women are seeking the altar of God. Frivolity and levity, looseness of living and laxity in morals, wanton waste and useless extravagance are all being unlearned. Nearer and nearer to the shrine of their faith the masses of people are wending their way. There is a new and solemn seriousness of purpose. There is a keener consciousness of moral responsibilities. There is a newly awakening knowledge of God. Faith is reascending her throne. Nations are coming to know that there is no permanence in physical power, no majesty in material might. There are truth and freedom and justice and right only in the spirit of Jehovah. The walls of the world are being placarded, "The nations believe in God", and thereby shall the nations be saved.

What of the Jew in this mighty moral transformation? To him there must be a sense of wonderful satisfaction. What a magnificent vindication it is of what he has contended for, suffered for, hoped and prayed and waited for. How marvelous a justifications of the claims he has clung to through the long centuries of inconceivable martyrdoms. Truly he has been the champion of faith, the very Swiss-guard of monotheism, through a hundred revolutions and the downfall of a dozen dynasties. Upon the battlefields of the Armageddon of the nations he has been the banner-bearer of Jehovah. He may wear upon his breast the decoration of distinguished services in the cause of humanity, symbolized not by cross, nor crescent, nor star nor shield, but by the emblem of the scrolls of law, the Torah, the token of divine law, the heritage of the house of Jacob, and the hope of all humankind.

Herein is the destiny of the Jew. Along these lines must be the impulse of his self-determination. Do we Jews today realize the wonderful opportunity of leadership afforded us? We say we are men and women of faith, but of how deep and earnest a faith is it? Is it a genuine passion of the soul or a mere perfunctory profession of the lips? Do we accept allegiance to the synagog as a birthmark grafted upon our physical bodies, or as a birthright of exceeding beauty and richness? Are we truly God-conscious? Truly knowing God in our hearts, do we accept Him merely as a convention of polite society, or as an actual, vital, personal experience? For the Jew who is not lost to all sense of honor or gratitude or affection, there can be but one answer. God is my Redeemer, the Rock of my refuge, my Father and King and "even though He slay me still do I put my trust in Him".

And finally we have the duty of loyalty taught us as the duty next and intimate to our trust in God. I have said that the Jew has shown his love and loyalty in every land and to every government. The message of the prophet Jeremiah has not been forgotten by him. But of all the lands and governments wherein the Jew has found place and protection in the years of his wanderings, what one that so commands his love, his loyalty, his profoundest patriotism as this loved land of liberty. What flag so commands his allegiance, his unfaltering support, as the heaven-hued and heaven-blessed stars and stripes. And on what nobler occasion could they be called for than this war into which America entered, so slowly and so reluctantly, but when once entered, with what power and resolution and unselfish purpose. It may be trite to say that the ideals of America are identical with the doctrines of Judaism, trite but true, and that America is now fighting the cause of the Jew in battling for the cause of humanity, and that therefore the Jew has a double duty in its support. But I put this to one side. We answer the call of our country as Americans, side by side with our fellow-Americans of other creeds. Our allegiance is undiluted, undivided and unhyphenated. But we do have the added duty to bring honor to the Jewish name by our bearing as Americans. We are doing so. We are giving in all directions more than our quota, as measured by our proportion of population. Our wealth, our energy, our talents, whatever they may be, are poured freely upon the altar of our common cause. Our boys are going with their brothers and with them meeting the great adventure and making the supreme sacrifice. I know not into what Jewish homes the angel of death may enter or what Jewish homes may be spared. But I do know that there should not be a Jewish home or a Jewish heart that shall falter or hold back, nor a Jewish man or woman that should for a moment think to seek to further his selfish interests or personal gain at the expense of his country. Much has been said of the infamy of profiteering. But of all who may do so none is so despicable, so culpable or so treacherous as the Jewish profiteer. He is a threefold traitor, to his country, to his God and to the people of his faith. I wish it could be said that there are none such. But to our sorrow and shame there have been. We have had to suffer the disgrace of fellowship with the seditious soap-box orator and the greedy and thieving millionaire. It has filled my heart with horror to think that there have been Jewish merchants and manufacturers who have tried to glut their already swollen purses at the expense of the needs of their country, nay more, to coin the very blood of our boys into the dollars of their dishonor. When one considers the sacrifices those boys are making, the hardships and dangers they are meeting with so consummate a courage, and then be told that there are men heartless and conscienceless enough to furnish them with garments and goods that fall to pieces with the first storm they encounter, then it is time that we disown such men who may claim Jewish descent or affiliation. There is no anathema too severe for them. Let the government do what it will with the others, but if it lay in my power I would put every Jewish malefactor, who is proven guilty, against a wall before a firing squad. Even that punishment would be too light for them. Forever should the mark of their treason be branded upon their brows and the condemnation of the whole house of Israel forever fastened upon their names.

What avail is the full and freehearted sacrifice of ten thousand Jews if one so-called Jewish criminal place the blot of treason upon the Jewish name. To our efforts must be added the determination to discover and denounce every faithless and disloyal Jew. He is disloyal as a citizen because he is faithless as a Jew. Herein is our double loyalty to serve our country and to safeguard our Judaism.

Oh what Jew is there that does not know the thrill of this double impulse, that will not heed the cry of this double call of duty? What Jew is there who, in this supreme hour in the history of humanity, who does not feel his heart answer to the heart throb of world-Israel, whose blood has been poured upon the altars of the ages, or who is not conscious of his glorious heritage from on high? And what American Jew can there possibly be who cannot hear within himself the voice of his country calling, as that of God to Abraham before Moriah's heights, and who will not answer, "hineni, hineni". "Oh my country, I come, I come, with all my strength, with all my energy, with all my wealth, aye with my dearest possession, the child of my loins, my sons and my dear ones—unhesitatingly and unreservedly and unafraid, to thee, in proud privilege. Oh my country, I come, I come".

AMEN.

THE B'NAI B'RITH

A Patriotic Factor for the Welfare of Humanity

Address by Simon Wolf, at Diamond Jubilee Banquet, Chicago, October 2, 1918

Webster in his reply to Hayne said: "The careful mariner in the midst of fog and storm, takes a reckoning of his latitude". So in the midst of the discussion, I realize that this is the Seventy-Fifth Anniversary of the Order that we are commemorating and celebrating the founding and the achievements of a national and international organization, founded by political and religious refugees, and made a patriotic factor by citizens of Jewish faith for the common welfare of humanity. While faithful to the ethics of Mount Sinai, it bars no son of the Covenant on account of nationality or lines of ritualism. The fact of being a Jew is the Shibboleth of admission. The lodge room of the Order is the school, the Synagogue, the Forum; it advocates no scheme that leads to division; it has steadily advocated unity of purpose, democracy of action, catholicity in accomplishment, the brotherhood of man has been its ideal, assertive conservation its north star, and loyalty to country and flag a constant prayer. "Schma Isroel" and the "Star Spangled Banner" have been and ever will be the twin sisters of Faith, Hope and Perpetual Peace. These sentiments have not only been embodied in our preamble, but in our concrete work. Fraternity molded the incoming refugee into American citizenship, that in turn made opportunity, and that constitutes the apex of world sympathy for the down-trodden, unfortunate and disfranchised. No other Jewish organization has been more efficient or constructive. It has been the pioneer at home and abroad, and been at the forefront in peace and war, as is again so gloriously evidenced on every battle front in Europe.

We few elders who have marched for sixty years with the colors, knowing what the Order has done, need no other inspiration for continued devotion, but you younger men should be reminded of what your fathers as members thereof accomplished. The buildings of homes for aged and infirm, orphan homes where the children of the stricken can be educated and cared for, many of these have and are gracing Jewish pulpits, an honor to our faith and our country. Teachers, doctors, lawyers, engineers, statesmen have been reared in these institutions, founded and supported by the Brotherhood. Hospitals for the bodily afflicted, whose doors are open to all, have afforded relief to thousands.

In the hour of local, national and international calamity, the Order has generously contributed to the relief, not only of its own members, but to the general fund, typifying in the highest sense, the lessons inculcated. But more than these contributions, the Order has in many world problems taken the sole advocacy of justice and equal rights, and in others, a hearty cooperation. The Roumanian Mission, its financial support, the Kishineff Petition and its world famous effect, the Russian Passport Question, the Abrogation of the Russian Treaty, the fight for years against the absurd and un-American literacy tests in immigration laws; the splendid work of the "Anti-Defamation League"; the erection of the Statue to Religious Liberty in Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, which symbolizes our love of and for that grand principle that underlies American liberty and equality and in every communal, national and international movement for the uplift and betterment of men, we have been at times the chain, and always a link in the great field of human achievement.

Taking stock of our assets seventy-five years after, is not in the spirit of vain glory on self-laudation, but to justify our existence as a world factor for still greater deeds and at the peace council we will be heard and heeded. It was stated at one time that secret and insurance societies had but brief existence. We have eliminated the one. The other is only in name, and yet at no time have we been stronger or more enthusiastic. We have no quarrel with anyone. Liberal, Orthodox, Zionists have a platform in our midst. Freedom of opinion, independence of thought are the service stars of our flag. While we do not encourage differences, we will not allow ourselves to be corralled into hysteric frenzy by individuals or groups. The world is large enough for all of God's children, so while we glorify our country and its humane institutions, preferring the flag of the "Free and Brave", we accord to others the privilege of a dual allegiance founded in faith and sincerity.

But in the great arena of world problems, we know no other slogan than that of loyalty to Democracy as proclaimed by our great presidents, and exemplified by the gallant soldiers of all nationalities who have "gone over the top" to preserve civilization. Happy are we that we have been permitted to see the reawakening of the people of every land. Have no fears as to the outcome. Right not might will triumph, and our children's children will bless our memory, for having in the world's greatest travail, done our duty as patriotic citizens true to the teachings of Sinai and to the Declaration of Independence. The memory of Henry Jones, B. F. Peixotto, Julius Bien and Leo N. Levi should ever be cherished, while our prayers are for long life, health and happiness for Brother Adolf Kraus, a loyal Jew, patriotic American and devoted son of the Covenant.

RACE PREJUDICE IN TIME OF WAR

A theatrical man, writing of the patriotic activities of stage folk, quotes a member of the Washington Red Cross Committee that was planning a war benefit as saying:

I must confess that I have never heard of any of them (the artists on the bill). except George M. Cohan, and while I have a natural aversion to Jews, I rather hope that he can be prevailed upon to sing "Over There".

Waiving aside the question whether George M. Cohan is a Jew—which he does not happen to be—the query arises:

What right has a person who has a "natural aversion to Jews" to belong to the Red Cross—the great agency which is focusing the activities of all our citizens alike to a great beneficent national end, the winning of the war?

And if this man—a member of the Red Cross—is afflicted with a "natural aversion to Jews", what right has he to give expression to his aversion?

This is a time for unity of effort, of endeavor, of devotion—not for "natural aversions" of any kind. "Natural aversions" should be directed solely against the enemy, not against fellow citizens who are doing their level best to defeat the enemy.—New York Evening Mail.

Sketches of Modern Jewish History

By Gotthard Deutsch

(XII. From Waterloo to the July Revolution)

The richest material for the Jewish history of this period is found in Germany, which for fifty years to come still includes the greater part of Austria. We have in these countries a large number of Jews who take a leading part in the development of Jewish life and thought, and the variety of the policies in dealing with the Jewish question are a true mirror of the main currents of modern Jewish history in the making. In the other states of western Europe the number of Jews is comparatively insignificant, while in the east of Europe their history is either politically stagnant, as is the case in Russia, or spiritually stagnant, as is the case in the Balkan states.

A typical expression of the reactionary tendencies which expected to completely undo all the achievements of the French Revolution is found in the Holy Alliance, formed by Austria, Prussia and Russia, which in its manifesto, dated Sept. 26, 1815, declared that the three nations consider themselves one Christian nation whose sovereign is Jesus Christ. The "Bundesakte" of the newly established German Federation, issued June 8, 1815, which took the place of the former "Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation", began its preamble "In the name of the Most Holy and Indivisible Trinity". The "Busrchenschaft", which was a kind of intercollegiate students' fraternity, celebrated in 1817 the tercentenary of Luther's Reformation in the historic Wartburg, where Luther had lived in retirement after his return from the Reichstag of Worms, and while advocating liberal principles of government, adopted a platform that pronounced the unity of Germanism and Christianity. It burned a number of books and pamphlets which it considered obnoxious, and among them was one by the Berlin essayist, Saul Ascher, which condemned the jingoism born out of the patriotic movement of 1813. It was only consistent that this organization should refuse to admit Jews to membership, and while it condemned acts of violence against the Jews, its professed sentiments were logically translated by mobs in southern Germany into the Hep-Hep movement of 1819, which attacked Jewish homes and pillaged Jewish stores, assuming quite serious proportions in Wuerzburg, Mannheim, Heidelberg and other cities.

The legal status of the Jews in the German Federation was, theoretically at least, favorable. Article 16 of the "Bundesakte" of June 8, 1815, declared that the Jews should be protected in the enjoyment of the rights guaranteed to them "by" the various states, and if changes are made they should only be made for the better, but not so as to deprive the Jews of any rights possessed by them. An amendment which seemed innocent enough made the provision inoprative. The original resolution read that the rights granted to the Jews "in" the various states should be kept intact. The amendment proposed by the representatives of the free cities, substituted the word "by" for "in", and so the opposing states had a convenient instrument in their hands, which in the way in which we saw Roumania obviate the operation of the treaty of Berlin, violated the spirit of the law, while complying with its letter. The free cities had promised to respect the rights granted to the Jews by the legitimate government, but were not bound to respect those granted in the state by a usurper. Hamburg and Frankfurt introduced the old restrictions, though somewhat moderated, so that in the former city the ghetto was at least abolished, while Bremen and Luebeck, which before the French Revolution did not tolerate any Jews, expelled those who had in the meantime settled there.

The case of Luebeck is especially interesting and typical. During the Middle Ages this ancient seaport and Hansa town kept the Jews out of its walls. This exclusion could not prevent Jews from neighboring states, as from Holstein, where they had been admitted under the mild rule of the King of Denmark, and from Mecklenburg, where, expelled in 1492, they were slowly readmitted in the Seventeenth century, from entering Luebeck on business as subjects of a friendly state. The city found it, therefore, more convenient to have the Jews who made their living there anyhow, subject to its own jurisdiction. So the village of Moisling was bought from the King of Denmark, and the Jews were living there as subjects of the city republic in a ghetto which differed from the usual Ghetto, only insofar as it was not part of the city corporation. During the French occupation a number of these Jews moved into the city proper, and these were now after the restoration of the old order compelled by an edict of March 6, 1816, to return to their Ghetto village, because their right of free residence had not been granted "by" the government of the state. The spirit of the Frankfurt reaction was milder, but it is clearly expressed in the constitution of July 18, 1816, which declares it to be "the duty of every Christian state to so regulate the rights of the Jewish population that the economic status of the Christian citizens can be maintained". The Jews of Frankfurt had a stronger claim for the maintenance of the status quo than those of other free cities. Their ruler during the French period was a German prince, Baron von Dalberg, and the full political and civic equality granted to them was based on a contract, the Jewish congregation having paid the sum of 400,000 florins as compensation for the former "schutzgeld". They fought against the city in the Federal courts, but all they could obtain was a compromise laid down in the law of Sept. 1, 1824, which granted them freedom of residence and of occupation, though with some restrictions regarding the latter, maintaining also the restriction of marriages, of which only 15 per annum were permitted, and denying to them all political rights. Some of the old patricians found this concession too liberal, among them Simon Moritz von Bethmann, an influential senator, who desired to maintain the Ghetto. The story is told that von Bethmann was in the habit of discussing political questions with a plain baker whose shop he passed on his way home from the council chamber. When he mentioned his insistence on returning to the status which had existed previous to 1807, the baker replied: "Herr von Bethmann, take my advice, when a sausage skin is bursted, you can never put the stuffing back again". And so it was. Simon Moritz von Bethmann, by the way, not of Jewish descent, was an ancestor of the late German chancellor, von Bethmann-Hollweg.

In the other German states we have to distinguish between two principles in dealing with the Jewish question. Some states took all concessions back and returned to the status quo, others left the laws intact, but interpreted them in such a way that they observed them only insofar as they desired. There is a similar difference in regard to dealing with internal Jewish affairs. Some states, usually those which were less reactionary, ignored the religious affairs of the Jews completely; others, usually those that maintained most of the old restrictions, displayed a zealous interest in the management of internal questions of the Jewish community, which is often directly comical, and might have been invented by a humorist to ridicule paternalism.

. Mecklenburg, Oldenburg, and, above all, Saxe-Weimar, furnish us specimens of the latter, and Prussia of the former class. Mecklenburg, which up to this day, has refused to accept the representative form of government, bluntly repealed the liberal law of Feb. 18, 1813, by an edict of Sept. 11, 1817. Oldenburg issued, Aug. 14, 1827, a new regulation of Jewish affairs, maintaining the principle of the Schutzbrief, which was forfeited if its holder became insolvent or was indicted for a crime. It restricted occupation and limited the number of marriages so that out of every family only one member should be allowed to marry. The law of Wuertemberg, April 25, 1828, was more favorable. In Hesse-Cassel the Jews possessed even theoretically the rights of citizens which practically meant nothing, as the conditions of citizenship were so formulated as to make the privision an empty phrase. In the grandduchy of Baden, where the influence of the French neighborhood was felt first, various "Constitutionsedikte", issued from 1806 to 1808, indulged in similar theoretical liberalism, and in Bavaria the constitution of May 26, 1818, declared in sophomoric phraseology that "members of non-Christian religious organizations shall receive only so much of the political rights as has been guaranteed to them in the organic edicts on their reception into the political society". The practical side of this rant is known by its fruits. In the Palatinate, which had been French territory, the Jews possessed full civic and political equality guaranteed to them under international law by section 16 of the Bundesakte. A royal edict of April 6, 1818, declared it valid only insofar as the restrictions, imposed by Napoleon on the credit business of the Jews, were concerned. The Jews could not complain. They were left in the enjoyment of their old legal status. Jewish notables assembled in Munich to discuss the ways and means how to improve their situation. The minister in an order of Nov. 2, 1821, reprimanded them for an agitation directed against the sacred constitution of Bavaria. The former free city of Nuremberg was since 1803 part of Bavaria. It had lost its political autonomy, but retained its right to keep Jews from its walls, as it had done since 1499. A sixteen year old girl of Fuerth, Karoline Lewi, obtained permission in 1824 to spend a few weeks in Nuremberg in order to learn fancy needle work. The mayor protested against this infringement of the old privileges of the city. This case shows that the main contention against the emancipation of the Jews, that they were unwilling to live by the labor of their hands, was insincere. As soon as the Jews made an attempt to enter such fields of honest labor, formerly closed to them, there was an outcry against this invasion which would deprive the poor persecuted Christians of the last chance of earning a livelihood. So the kingdom of Saxony had allowed the Jews to enter the guilds, July 25, 1818, but withdrew this concession again, Oct. 20, 1819.

While in this way the progress of the Jews was hedged in by all sorts of explanations, interpretations and edicts, the authorities of the very same states displayed a great zeal in "humanizing" and emancipating the Jewish religion. King Ludwig of Bavaria, the blind tool in the hands of the adventuress, Lola Montez, who surely had a right to improve morals and religion, encouraged Israel Hirsch Pappenheimer of Munich in the publication of a prayerbook with German translation. This book, published in 1826, was honored by an introduction written by his majesty, in which the hope was expressed that the Jews, seeing the German translation printed by the side of the Hebrew, would by and by become used to the vernacular and so des-Asiatize themselves that they shall become worthy of being placed on one level with Madame Montez. The government took also an interest in the status of the rabbis, and an order of March 10, 1829, demanded from them a high school education. In Baden a ministerial order of Sept. 11, 1827, demanded a government's inspection of the Mikwahs. In Oldenburg the "Kol Nidre" became the object of the special care of the grandduke, who inquired carefully into the antecedents of a candidate for the post of "Landrabbiner" before intrusting him with the care of his beloved subjects, professing the Mosaic religion. The climax was reached in the law of June 20, 1823, issued for the little state of Saxe-Weimar, which had the distinction of counting Goethe among its ministers. This law permitted intermarriage between Jews and Christians, provided that the children should be raised as Christians. It ordered that the services should be held in German. The Landrabbiner had to watch that no one absented himself, and those reported "cutting" lost their peddler's license. His excellency, Herr von Goethe, was rather indignant. He feared very much that intermarriage between Jews and Christians would undermine the very fundamentals of morality, and on morality he was quite an authority.

Conditions in Prussia were quite different. While Bavaria and Saxe-Weimar were eager to modernize the Jewish religion, King Frederick William III. wanted the Jews just so as they had always been. Israel Jacobson and Jacob Herz Beer, the latter the father of the composer, Meyerbeer, had arranged for special services of a reform type in their homes. The King ordered them discontinued, Dec. 9, 1815, and in 1823 he issued a general order, demanding that Jewish services be held exclusively in the traditional way without deviation in language and ceremonies. When he read in a Berlin paper the report of a confirmation that was held in Landsberg a. W. and noticed that some officials and even a Protestant minister had honored the ceremony with their presence, his majesty waxed wroth and issued a strong order against newspapers devoting their space to a description of Jewish affairs, at the same time reprimanding the officials for their "Verstoss gegen Anstand und christliche Sitte". A ministerial order of March 25, 1829, prohibited confirmation in the synagog altogether as an encroachment of the privileges of the church. Another order prohibited the use of the title "preacher" in connection with Jewish ministers. Unfortunately, as has often been the case in the course of our history, Jews in blind partisan spirit aided their enemies. Reuben Samuel Gumpertz, one of the elders of the Berlin congregation, declared in a report submitted to the government Dec. 7, 1820, that a rabbi was not a minister in the same sense as a Christian minister, but merely a "Kauscherwaechter". This was just what bureaucracy needed, and an order of the government, April 24, 1821, declared that rabbis were not ministers of religion in the sense of the law. Previously a ministerial order, dated March 10, 1818, had laid down the policy of the government in the words that the Jews are not a "Religionspartei" but "Truemmer eines aufgeloesten Volkes". The government took care that these scattered fragments of a nation should not be absorbed by their environments. A royal order of Aug. 29, 1816, prohibited that Jews assume Christian names. It was repeated and interpreted several times in subsequent years, for the officials did not know exactly which names were Christian, and a story, probably legendary, has it that a Jew insisted on having the name of his new born son registered as Jesus, which was surely a Jewish name. King Frederick William III. was also delicate enough to write to Meyerbeer's mother that he had bestowed on her in recognition of her services in war relief a medal instead of the Louise order, because the latter, being in the form of a cross, would hurt her feelings.

From these trivialities we turn to the more important question of the political status of the Prussian Jews. Their magna charta, the edict of March 11, 1812, had declared them "Buerger and Einlaender". They possessed full civic and some political rights, as the franchise in municipal elections, and the right of appointment to chairs in the universities. This last provision was abrogated by royal order of Aug. 18, 1822, when it first came to a test. A young Jewish scholar, Eduard Gans, had applied for admission as "privatdozent" of Roman law to the University of Berlin. He was denied this privilege, and probably in order to avoid the repetition of such an eventuality the provision of the law permitting such a case was abolished. Gans removed the obstacle by converting to Christianity, although he was previoulsy the president of the society for "Kultur und Wissenschaft des Judentums", which pledged its members to remain Jews in spite of all temptations. As a little feature, interesting in this connection, it may be related that his grandfather had demanded in his will that his daughters and daughters-in-law should have their hair covered with a bonnet and not adopt the then slowly growing reform practice of the false hair (Scheitel). Another feature which is rather amusing in connection with Gans' conversion is the story that he was calleld to the bedside of his dying grandmother, and the latter, when told that her grandson, "Eliyeh" Gans, had arrived, replied, "He is no more 'ganz Eliyeh'". Somewhat different was the case of Sigmund Zimmern, of Heidelberg, also a jurist. He was admitted as privatdozent by appointment of the minister in 1818. This was the first case of a Jew teaching in a German university. The minister wished to appoint him as professor in 1821, but the faculty was opposed to this move, and Zimmern, formerly an advocate of the emancipation of the Jews, likewise chose the shorter and more convenient road by his conversion to Christianity.

It must again be emphasized that this was the only right granted to the Jews of Prussia in 1812 that was repealed. Yet while all other privileges remained in force, they were interpreted in the narrowest possible manner. The first declaration along this line was that the law of 1812 was restricted to the territory which was Prussian at that time. The Prussia of Aug. 30, 1816, when this interpretation was published, was several times larger than that of 1812, and so the majority of the Jews of Prussia were excluded from the benefit of the law, and the government declaring that all other Jews should be kept under the law of the respective territory where they were living had twenty-two different Jew laws to watch with all the com-

A League of Religions

Address by Hon. Frank O. Lowden, Governor of the State of Illinois, at Patriotic Meeting of the I. O. B. B., held in Chicago, September 29, 1918.

It is a great privilege to be here tonight. Of course, I had known much of B'nai B'rith for many years. I had known how it related itself to all the gentler ministries of life. I knew how tenderly it extended its protection and its friendship over the unfortunate of society. Its vast benevolent work was familiar to us all, but I never came into direct and close contact with this organization until the war arose and I visited our cantonments in different sections of the country where Illinois soldiers were stationed and there saw its work; there saw that the ideas of brotherhood it had represented in time of peace had become a militant force in this war for human brotherhood throughout the earth. Then I came to have an admiration for B'nai B'rith which I can hardly express tonight.

I was not surprised at what I saw there, because the very principles for which this organization stand—human brotherhood, justice, mercy, all of those noble, spiritual qualities which make life worth while—all of those things were challenged by the central empires in this war, which is flaming all around the world. It was appropriate; it was appropriate to the last degree that the membership of this Order should array itself with vigor upon that side whose success alone could insure the continuance of those virtues I have named.

While our boys are fighting on the different battle fronts, those of us who remain at home can go to sleep with less anxiety over our loved ones, because B'nai B'rith and other similar organizations are upon the battle field.

The news which has engrossed us most during the last few days is the heroic efforts of our boys and the many defeats sustained by the central empires. We have read, from time to time, that General Foch, the generalissimo of the Allied armies, is much like our own General Grant in pounding first here, then there, and again in some other front. I want to remind those who are bringing the new peace offensive that there is another respect in which I believe the commander of the Allied armies will resemble General Grant. You may remember that in April, 1862, while Grant was before Donelson, the enemy sent a message asking for a six hours' truce, and that commissioners might be appointed to consider terms of a possible surrender. Six hours only was asked by the general who commanded the Confederate forces in that battle. Listen to the reply of General Grant:

"No terms except an unconditional and immediate surrender can be accepted. I propose to move immediately upon your works."

So I say tonight that if glimpses of Grant's strategy have been discovered in the movements which the Allied armies have made so, too, I believe that an echo of his reply to Buckner will be found in any reply the Allies will make to this or any similar peace offensive.

Let me ask you, who have been interested for years in this great movement, whose diamond jubilee you are celebrating; let me ask you how any self-respecting nation could make any other response than the response the President recently made to the foreign minister of Austria. Because this organization stands for the moral qualities of the universe. It believes that truth is a bigger thing than the sword. It believes that a treaty is a solemn obligation binding upon a nation. It believes that the time has come when the same rule of ethics must control nations that controls individuals; and that, therefore, the moral obligations are the supreme obligations if humanity is to go forward. Believing that, how would it be possible, after the events of the last four years, when the central empires boldly avowed that a treaty was but a scrap of paper; when they declared that the rule of might is the rule of right; when they challenged the world to a test of the proposition that the world and all it contains belonged to the strong, and to the strong alone; how, in the face of those declarations, that would be subversive of every step which progress, humanity and civilization have made in the long centuries, to treat with them until they disavowed their crimes, until they humbly sought to re-enter the circle of the civilized nations of the globe?

There can be no peace discussion until those powers withdraw from the territory which they occupy. Until then, there is but one thing for America and her Allies and that is in the language of General Grant of Illinois, to move immediately upon their works.

I have, during the last few days, been receiving letters from our boys on the battle fronts. There was a time before the war when we wondered if our young men were as self-sacrificing, were as much under the influence of the spiritual things of the world as they had been a generation agone. We wondered if they, in the great stress of battle, would measure up to our heroes of other wars. Whatever our doubts may have been, my friends, those doubts have been dispelled upon a half a hundred battle fields of Europe within the last few months. They have lived up to the best traditions of our past.

There is a paper published in France by our soldier boys called the Stars and Stripes. I find by this paper that the thing which of late has engrossed their mind the most has been the practice of a company or platoon or other unit, great or small, of adopting a little orphan boy or girl of some dead patriot of France. My friends, when your boys are finding solace in tenderly adopting and rearing and educating orphan children of the patriots of immortal France you may be sure that those boys are not engaged in anything of which you would be ashamed. It is a fine thing, it is a wonderful thing that is happening to those boys, and while it is true that the stars upon the service flag are turning more and more from blue to gold, yet with our tears we can with a stern pride feel that they died like men in a great and sacred cause. It is not a question of length of life alone, as those of us who have passed the meridian can testify, and the oldest lives are brief enough at best. It is not the length of life, it is the completeness of human life. I want to tell you today that those boys who, for civilization, for humanity, for righteousness, aye for religion are falling upon the other side, are living lives more rounded and complete, than the lives of those of many times their age at home. When a young man is spending all the wealth of his young manhood in a sacred cause, he is not to be pitied, but to be envied for the career he has had.

As I said before, I am getting letters from the boys almost daily now, and it is one of the great pleasures which come to me. In one of the letters received a few days ago from the commanding officer of an Illinois regiment, who himself has been decorated for bravery upon the field of battle, were enclosed some military orders issued by the French commanders. I thought you would be interested in some of those orders tonight. Here is one dated July 7 by General Gouraud, the commander of the French armies:

"To the French and American Soldiers of the Fourth Army: We may be attacked at any moment. You all know that a defensive battle was never engaged under more favorable conditions. We are awake and on our guard. We are powerfully reinforced with infantry and artillery.

"You will fight on a terrain that you have transformed by your work and by your perseverance into a redoubtable fortress. This fortress will be invincible and all its entrances are well guarded.

"The bombardment will be terrible. You will support it without weakness. The assault will be fierce in a cloud of smoke, dust and gas, but your position, and your armament, are formidable. In your breasts beat the brave and strong hearts of free men.

"That is why your general says to you: You will break this assault and it will be a happy day."

You will recall the Battle of Chateau-Thierry beginning on the 17th of July and how when all the world paused, wondering whether or not the German armies were to reach Paris, how on one day, the khaki clad soldiers from the Western World arrived and stemmed the tide, and helped to win the second battle of the Marne, thus again saving civilization for Europe and for the world.

On July 20, just at the close of that battle, listen to what General Naulin of the Twenty-first Army Corps said of your boys in that battle: "At the moment when the Forty-second American Division is on the point of leaving the Twenty-first Army Corps, I desire to express my keen satisfaction and my sincere thanks for the services which it has rendered under all conditions.

"By its valor, ardor and its spirit, it has very particularly distinguished itself on July 15 and 16 in the course of the great battle where the Fourth Army broke the German offensive on the Champagne front.

"I am proud to have had it under my orders during this period; my prayers accompany it in the great struggle engaged in for the liberty of the world".

And again on Aug. 9 this is what General Degoutte, commanding the Sixth army, which contained American soldiers, had to say of our boys:

"Before the great offensive of July 18 the American troops which were part of the Sixth French army, distinguished themselves by taking from the enemy Bois de la Brigade Marine and the village of Vaux and by stopping his offensive on the Marne and at Fossoy.

"Moreover, they have taken a most glorious part in the second battle of the Marne. rivalling in ardor and valor the French troops. In twenty days of incessant combat they have freed numerous French villages and have realized over difficult country an advance of 40 kilometers, which carried them beyond the Vesle.

"Their glorious deeds are marked by names which will illustrate in the future the military history of the United States:

"Tourcy, Belleau, Plateau D' Etrepilly, Epiedes, le Charme, L'Ourco, Serlinges-et-Nesles, Sergy, LaVesle and Fismes.

"The young divisions, who were under fire for the first time, showed themselves worthy of the old warrior traditions of the regular army. They had the same ardent desire to defeat the Hun, the same discipline which results in the order of the chief being always executed whatever be the difficulties to overcome or the sacrifices to be made.

"The magnificent results obtained are due to the energy and ability of the commanders and the courage of the soldiers.

"I am proud to have commanded such troops".

So when I read that Von Moltke, who commanded the German army in the Franco-Prussian War, when asked something about our battles of the Civil War, replied: "Oh, I am not interested in armed mobs", I couldn't help but think that Germany for half a century has taken her measure of our men from that opinion expressed by the head of the German army, and that they must have had a great reawakening in the last few weeks as they faced these "armed mobs". What an awakening it must have been to them, and what an encouragement to our brave Allies when these raw troops in their first battle, as these great French generals have told us, handled themselves like old, regular troops. So, my friends, it is clear that under our free institutions, where one man is the equal of another, it does not take years of training to make a soldier or a man of an American.

Many of you have friends or sons in some of these French divisions. The 149th artillery of this city, which was organized here, is a part of that glorious 42nd, whose praises I have just read.

Now listen to this. You know the three great soldiers in France today are old Marshal Joffre, whom the world admires and loves; General Foch, who commands all the armies of the Allies, and General Petain. This is what Petain said on Aug. 6:

"Four years of effort with our faithful Allies, four years of trials, stocially accepted, are beginning to bear fruit.

"Broken in his fifth attempt of 1918, the invader is retreating. His effectives are diminishing, his morale is being shaken, while at your side your American brothers, hardly disembarked, are making the enemy, already disconcerted, feel the vigor of their blows.

"Placed continuously at the outposts of the Allied people, you have prepared the triumphs of tomorrow.

"As I told you yesterday: Perseverance, patience, the comrades are arriving.

"I tell you today: Tenacity, audacity, and you will force the victory.

"Soldiers of France, I salute your colors which a new glory renders illustrious".

Wherever civilized men meet, in any capital or city of the Allies, praise for the American soldiers is upon the lips of all. They have brought new distinction to your country, and they are bringing peace and security to all the world. And when this war is over we shall have a better civilization everywhere than we have had in all our past; we shall have a better world. A rude awakening sometimes is needed, and that awakening is coming to all the world, and men are already thinking as they never thought in all their lives of what we can do to make our land a better land, or what we can do to make our state a little nobler state, or what we can do to improve the conditions of mankind everywhere. That is one of the compensations of this war.

I have visited I don't know how many camps since this war began. I have seen the transformation that has been going on in those camps. I have seen how those boys have improved in every way. I have seen the new purpose shining in their eyes, and I tell you, while we may not have as many young men when this war is over as we would have had without it, we will have the finest lot of young manhood in America that there ever has been anywhere.

Let me read you just a word or two from a letter of a private soldier:

"The war is the great pregnant mother from which the world will be born anew, I hope. I am sure that millions of individuals are experiencing their renascence in these days. That is why the war is taking on—no, has long since taken on—the aspects of a sacred crusade; why the American soldiers, "the solemn-looking blokes", have astounded the world by their absolute faith, their wordless determination, their business-like attitude—yet without hatred or rancor in their hearts. I am sure the public mind of America, taken as a whole, more nearly represents the 'righteous wrath' of the prophets than any other national spectacle in history. I tell you, a moment of life in these days is worth an endless death; to feel that a single age is the greatest thing in the world, if it be dedicated to the world; to see bright days for humanity behind the murk; to know that the smile in childish eyes shall not be driven out, and that we have a hand in this—what greater destiny could a man desire"?

My friends, when the lad of twenty or twenty-one years, who is now fighting in this war, has such sentiments as these, because of the awakening which is coming to his soul in this war, is it hard to believe that all of us will face our future duties with a newer and higher sense of citizenship, and with an overwhelming sense of obligation to God and man? No, it is not to be wondered at that every organization that stands for religious or spiritual forces of any kind should be in the forefront of this great struggle; because all they stand for is involved in the issue of this war. At the risk of repetition, let me say again that there never was a war like this in all the history of the world, because for the first time all the forces of evil upon the one side, and all the forces of righteousness upon the other are arrayed against each other. There isn't room in all the sky for two flags representing these two ideals, the ideal of the Junker of Germany that force is the last word in international relations, and that the strong and the strong alone shall rule the earth, and that other ideal, that many were not born simply to be the slaves of some autocrat or to live at the mercy of the sword of the despot.

This war must go on until either the black eagles of Prussia or the Stars and Stripes, with those other banners representing the liberty of man and the civilization of the world, shall occupy all the sky. There is not room for both.

Therefore the heroes like these boys in the ranks may well say, as the young man from whom I have quoted says: "What greater destiny could a man desire"?

Among other things that we shall hope for at the end of this war is a league of nations, because mankind is just beginning to learn that you cannot trust the selfish autocrat to keep the peace of the world, but that something else must come. So a league of nations is one of the things for which the enlightened nations hope. It is not likely that all wars at once shall be suppressed; but that they will be reduced in number and extent no one can doubt.

As I said a moment ago, I have visited I don't know how many camps, and everywhere I have noted the work of B'nai B'rith. I was down in Louisville almost a year ago, where we had many thousands of soldiers in camp; I happened to be there on Sunday. I was invited to make a speech in the building of the Young Men's Christian Association, and the committee that came for me consisted of a representative of that organization, a representative of B'nai B'rith and a representative of the Knights of Columbus, and it was fitting, because the God of the Protestant and of the Catholic and of the Jew is against the principles for which the German military autocracy stands. And the thought

Diamond Jubilee Celebration of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith

The seventy-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith and the golden jubilee of the institution of District Grand Lodge No. 6, was jointly celebrated in the city of Chicago with a program of festivities beginning Saturday evening, September 28th.

Members of the Executive Committee of the Order, officers of the District Grand Lodge and delegates numbering over one hundred were present from all parts of the country.

On Saturday evening, September 28th, a reception was tendered the visiting guests and ladies at the Covenant Club, a B'nai B'rith institution.

On Sunday morning, September 29th, the festivities were formally ushered in to Thanksgiving Services at Sinai Temple. Owing to the illness of Dr. Emil G. Hirsch, who was prevented thereby from conducting the services and delivering the sermon, Dr. Tobias Schanfarber opened the services with a prayer and was followed by Dr. Joseph Stolz, who read the services appropriate to Simchas Torah.

Dr. Edward N. Calisch, of Richmond, Va., delivered a sermon, emphasizing the responsibilities and duties of the Order in the present crisis. Dr. Rabbi Samuel S. Cohon of Chicago made the closing prayer.

In the evening at the Auditorium Theater in the presence of an enthusiastic audience, numbering over 3,000, the patriotic meeting was successfully carried out. Mr. Adolf Kraus, president of the Order, presided.

Congratulatory letters from prominent statesmen were read by Mr. Sig. Livingston as follows:

From Vice-President of the United States: "I congratulate the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith upon the seventy-fifth anniversary of its founding and upon its splendid career of usefulness to the world, both national and international.

"You look upon your great Nazarene as a religious teacher. I believe Him to have been your promised Messiah. However you may view Him, your organization has been putting into practical effect His great commandment which, becoming the law and guide of conduct of men the world around, will make the era of universal peace then certain.

"May your good work long continue and long prosper.

"Thomas R. Marshall".

From the Speaker, House of Representatives:

"I desire to congratulate most heartily the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith on celebrating its seventy-fifth anniversary in the City of Chicago. I think it has been of great service not only to the Jews but to mankind in general.

"I hope it will live to celebrate many more anniversaries.

"Champ Clark".

From the Secretary of the Treasury:

"I send my warm congratulations to the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith on the celebration of its seventy-fifth anniversary.

"Your organization has done much in these seventy-five years of which its members may justly be proud, but the thing which I feel sure makes every one in the Order thrill with a new pride is the fact that thousands of its members are on the front, fighting for the destruction of military despotism in the world and thus making sure that democracy and the ideals of justice and humanity will be made supreme everywhere.

"Please convey to your membership my earnest good wishes and my sincere hope that a future of even greater national usefulness and service, if that is possible, will mark the career of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith.

"Wm. G. McAdoo".

From the Attorney General:

"Permit me to extend felicitations to the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, which is celebrating its seventy-fifth anniversary in the city of Chicago.

"I congratulate the organization on its wonderful career of usefulness, both nationally, which stands on a platform inculcating charity, benevolence and brotherly love as the highest virtues. I am informed that thousands of members of the organization are at the front. Its record in the founding of homes, hospitals and schools has earned for it highest commendation. May it continue to grow in usefulness as it celebrates succeeding anniversaries.

"T. W. Gregory".

From the Secretary, Department of Commerce:

"It is a source of much gratification to me to know that the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is to be appropriately celebrated in the city of Chicago, and I take this opportunity of congratulating the organization on its record of useful accomplishment. I am told that it is entitled to carry upon its service flag thousands of stars. What a fine thing to see this American organization, which has founded homes and hospitals and schools, sending thousands of crusaders to destroy, root and branch, the fiendish spirit which, with inconceivable malice, seeks the destruction of just such institutions and their helpless inmates.

"The seventy-fifth anniversary of this organization is a fitting time to place on record a vow to continue the good fight until the victory of our brave boys and their brothers-in-arms shall be complete, and never can it be considered to be complete until arbithary power and oppression and cruelty shall be driven from the face of the earth.

"With all good wishes for your loyal and humane organization, I invoke the blessings of heaven upon the just cause in which we are all enlisted.

"Wm. C. Redfield".

From the Secretary of the Navy:

"I wish I could give myself the pleasure of being present at the 75th anniversary of the B'nai B'rith and meet the members of this fraternal organization, which has during all its existence been foremost in every movement to alleviate the sufferings of humanity and make the world a better place in which to live. The record is writ in hospitals and schools and in the care taken of those who are oppressed and persecuted. It is a record that will be a stimulus to men in other years to continue the good work so well begun.

"Josephus Daniels".

From the Secretary of the Interior:

"I wish to extend my congratulations to the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith upon reaching its seventy-fifth anniversary. It is a wholesome, hearty and patriotic organiaztion which represents in spirit and in act the broad catholicity and generosity of the Jewish people.

"Franklin K. Lane".

From the Assistant Secretary, War Department:

"In the absence of the Secretary of War I wish to express for the War Department appreciation of the significant contributions to America the B'nai B'rith has made in the seventy-five years of its organization. Your long record of patriotic achievement comes to a fit culmination now in your contribution of thousands of men to the cause of America and her allies. And it is particularly fitting that the B'nai B'rith should make so great a contribution to our cause, for B'nai B'rith has throughout represented Liberty and Democracy and bent its efforts to further the forces of Freedom. We are all joined now in the supreme effort for Freedom and you may well be proud that you are so splendidly doing your part in our undertaking. May the next seventy-five years of your life be as prosperous and as fruitful of good as these past seventy-five years have been, with a prosperity that will have an even finer meaning in the new era that will begin with our victory.

"F. P. Keppel".

From the Secretary of Labor:

"I extend to the B'nai B'rith my congratulations on the occasion of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the establishment of the society and an expression of the hope that the good work of the society along all benevolent and patriotic lines may continue hereafter as in the past to increase with each succeeding year of the society's existence.

"W. B. Wilson".

From the Secretary of State:

"I have learned with much interest that the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith will soon celebrate its seventy-fifth anniversary.

"I hasten to extend my congratulations to the organization for its long service in the interest of education and the cause of humanity, and will appreciate it if you will kindly convey these sentiments to the membership.

"Robert Lansing".

From the Postmaster General:

"Wherever high character, patient devotion to principle and lofty loyalty are held in esteem an interest will be felt in the celebration of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith of its 75th anniversary.

"Without undertaking to review what this organization has done to the betterment of social conditions and public affairs, I want to pay the tribute of appreciation to an organization whose purposes are lofty and whose guidance is that of broad intelligence.

"An impersonal philanthropy which aims at the improvement of human conditions and international in its vision must inspire universal esteem and the gratitude of those who see in altruism something greater than the vain propounding of a theory. This is the sort of international spirit which does not lose sight of the national spirit of loyalty and patriotism.

"Much has been said, and little well thought out, concerning internationalism. In some minds the term has been given an unfortunate twist which makes it mean the stultification of national character. The only kind of internationalism that is worth considering or is at all possible is that which recognizes the freedom of thought, choice of government and respect for the rights of man, and does not destroy national life or weaken the spirit of patriotism which binds people together in organized society. You represent an international spirit of the highest quality which is characterized by intense loyalty toward that nation which is yours and a respect for the rights of others which makes for international harmony. Your good will, your sympathy and human fellowship extend beyond national boundary lines, but your loyalty and patriotism are intensely for your own country while you offer a helping hand to the oppressed of all nations.

"A. S. Burleson".

From ex-President William H. Taft:

"I am very sorry that my engagements are such as to make it impossible for me to be with you during the first week of October, to speak at the seventy-fifth anniversary celebration of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith. I respect the Order very highly, and would be glad to take part in the celebration of its long life of usefulness, but I must deny myself the pleasure".

From Senator H. Cabot Lodge:

"I am very glad to send a word of congratulation to the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, whose long career of usefulness both national and international is well known. I know how much they have done in the largest way for charity, and that they have thousands of members at the front shows their earnestness in the war. I am sure that it is a thoroughly American organization and believes with all other Americans that this war must be crowned by a complete victory which will place Germany where she can never again disturb the peace of the world".

Congratulatory telegrams and letters were also received from a great many of its members and a number of sister organizations.

The principal speaker of the evening and guest of honor was Mr. Frank O. Lowden, Governor of the State of Illinois. He lauded the part played by Jews and by members of the Order in the war.

Governor Lowden was followed by Brother Simon Wolf, of Washington, who delivered a short but forceful address.

Mr. Lucius L. Solomons of San Francisco, first vice-president of the Order, delivered an eloquent address.

The service flag of the Order, showing that 3,256 of its members are in the government service, was dedicated by Brother Edward Sonnenschein, of Chicago, president of District Grand Lodge No. 6.

Senator James Hamilton Lewis and Dr. Emil G. Hirsch were announced as speakers of the meeting. Senator Lewis, however, was prevented from being present, owing to an important conference with the President of the United States, and Dr. Hirsch, owing to illness.

During the evening the program was interspersed with musical selections by Madame Irene Pavloska.

The closing prayer was delivered by Dr. Edward N. Calisch.

On Monday evening, September 30, 1918, a class initiation under the auspices of the Central B'nai B'rith Council of Chicago, representing the local lodges, was held at the Hotel La Salle. More than two hundred candidates were initiated by the degree team of the council. The occasion was honored by the presence of the president of the Order, the members of the Executive Committee of the Order and a number of Grand Lodge officers.

Short addresses dwelling upon the history, accomplishments and purposes of the Order were made by President Adolf Kraus, Honorable Simon Wolf, Dr. Edward N. Calisch, Charles Hartman, Archibald A. Marx and Lucius L. Solomons.

After the meeting was closed in due form, a supper was served to the members in the main dining rooms of the hotel.

On Wednesday evening, O[illegible] [illegible], 1918, a banquet was held in the Louis Fourteenth Room of the Hotel La Salle, which was attended by many hundred members of the Order and their ladies. Mr. Adolf Kraus presided, the speakers included Honorable Victor Rosewater of Omaha, Neb., who spoke on behalf of District Grand Lodge No. 6, Honorable Simon Wolf of Washington, who spoke on behalf of the Order, and Judge Julian M. Mack, who outlined the hopes and aspirations connected with the Balfour declaration regarding Palestine, the homeland of the Jews.

The following greetings were received:

"Because as a member of the Liberty Loan Central Committee of this district I am to my regret unable to absent myself at this time or it would have given me great gratification to join in your seventy-fifth anniversary celebration. During the three quarters of a century existence of the Order it has steadfastly promoted every ideal for which Jewry stands and so constantly labored for the weal of entire Israel that I can wish to you its exceptionally efficient executive head and your worthy associates nothing better than the Order may continue to grow and prosper in years to come as it has in the past. Mechayil El Chayil.

"Jacob H. Schiff".

"So much regret that I cannot be with you to listen to your deliberations and hear about the remarkable achievements of your Order during the seventy-five years of its existence.

"Nathan Straus".

On Saturday evening preceding the celebration, a meeting of the General Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 6 was held. The convention of the District Grand Lodge was opened on Monday morning at the Hotel La Salle and the sessions were brought to a close on Wednesday evening.

An extensive program of entertainments for the visiting ladies and members of the Order was successfully carried out by the local lodges. It included a dinner to the Executive Committee on Sunday, luncheons to the delegates and members of the Executive Committee, luncheons to the visiting ladies on the various days at Marshall Field's, Mandel Brothers, Hotel Blackstone and the Art Institute; automobile rides through the city's parks and boulevards, a social evening for the ladies at the Covenant Club, and a theater party followed by a supper.

The Executive Committee of the Order held its annual meeting on Sunday afternoon, Monday forenoon and Tuesday.

comes to me that, while we are evolving the league of nations, maybe we could also evolve a league of religions, in which all religions that believe in justice and mercy, all religions that believe in the fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man, should have a part. Each would keep its own organization, just as in a league of nations. France would still be France, with all her charm; England would still be England, with all her might, and the United States would preserve her individuality through all the years. Why should not there be a league of religions, as a league of nations, to insure the dominance of righteousness throughout the future of the world?

THE CONVERSION MOVEMENT IN AUSTRIA

Dr. Bloch's Wochenschrift (Vienna), has printed an article dealing with the alarming spread of the conversion movement in Austria, and especially in the old citadel of Judaism, Galicia. The Wochenschrift finds that the war, contrary to assertions, has not improved the morale of the people and has ruined the old family life. The abnormal conditions of Austrian Jewish life during the war, have led to a conversion epidemic, which was bound to attract the serious attention of the Community. The paper blames the communal leaders for allowing the impoverished Jews to suffer to such an extent that they should have to apply for relief to the missionaries. It also censures the government for distributing all war honors and relief to non-Jews in preference to our coreligionists. It appears that the missionaries have taken advantage of the plight of the Jews in Galicia and in Bukowina and have organized there relief to needy Jews who consent to change their religion. Even missionaries from neutral countries, under the guidance of a Dane, M. Clausen, have penetrated there.

THE REACTION OF THE WAR

Address by Hon. Victor Rosewater at Diamond Jubilee Banquet of the Order, Chicago, October 2, 1918

As everyone knows, we are in the midst of the most colossal world war that has ever devastated the face of the globe—a war that has drawn into it all the great nations of the earth, including our own; a war upon whose issue depends the future course of mankind; a war which can have only one outcome—the triumphant vindication of the cause of democracy in which our American people are enlisted. It is only a question of time and we believe now a very short time, till the victory will be ours. A little while ago it was our boast that we were neutral; that we didn't care who licked the Kaiser. Now we have ceased to be neutral and we insist on it that our American soldiers shall have the privilege of carrying the Stars and Stripes right into Berlin and there tell the Kaiser just where he gets off.

For all of us this war has already changed the entire program of our daily doings; has completely recast our thought and mental attitude; has turned our outlook upon the future into new or different channels. After this war the map of the world will never again be what it was before, but the changes in the map will be as nothing compared with the transformation which will have been worked in our social and industrial relations by the leaven of liberty that is permeating further and further the masses and classes of the people, both in and out of the war arena.

I have chosen as my subject "The Reactions of the War". It would be the height of presumption on my part to pretend that I have any better vision of what is to come than have you or any other careful observer of current events. None of us may lay claim to powers of prophesy or to ability to see ahead of the uncertainties and hazards of these war-racked times. I confess that when the conflict first broke I permitted myself to be persuaded that it could not continue in all its destructiveness and exhaustiveness more than a year at most, so that today, in the fifth year of the war fury, I have little faith in my own judgment for setting a definite limit. We cannot say with certainty the war will be over this year or next year—it is possible it may be over sooner than we dare to hope—but what we can do and what it is our duty to do, regardless of hopes or fears, is to take a survey of what is happening about us, to inform ourselves as to the road we are traveling, even if we cannot locate the exact destination. We can ask ourselves a lot of questions that are very pertinent to the situation, though we may not answer them with any great degree of self-satisfaction.

In this terrible war the Jew is participating, not as a race or a nation, but as a citizen or subject of every country that is in it. The Jew is fighting in every army and under every flag, accepting the obligations and penalties that have followed him for centuries since the tribes of Israel were scattered to the four corners of the earth. In every warring country he is rendering unto Caesar that which is Caesar's—his property, his brawn, his brain, his life—with the same willingness, the same faithfulness, the same patriotism as is displayed by any other summoned to the sacrifice. What more can be done? What more can be asked? What is to be the recompense to the Jew specifically and in common with the rest of the great army fighting for the unhampered progress of civilization?

It is gratifying to know that the loyalty of the Jew in this country is not unnoticed. I find in the copy of Meredith Nicholson's book, "The Valley of Democracy", just off the presses, which the author has sent me, this handsome tribute from a source which is surely not biased but aiming only to be fair:

"In contrast with the equivocal loyalty of Germans who have sought to perpetuate and accentuate the hyphen, it is a pleasure to testify to the admirable spirit with which the Jewish people in these western states have repeatedly manifested their devotion to America. Many of these are of German birth or the children of German immigrants, and yet I am aware of no instance of a German Jew in the region most familiar to me who has not warmly supported the American cause. They have not only given generously to the Red Cross and to funds for French and Belgian relief, quite independently of their efforts in behalf of people of their own race in other countries, but they have rendered most important aid in all other branches of war activities".

The reactions of the war may be viewed from many angles. Under the classification I have adopted we may ask how is the war helping the Jew to know better himself and his fellow-Jews, how is it making him know other people better, how is it letting other people know more of the Jew?

First, then, what is the world war doing to bring the Jew to a fuller realization of himself? It is obviously making us all appreciate the magnitude of powers previously latent and resources undreamed of. I will not dwell on the ready acceptance of the draft for the army which has fallen uniformly upon all elements of our population, nor on the exceptional response to the campaigns for Liberty Bonds, for Red Cross and welfare work to back up the boys in the trenches. The Fourth Liberty Loan is just getting under way, and it must and will have your support to the utmost. It should be a privilege as much as a duty to invest in a government security, in this government of the people, to loan your money to yourself. The more exacting test is in the outright donation to war relief funds. Who five years ago would have thought it possible for the Jews in this country to raise $5,000,000 within a year for relief of unfortunate and oppressed co-religionists in desolated European countries? Had anyone doubled the figure and suggested that $10,000,000 be collected as such a free will offering the answer would have been "impossible". Yet we have gone over that top and today are setting the figure at $15,000,000, and the doubters are nowhere to be found.

In the comparatively small city of Omaha where I reside, to use it only as as example with which I happen to be familiar, we last year raised nearly $60,000 for the Jewish war relief. One philanthropic man of means offered to add ten per cent to whatever sum should be contributed. He told me he thought he might be called on to pay $2,500 to $3,000 at most. He finally paid $5,000. This year the campaign in Omaha has not yet closed, but it had already gone over the $73,000 mark and the renewed offer of an added ten per cent is going to cost the man who made it not less than $8,000 to $9,000, and he will be glad to pay up.

"In the bright lexicon of youth," the Cardinal Richelieu is made to say, "there is no such word as fail," and in the arithmetic of the Jews of America when thoroughly aroused in a righteous cause and organized behind leaders who are competent and possess confidence, no sum is beyond reach. Let no one hereafter fear that any project or enterprise that carries the sympathetic appeal of help for the oppressed and unfortunate is too large to be put across.

What has been done in this country may well start us to pondering on the possibilities when the Jews of the old countries come into their own freed from the bondage that has kept them back. What can they not do for themselves and for the world after a generation or two of education, self-development and expansion?

Again, the war is making the Jew learn the ways of other people. To my mind, one of the greatest and most lasting benefits in counterbalance of the hardships of our army conscription plan is coming in the broadened experience of the boys who don the khaki and the women who go into war work. The soldier who is sent to training camps at points distant from his home, rubbed up against his fellow soldiers in most intimate contact, then transported overseas to scenes and life far different from what he was previously accustomed to, who sees something of the world and of how other folks live, cannot fail to lose part of his provincialism. Over in Europe they have broken down and forever destroyed the pale, but each of us is circumscribed by a pale of larger or smaller circumference out of which we seldom emerge, but every time we do get out we have our wits sharpened and our visions widened. The military service is taking our American boys as well as their European compatriots out of the pale of narrowness and smallness, and cannot fail to return them to us bigger and broader, more tolerant and more self-reliant. The same thing is true in a lesser degree of the women who are filling the ranks of war workers at home.

As a further reaction of the war, we may be sure other folks, the strangers, are coming in touch with the Jew and are learning to know him as he is rather than as he has been commonly caricatured and maligned. In a word, the Gentiles are having their eyes opened to the true character and real worth of the Jew as a fellowman. They are seeing him bear his full share of the burden of a war waged not specially for his benefit but for humanity as a whole; they are seeing that the Jewish soldier is made of the same kind of stuff as his fellows, is just as brave, just as faithful, just as patient in suffering, just as considerate if not more so, claiming no credit unless earned; that he is just as human though he adheres to the religion of Abraham and Moses; that being a Jew in no way discredits him as a man. Is not the inevitable tendency of this discovery to mitigate the inherited prejudice against the Jew? Is it not sure in the long run to put a brake on the forces of discrimination and persecution? I do not overlook the counter current set in motion by the very widening of the Jew's activity and the recognition of his exceptional service when opportunity is offered. Envy and rivalry is engendered whenever a Jew occupies a conspicuous place, wherever a Jew gets in front of someone who thinks he is thus held back and stirring up prejudice is still the handy weapon of reprisal, but I have a firm faith that merit will command recognition and win out in the long run.

We may safely affirm, then, that no gigantic struggle like the present carried on for the avowed purpose of saving the liberties of the people from autocratic domination can go on without weakening the power of tradition and superstition rooted in ignorance and malevolence, which we know are at the base of the big problems with which we have been confronted as Jews.

Only a few years ago I went down to Washington along with some of you, to emphasize in person the protest we were making against the flagrant disregard of our treaty rights in Russia by denial of passports presented by American citizens suspected to be of Jewish faith. We finally prevailed upon our own government to give notice of abrogation of the treaty and withdrawal of the reciprocal privileges of trade and travel until American citizenship and not religious affiliation should be the sole test. I take it that as one of the reactions of the war the Russian passport question is sure to be settled, and settled as we insisted it should be. True, we have no treaty with Russia, but the ban has been removed by the irresistible sequence of events, as I believe, never again to be raised, whatever government may eventually prevail in Russia.

New light is being thrown also on our immigration problem, although by no means so simple nor as near its solution. In fifteen years up to the outbreak of the world war, we admitted to this country 13,377,087 immigrants or nearly 1,000,000 a year, of which approximately one-tenth or 100,000 a year were listed as Jewish immigrants. I do not need to discuss the perplexing difficulties this situation presented.

With the stoppage of regular ocean traffic in 1914, the flow of immigration was completely cut off. When will it be resumed? Will it ever again reach the former magnitude? We may merely speculate on the answer. We hear much talk of the principle of self-determination, which is understood to mean that the smaller nationalities of Europe shall be permitted to decide for themselves what sort of government they want or at least have fair consideration given to their national aspirations. But will the principle of self-determination be applied to the movement of the individual within the country and as between one country and another? Will the Jew living in Europe be accorded the right to locate freely in any town or in any rural district in his native country? Or will he be held to the spot where he was born, not to remove except by special favor? Will he have a right of self-determination that will let him emigrate to the United States or to any other land of his choice? Or will Europe, after peace is restored, insist on retaining all their man power in order to recuperate faster their diminished populations, rebuild their industries and help pay the bills incurred in the work of destruction? Will labor conditions abroad be such as to make work over here attractive by comparison? Will Europe liberalize her institutions and government so that our long-established freedom and popular form of government become less luring than of old? Above all, will race prejudice, social ostracism and religious persecution gradually subside or break out anew? If emigration is permitted, will it be more stringently controlled and directed to colonial possessions or to particular countries whose resources it is desired to exploit? So far as our own government is concerned, we have a new restriction policy embodied in our most recent legislation setting up tests of fitness for admission certain to bar large classes which we used to welcome to our shores but who are now warned to keep out. On the factors indicated by these questions will our future immigration problem turn, but it will be a new problem far different from the old one.

Let me dwell a moment upon one other related reaction which may be expected from the war. I refer to what we call social welfare work, in a small way already begun before the war. What we are doing for the health, comfort, education, wholesome amusement of our soldiers in training camp and overseas opens a vista into what must be done for our army of industrial workers, and more especially for the young folks from which the industrial army is constantly recruited. What we are doing in the way of civilian relief to protect the dependent families of soldiers from want and hardship marks a field that will have to be better covered for the unfortunate victims of the march of civilization in times of peace. The human wreckage of the war must be taken care of not as a charity but as a duty gratefully performed, and so also must be cared for and set in the path of contentment, and if possible self-support and usefulness the helpless and unfortunate, the widows and the orphans, the temporarily sick, the permanently disabled, the aged and infirm, all those who need a helping hand.

It is here in this work that a great fraternal and benevolent order like the B'nai B'rith has a wonderful future for service. What it has accomplished we may rest assured is but a guaranty of greater things. Our presence here is in part to celebrate the diamond jubilee of the order and the golden anniversary of the organization of this district.

Just think of it! When application for a charter was presented July 28, 1867, it was abruptly rejected on the ground that there were not enough members enrolled to constitute a district. But persistence brings its reward, and a year later the action was reconsidered and the request granted, and on Oct. 1, 1868, just fifty years ago, District No. 6 was separated from District No. 2, embracing, as then constituted, six lodges with a membership of 511, and under the district presidency of the late lamented Henry Greenebaum. The district organization today contains fifty-one lodges, with a total membership in round numbers of 7,600. Since its inception the district has devoted approximately $1,750,000 to charitable and fraternal purposes, assisting in the organization of the Cleveland Orphan Asylum, the Leon U. Levi Memorial Hospital at Hot Springs, the National Jewish Hospital for consumptives, Social Service Work, the free employment bureau at Chicago and the boys' summer camp at Crystal Lake. From narrow confines of the three states of Illinois, Iowa and Wisconsin its territorial jurisdiction has grown to include also Minnesota, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, Michigan and parts of Canada. I esteem it an honor to speak for and pay tribute publicly to the great Order of the B'nai B'rith and this vitally important district, and to extend congratulations on this auspicious anniversary. In peace and in war and most of all in the peace that is to come after this war, may there continue to be agencies for self-improvement, for education and social uplift, for broadmindedness and equal opportunity, for enlightened charity and well-directed welfare work, for a democratic fraternity and fraternity in democracy.

NEWS FROM LONDON

By Our Correspondent Dr. M. Epstein

London, Sept. 17, 1918.

We are in the midst of the High Holy Days, and, as is but natural, the wartime has colored them completely. We were, however, spared last year's anxiety about enemy aerial visitations. Last year's broken Kol Nidre service is not likely to be forgotten by any London Jew. This year—such are the ups and downs of war—the Jews in Frankfort, Mayence or Karlshrue will share the experience with us of London. Indeed, the Frankfort community was publicly informed in the press by the executive that owing to air-raid danger the ladies' galleries in all the synagogues would be closed both on New Year's Day and the Day of Atonement, save only for a short interval; that children under 11 would not be admitted at all; that in case a warning is given the cloak rooms would be closed until the "all clear" was sounded, and that those who came to synagogues did so at their own risk. Last year the German papers, including even the more liberal journals, gave expression to their joy that London was so successfully bombed. Now that they are being paid back in their own coin it is to be hoped that they regret that their government commenced this senseless and useless form of warfare. The Frankfort Synagogue warning is symptomatic. It is a horrible feeling wherever one finds it—whether on the Thames or on the Main. But the cause of it, the people who are responsible, are the German military clique, whose chief is a man with God's name on his lips. God were better kept out of all this miserable business.

But while we have not this year experienced the actual brunt of war, the war makes itself felt in other ways. In olden days sukkahs were quite common in London. A firm of builders specialized in setting up these structures, which were adorned by the members of the family ordering them. This year it is difficult to obtain timber; the army's claim is first, and fruit decorations are likely to be scarce. Even Ethrogim will be rare. About 800 are available for the whole of the United Kingdom, and as each synagogue is bound to have at least one, there will be few left for individual purchasers. The communal booths will this year have to be strictly plain in structure and adornment, but we will bear with this state of affairs in the hope that the war may be nearing its end and that the ensuing peace, which, by the way, the Americans are hastening on, will restore the old-time joy of the Sukkoth Festival in its completeness.

After all, inadequate sukkahs are a small matter compared with the deeper ravages of war. We do not refer to the lengthening list of those who gave their all for their country. The Memorial for the Dead in this year's Atonement service included a large number of our best young men of promise and of parts, whose names will be engraved on the war shrines in public places. And yet there are people about who do not know that Jews are serving their country in the army! No need for despair on that account, however; truth and justice must prevail, and the Jew will obtain his due share of recognition for his complete citizenship. But those that are gone are gone. It is we, the living left behind, who must so construct our lives as to bring them to accord with the highest and best ideals. Ideals—that is the sphere where the Jew leads, today as of old. And one reason surely for his inherent strength of soul—a quality admitted by all observers in all the ages—is his purity of blood. We call it Race; and pride of race is today recognized by the best thinkers as a good element in the world. Among races Jews were of the purest. Are they still?

The war which has uprooted all the landmarks and has revolutionized all standards and loosened all bonds has given a marked impetus to intermarriage. So strong has this tendency become that the Chief Rabbi has been moved to urge every Jewish minister to make this the theme of his discourse on the holiest day of the year. Words, however, must be of little avail here. The evil complained of is but the result of co-operating causes. The upheaval of the war is certainly one. But another is surely the neglect of the Jewish spirit among our young people. If this diagnosis is correct, we have at any rate one plank in the platform of communal and religious reconstruction in the post-bellum period.

But it is possible to say that the result which the Chief Rabbi deplores is unavoidable in the present environment. Give Jews their own environment and results of this kind will not be produced. Will anyone deny that there is much to be said in support of this view? It must lend an added attraction for all those who care for the Palestine scheme. What is more, as long as Jews in fairly large numbers live their own lives in the land of their fathers, intermarriage in the Diaspora will lose much of its danger. It will still be undesirable from the point of view of race purity; but it will be less threatening. One hopes that the preachers yesterday did not fail to lay stress on this aspect of the subject, and so call attention to a topic which is claiming the interest of wider circles of Jews. The hope is gaining ground that one result of the war may be the establishment of a Jewish Palestine under British rule. It is a fervent hope, for British Jews are not only proud of their citizenship but they understand its significance; they know that it stands for justice. Justice is a Jewish ideal. "Justice, justice shalt thou pursue"!

All this is still hidden in the future. Meanwhile the present calls, and work in Palestine is proceeding apace. The British army of occupation is busy ameliorating conditions, and these activities are seconded by Zionist effort. The American Zionist Medical Unit will do splendid humanitarian work; while Captain Leonard Stein has been fortunate enough to have been selected by the Foreign Office to direct the general activities of the Zionists in Palestine. Captain Stein is one of our brilliant young men. Educated at the St. Paul's School, and then at Balliol College, Oxford, he has evinced an interest in Palestine ever since his student days. He visited the country many years ago. He threw himself heart and soul into the Palestine Society, which before the war attempted, and successfully attempted, to win the interest of Jews in their ancient, historic land. Captain Stein has seen service in France; he can also boast of no little administrative work in one of the government offices, and his legal training—he is a barrister—should stand him in good stead now.

We have dwelt at length on Captain Stein's career because it is of the utmost importance that the officials who are to run the various organizations must be first-rate men. No others will do. We must have the best. Captain Stein will be a fine start; it is only to be hoped that those who are to be sent out in due course will be worthy of co-operation with him, both in regard to training and ability, and also in regard to character. For Captain Stein possesses rare gifts of mind and heart which fit him in a marked degree for the work he has undertaken. Perhaps his name will go down in Jewish history as the first of a long line of distinguished officials who may be destined to build up Palestine. Certainly his opportunity is unique, and he comes to the country after the Palestine Commission has laid the foundation of the preliminary work.

Charity has been reformed and reorganized. Education has been put on a sound basis and provision has been made for growth. Most of all, and best of all, the Jewish university of Jerusalem has been planted. As yet its physical boundaries have been drawn. Bricks and mortar will be brought thither in due course, after the war, and its spirit will be kindled at no distant date. Whatever its first program may be, and whatever its ultimate dimensions, certain it is that it will add to the world's good forces in an eminent degree. That is its claim to existence. It needs no better. It will be a center of Jewish thought, a clearing house of Jewish ideas, a spring at which Jewish youth from all corners of the earth will slake their thirst for knowledge—always a great thirst. The Jewish university will enter into the inheritance of the ancient schools of the prophets and the world-famed academies of later ages. When all is said, the world cannot have too much thought. The numerous systems have had their day and ceased to be, the war has been tried in the balance and found wanting, even the systems that were regarded as the mainstay of western Europe. What will emerge from the desolation of civilization will be the Jewish elements in modern life—the ten Commandments, the nineteenth chapter of Leviticus, the social teaching of the prophets. There will be room for Jewish thinking, which for the last twenty centuries has not had its fair chance. The Jewish university at Jerusalem will give it that chance. At best, it will be a boon to the world; at worst, it will add another university to the world's list, and there are far too few universities in the world.

Meanwhile the needs of the present receive, as they must, immediate attention. The British army of occupation issues a Hebrew newspaper which is exceedingly well done, and a Hebrew-English and English-Hebrew dictionary is in preparation. Since man does not live by bread alone, these efforts are exceedingly cheering. Relief of poverty is good; the cultivation of Hebrew in Palestine is a proper accompaniment. The conjunction of the two augurs well for the future, and one is inclined to envy Captain Stein for his unique opportunity.

There was in all the London synagogues during the New Year and Day of Atonement services a good sprinkling of Jewish soldiers, and readers of this page may be interested to learn that Americans were included among them. The War Office authorities granted special Holy-Day leave to all Jewish officers and men, and the American military authorities did likewise. Of course, only soldiers in the country could avail themselves of this leave; for those in France it was obviously out of the question. We undestand that of the Jewish soldiers who came to London, several hundreds had no homes of their own to go to. But they were placed by the Hospitality Committee over the metropolis with Jewish families, who gladly undertook to make them feel at home. A good number of co-religionists from the United States and Canada—both officers and men—were thus provided for, and it is indeed pleasing to place on record that this admirable work was admirably performed by Mrs. Henry Wolff, the wife of the treasurer of the First Lodge of England. Here again we have an illustration of the way in which the London Lodge has served a useful purpose. There were and are—without any doubt—numbers of people in the London community who are ready and willing to be of assistance in all good causes. The lodge has, among other things, proved a center for such people, and while every ounce of credit is due to Bro. Henry Wolff and his wife for their magnificent, energetic and successful endeavors, the lodge may yet indirectly claim to have a share in their achievement. In normal times the lodge would no doubt have been able to share in its corporate capacity. In present conditions, when the greater number of the brethren is scattered, when many are engaged on national work, the lodge must rely on its individual members. In this respect Mrs. Henry Wolff and her husband merit our great thanks.

The French Jews have shown hospitality as warm as ours for those American Jewish soldiers who were in France during the high holidays. That the Americans are loved in France—loved is not too strong a term—our readers know full well. They may rest assured that their dear ones who are now across the Channel found a warm reception at the hands of the French Jewries to whom they came to spend the Holy Days. This drawing together is good. We want to know each other. Not merely Jew and Jew, but man and man—the Englishman, the Canadian the Australian, the American, the Frenchman, the Italian. A league of nations can be based only on trust and confidence. and these come from personal acquaintance. As Jews the idea of a league of nations must be very dear to us. Apart from its intrinsic worth, were we not the first to enunciate it? President Wilson, we do not doubt, would hardly hesitate to declare his indebtedness to the eleventh chapter of Isaiah, "And the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea."

These ideas are very precious, now perhaps more than ever. The Chief Rabbi has realized this, and has compiled a little anthology of Jewish thoughts, primarily intended for Jewish sailors and soldiers, which deserves exceeding high praise. Therein are collected not only appropriate extracts from the Bible, but translations of Hebrew poems and Yiddish sketches, the opinions about Jews and Judaism of competent observers in all ages and all climes, passages to elucidate the inwardness of Jewish ceremonial, short prayers and words of comfort. It comprises within its pages the whole span of life, and it presents the Jewish point of view on every aspect of it. One or two gems stand out in all their glory and attractiveness in the latest edition. We would strongly urge our readers to obtain this khaki-colored little book. It must be available in America; if not, the Chief Rabbi's office will doubtless be glad to distribute it. We confess that while every passage of the book appealed greatly, we were most touched by the translations of the two [illegible] Perez, the one depicting [illegible] of Brontje Schweig in this [illegible] world, the other telling [illegible] wonderful, unselfish cond[illegible] Rabbi during the Selichot pe[illegible] is something distinctively Jewish about each of these word pictures. If the sentiments in this booklet sink into the consciousness of its readers, the world will be the better for the process. The Chief Rabbi has done a real Mitzvah in issuing the collection.

More of this kind of work will be required after the war. It will serve the general cause. But several special causes will also call for attention. Disabled Jewish soldiers will be one such. The problem of the disabled warrior will need to be solved by the state. But as usual, where charitable and relief work is concerned, the Jews are first in the field to co-operate with the state authorities and to supplement their efforts. A Jewish Central Committee has recently been set up in London for the purpose. Doubtless the problem will call for attention in America also, and in due course a Jewish committee will be established in the States. When that happens it might be a good thing for the English and American bodies to exchange views and experiences, and perhaps the London Lodge might be able to act as intermediary between them.

"OBJECTIONABLE STORIES ABOUT JEWS"

Rev. Dr. David H. Fouse of the First Reform Church of Denver, preached a sermon on the above subject and read an extract therefrom as it appeared in the Rocky Mountain News as follows:

"We all hate the persecution of the Jew in certain foreign countries. We all are more or less guilty of a form of cruelty toward those Jews who live in our very midst. Recently a Jewish woman, prominent in social welfare circles and honored by all that knew her, was shocked at a story told from behind the footlights of a popular playhouse. She was, moreover, mortified and hurt beyond measure at the storm of applause and roars of laughter with which the audience received this thrust at one of her fellow religionists. Probably none of them who bubbled over with mirth even thought of what it meant to her and other Jews. Most of us have told similar stories thoughtlessly. We have them in our repertoire, if we are story tellers. Just now we people of Denver, of all various creeds, are drawn together in a close co-operation in gathering an unprecedented fund for religious work among soldiers. We are glad to be yoked up with the rabbi of Temple Emanuel, who is beloved by thousands of religionists beyond his own church. Not one of us would knowingly wound him nor the splendid folk who, with him, have common religious traditions and customs. Ought we not now pledge, each to his own self-respect, to refain, both in applause and repetition, from those stories which charge to the Jew frailties of human nature which we all possess? These people, along with the Irishman and negro and others, are willing to take wholesome good natured jokes, but it is not fair to heap upon them the contumely which most Jewish stories carry. Hereafter I shall be as free from such as I am from those that are obscene.

"This gentle acknowledgement of thoughtlessness that has so often caused a laugh and left a sting is appreciated. It should also be stated that the management of the theater in which the above incident occurred had the objectionable story suppressed as soon as the matter was brought to its attention by Mr. Wm. H. Goldberg, chairman of the Vaudeville Vigilance Committee of the B'nai B'rith".

SPECIAL NOTICE WITH REGARD TO POSTPONEMENT OF CONSERVATION SUNDAY AND CONSERVATION WEEK.

Because of the prevalence of influenza throughout the country, it has been decided to postpone Conservation Sunday from Oct. 27, as heretofore announced, to Dec. 1. The distribution of the Home Card will be made during the week Dec. 2 to Dec. 7, instead of during the week Oct. 28 to Nov. 2. Will you kindly govern yourself accordingly in your plans to assist us in giving publicity to Mr. Hoover's message. Please note that the text of the message should not be released to the public until Dec. 1.

The existing military situation makes emphasis upon this conservation effort particularly important. Evacuation by the enemy of occupied territory imposes upon the people of the United States responsibility for additional civilian populations, who will face starvation if we do not come to their assistance.

THE JEWS AND THE COMING PEACE

If the whole world, belligerents and neutrals, must be prepared to grapple with knotty questions awaiting answer in the coming reconstruction of a world out of gear, the Jewish people must equally bestir itself to deal wisely and efficiently with its own problems. In a world so completely overturned, with new visions and new vistas, it is not likely that we Jews can continue to abide by old formulas. For once the fortunes of the Jewish people now resident in Palestine or migrating to the ancient Jewish territory will have to be dealt with separately. There is none among us that will not rejoice at the turn things have taken in the Land of Israel. It is certain that the country will be opened up to the Jew and that the centuries long misrule will have yielded to stable and beneficent government. If autonomy is to come, it must first be deserved. For that there must be a greater body of Jews and more of energy displayed in building up a Jewish life. Great Britain is reckoning with the preponderance of Jewish culture in Palestine. To that end the cornerstone of the Jewish University has been laid. It is for us, the guardians of Israel in the dispersion, to take counsel betimes with a view to safeguarding the position of the Jew wheresoever he may be found. The largest number will clearly remain where they are now. America, England, France and Italy offer no problems. The same may be said of the neutral countries. But east of the Rhine, in the Danube countries, along the Vistula, and still farther east, there is the Jewish front. Large bodies of Jews will be found changing nationality with the advent of peace. We are not speaking now of the reconstruction problems. Those will be taken in hand. An enormous fund must and will be created to repair the ravages of war and of iniquity among the Jewish populations. But we must equally address ourselves to the political side. We must see to it that guarantees, and not merely on paper, are secured for righting the age long wrongs done to the Jew. The largest and most backward portion of Jewry will be found in the new and larger Poland. We rejoice in the good fortunes of the Polish people. But we must remember that the attitude of the Poles to their Jewish fellow-citizens and fellow-sufferers has been by no means friendly in the immediate past. Will there be a spirit of reconciliation? Will the Poles learn discretion? Will they open their ears to counsels of moderation and the dictates of justice? Some among us plead for group rights, for a measure of cultural autonomy to Jews wherever there are large aggregates of them massed together. Others would rest content with the formula of individual emancipation and equality before the law. The principle of self-determination ought to operate here likewise, and in the long run Polish Jewry ought to be allowed to speak for itself. Most likely they are not all of one mind. Still we at a distance, and because our fortunate position makes us the readier to help, shall be called upon to lend a hand. In fact, we must not await the invitation. We must be prepared with a program clearly thought out and planned. Right now it behooves all such Jewish organizations in this country as have done the thinking for our co-religionists in eastern Europe to agree upon a concerted action. We have in this country the high representatives of various mid-European and eastern nationalities all striving for freedom and all fully aware of the weight of public opinion. The Jewish help in their cause will be appreciated, indeed, is sought after. Let there be an understanding with them. We are ready with our good will. Our influence is at their command. Let us know what is held in store for our brethren who reside amidst them, who love and cherish the lands in which they have lived for centuries. Leaders in Israel, arise and be doing! The hour is propitious. Do not let the opportunity slip by.

RECONSTRUCTION

Now that peace is measurably within sight, the allies and all the belligerents cannot begin too soon to plan reconstruction. It has been reported that Germany, with her usual methodicalness, has had for some time a bureau at work looking toward the putting into effect swiftly and smoothly of a return of pre-war industries as far as possible; and when that bureau was installed German militarism was at its very height and in no wise ready to relinquish its expectations of eventual victory. The war will have had its campaigns and battles planned by the brainiest generals; the terms to be embodied in the peace protocols have been thought out by the combined wisdom of statesmen; the conditions under which each country is to be switched back to its normal life must likewise engage the most judicious minds of the people, of their representatives and of their high magistrates. And it cannot be taken up too soon. During the period of the war the American people have lived anomalously, under high pressure, with every nerve strained and all energy chained to the supreme object of putting an army into the field, trained, fed, clothed, equipped with all sorts of weapons. Soldiers and their equipment had to be transported thousands of miles, and in the face of the dangers lurking beneath the waters. Men and women have been taken away from their normal occupations to manufacture that vast equipment. Plants have been called into existence over night, as it were. The central government took over the administration of railroads. Food and fuel were conserved by wise regulations. Loans were floated and taxes and supertaxes imposed. With patriotic willingness the people have suffered the distributive power in state and municipality to be absorbed by the federal government. Let no one imagine that all of that can be done away within a day, so soon as the ink on the signatures to the peace documents has dried. Demobilizing an army is an enormous task, quite so as mobilization. Some plants will have to be maintained, others should be turned to the uses of normal life. Food and fuel will have to be conserved for some time to come. The wasted areas will have to be restored, and no matter who pays for it in the long run it is the world that has to make good irreparable losses. There will be the maimed and widowed and orphaned to take care of. Millions of soldiers will have to be placed in their normal occupations. The high cost of living cannot be reduced immediately. Means must be provided for to pay the enormous loans. Taxes will continue high. Yet gradual as the normalization of the industrial life must be, it must be begun at an early time. We shall be called upon to aid in the rehabilitations of millions abroad who are too poor, too sorely stricken to help themselves. Above all, our entire political life must be steered back to its wonted course. We must beware lest by conquering absolutism we have been conquered by it. The paternalism exercised under war exigencies must give way to the free exercise of the citizen's rights. The old checks upon the prerogatives of parallel powers must be re-established. The people must be free to criticise those in power. Freedom of speech must be restored. There must be a spiritual rehabilitation by the side of the industrial. We shall not emerge quite the same. It is a changed world that we shall find ourselves in. Values will be recast. But there are certain values which stand above the changes of time. Religion will once more come into its own. Suppressed yearnings will come to the fore. There will be problems numerous and weighty. Let us address ourselves to the task wisely, patriotically, and in a spirit of devotion to the highest truth.

PREPARE FOR PEACE

Preliminaries of peace have begun. It should not be anything else but a justice of peace. The just requests of the vanquished should be given heed to. No rankling should be left in any corner of the world inviting future strife. The possessions of the allies must be safeguarded against future attacks and yet the vanquished should be dealt with fairly and squarely.

The peace that is now coming must be prepared ahead. No statesman must be found napping. We have fairly grown accustomed to the war. We are familiar with its sad features. We would not lightly hazard stepping out of it into the dark future. Let us turn on the light in full force. We have heard formulas promulgated and principles enunciated, but somehow words are elastic. It seems to be the day of small nations. Are we to witness a repetition of the conditions to which the Congress of Vienna at the end of the Napoleonic era gave birth? And who is to prevent confederacies arising before long? The league of nations idea must be defined somewhat more clearly. How far shall disarmament proceed all around? All these questions are momentous. It will be too late to begin answering them when once high commissioners of the nations sit down at the green table. They must come prepared with their own clear formulations. And on this side of the western front the democratic governments are required to take the people into their confidence. The peace will be a peace of peoples. Clearly the whole American nation, to speak for ourselves, must do some hard thinking. It follows that we cannot begin too soon to prepare for the peace that is coming. Unpreparedness for peace will be just as grievous an error as unpreparedness for war. Above all, let clearness and candor prevail.

JEWS BARRED FROM PUBLIC APPOINTMENTS

The "Juedische Zeitung" of Vienna, states that in connection with a competition for appointments to certain government offices at Sambor, candidates are asked to produce a certificate of baptism. This condition was also openly advertised in the Polish Press. The Vienna paper named above urges that steps should be taken to suppress this form of anti-Semitism.

AN APPRECIATION OF JACOB FURTH

By Dr. S. Sale, Rabbi of Congregation Shaare Emeth

On Tuesday the 15th of October last, Jacob Furth closed his eyes to the light of this world and in his passing the Jews of America have lost one of their brightest ornaments. Our lamented brother was born in the little own of Schwiehau in Bohemia, June 12, 1844, and came to this country with his parents and an only sister when he was six years old. He lived in the city of St. Louis nearly three score years and ten, and as he came to be recognized and respected as one of its men of light and leading, he will be long and gratefully remembered in this community, to whose best interests he gave himself with unabated zeal and devotion. He was a leader by virtue of the imprescriptible right of native, superior endowments. He impressed himself upon every assembly of his associates by dint of his good sense, his vigorous, keen and incisive mind, and the integrity of his character. He practiced none of the arts of the demagogue, and though it was but natural that he should delight in the approval of his fellowmen, he spurned popular favor that was to be bought at the sacrifice of his conscience.

He was earnest, frank, manly and sincere and in all his acts in public and private he answered the description which the Psalmist gives of the man, who could stand before the Lord: he walked in uprightness, worked righteously and spoke the truth in his heart. Such men are rare in every community, and thus it goes without saying, that he held high rank among the most prominent Jews of our city and country. He earned the standing which he achieved by a long, honorable and useful service in the cause of humanity's noblest ideals.

He was most intimately identified with the order of the B'nai B'rith, and as he was easily one of its most brilliant luminaries, his name and fame became a household word in our fraternity. His activities, however, were not limited to our Order and its exalted purposes, but as a Jew of the truest and broadest type, he gave his time, his means, and what is more, his splendid personality to every progressive and beneficent movement.

He was every inch a man, and as such he was one of the best missionaries of Judaism. I recall that at a farewell dinner given to him on the departure from St. Louis, to make his home for a few years in the city of Cleveland. I compared him to the button on the outside of the box. I always thought of him in that capacity. Wherever and whenever he appeared among his fellowmen of every faith, as a man of affairs, as a Mason, and a public-spirited and patriotic citizen, he stood out as the peer of the best, and being known as a Jew, for he never left anyone in the dark as to his religious loyalty, he compelled his associates of other denominations by the mere force of his own example, to revise and correct their estimate of his co-religionists, when it ran in the groove of raditional prejudice. Face to face with such a man, there was nothing left for them but to admit, that if Jacob Furth was a fair sample of the level to which the Jews could rise, they must on the whole be excellent material out of which to make good men and loyal Americans. In sheer truth it must therefore be said that Jacob Furth, whose whole life at once a luminous embodiment and a glorious defense of the faith of our father was one of Israel's most valiant guardians.

It is apparent that the best and finest traditions of our historic past ran in the blood of our departed friend. He was a true disciple of the wise and he prized and cultivated the spiritual values all through his days, those intangibles, which are far above gold and silver, those things which alone make life worth while. In the light of these ideals he lived at his beautiful and exemplary fireside and abroad among men. When the history of the Jewish charities of St. Louis comes to be written, the name of Jacob Furth will loom large among the pioneers, and the single record of his life-long devotion to the Cleveland Orphan's Home is such as might satisfy the most ambitious lover of his kind. He was indeed eyes to the blind, feet to the lame and a father to the needy.

I shall not attempt a detail of his philanthropic endeavors to show what fine type of a man and public servant he was, nor is it necessary to tell the Jews of this country what they themselves do know, but I cannot forbear observing that his influence for good in every direction was all the more pervasive and effective because of its unobtrusive nature, because of the simplicity of his life, the dignity, the reserve and repose which distinguished this man of sterling character and strong intellect. Recognizing this large and wholesome service, the B'nai B'rith lodges of our city united with the officers of the Grand Lodge of the district, the Executive Committee of the Order and a large concourse of the good men and women of St. Louis to make his seventieth birthday memorable and to do public honor to the man, who by his whole ife had honored them. His own lodge, Ebn Ezra, however, paid him the most beautiful tribute, when to signalize the completed seventh decade of his pilgrimage, it set aside the sum of two thousand dollars as the nucleus of a benevolent fund to be known as the Jacob and Jenny Furth endowment. Now let the endowment grow from more to more, so that it may indeed become a monument to our departed friend and the beloved partner of his good works, more enduring than bronze and stone. Here was a man who had vindicated the faith of his fathers by his own exemplary character and conduct, who had defended its title to be counted among the most blessed human agencies, by bringing its message of love and cheer, of hope and comfort to all of God's children; who showed the world that to be a Jew was not to be exclusive, and when he rounded out the Biblical tale of three score and ten, the people before whom he had gone in and out, they who had tried him and found him their faithful servant, they came, Jew and Christian alike, to do him honor and bring him the tribute of their hearts. Indeed it was no mean service to which they gave testimony and approval. Brothers Philip Stein and A. B. Seelenfreund of Chicago came to represent the Executive Committee of our Order at the obsequies and to do personal honor to the man, with whom they had been so long and so closely associated. When Judge Stein heard that there was to be no eulogy pronounced, he said: "The naked and unadorned truth about Jacob Furth would be his finest and most fitting tribute".

PRAYER

By Dr. E. N. Calisch of Richmond, Va., at the Patriotic Meeting, Chicago, Sept. 29, 1918

Eternal God and God of our Fathers, in this hour of deep emotion, we turn to Thee. We have unfurled this flag that represents our sons gone into service. We commit them into Thy keeping. Mayest Thou give them the resolution of righteousness and the deep determination of noble duty. May it be Thy sovereign will that you will safeguard and keep them and to bring them home again to us, but if it be Thy sovereign will that if any of these boys of ours are called upon to make the supreme sacrifice and to turn their faces to the Golden West, may it be with honor and with courage that they may meet the great adventure and add honor to the name of Israel.

And we pray Thee, too, that to those who may mourn them may Thy comfort be given, and through the mists of their tears may they see the rainbow of Thy promises wherein Thy comfort and Thy solace have given them. We pray Thee, Oh God, protect and keep our boys, but above all things may they be everywhere and at all times filled with the knowledge of Thee. May it be in their hearts ever, and the sentiment of the psalmist, "The Lord is with me; I fear no evil."

Thy protecting providence be over them; bear them upon the wings of Thy power, and give them the safety as Thou will give us peace. Amen.

FRENCH JEW DIPLOMAT

For the first time since the emancipation of the Jews of France, one hundred and twenty-seven years ago, its diplomatic service has been opened to a Jew, in the person of M. Kahn, Consul-General at Shanghai. He has now been appointed Minister-Plenipotentiary to Siam.

THE IDEALS OF THE ORDER

By Simon Wolf at the Patriotic Meeting, Chicago, September 29, 1918.

In 1836 I had the honor and privilege of being born a member of this great Order, and from that time up to this I have striven with all the ardor and intelligence incident to American citizenship to make my people realize the ideals for which this Order owes its existence and for which it has often stood as a symbol and example.

I remember well the words given to the world by Benjamin Franklin when he said after the Declaration of Independence had been signed, "We must hang together or we will hang separately". So tonight in the midst of this cataclysm that is confronting the world in arms we must hang together. The clouds may be dark, but I remember well when on the 26th day of June, 1863, I stood in the presence of the great martyr, Abraham Lincoln, after Lee had marched into Pennsylvania. It looked dark; the clouds were lowering and dismal, and the President said, "The sun of righteousness shines behind those clouds. It is luminous with light behind those clouds. We will win. We must win". And the battle of Gettysburg, fought on the Fourth of July, 1863, was the foundation for the Fourth of July, 1918.

We need only take the words of the great martyr President in his immortal second inauguration speech, "With malice toward none; with charity for all", and for every drop of blood drawn by the lash must be atoned for by the sword, and so it will be now. And again his immortal words on the battlefield dedication of Gettysburg, when he said: "W eare dedicating this field to a new birth of freedom for the people, of the people and by the people", and that great trumpet call will be the only basis for a world peace that the Allies will ever make.

Ah, my friends, it is a glorious privilege for you to stand in the presence of this great magnificent picture of seventy-five years of usefulness to the world and its co-religionists, a picture such as the world has never seen before. Seventy-five thousand of our brave boys of Jewish blood, American citizens all, are at the front to prove to the world that among all the citizens of this great republic, there are none more appreciative of the liberty and of the opportunities which we enjoy than the Jew cosmopolitan, the Jew man who has given the world its highest ideal of righteousness, of justice, of religion.

Ah, my friends, do not fear. We will win out, and in the winning the Jew will secure the rights of citizenship, the rights of equality all the world over, and no one will have contributed more in this than this great organization which is the foundation stone of Jewish altruism and Jewish ideals. Our brave boys in concert with the other brave soldiers of the Allies will draw the fangs of the German reptile, and the sunrise of its poisonous power will act in the sunset of its defeat. The God of our fathers and the God of our Pilgrim Fathers are fighting side by side. As John Brown's soul is marching on to a unification of this great republic, so will the American spirit, and all the civilized powers of the earth be marching on and on to victory and peace and the Star Spangled Banner of the free will flow from sea to sea, unvexed, unchallenged, for a regenerated humanity.

INDEPENDENT ORDER B'NAI B'RITH, DISTRICT NO. 3

Philadelphia, Pa., Oct. 21, 1918.

I hereby bring to your official notice that our esteemed Brother Edward Hemple, Secretary of District Grand Lodge No. 3, is about to enter War Welfare Work for overseas service, and has thus been obliged to ask for a leave of absence, and the selection of an Acting Secretary until the next Biennial Meeting of the Grand Lodge.

It is with sincere regret that I contemplate the loss of the valuable Secretarial services of Brother Hemple, and in his patriotic devotion to our country's cause and assistance to win the war, he will have the hearty good wishes of our entire brotherhood.

Please take notice that by authority of the General Committee I have appointed as Acting Secretary of District Grand Lodge No. 3 Mr. Joseph Herbach, who is hereby declared entitled to proper and official recognition as such and to whom all communications should be directed. The new B'nai B'rith headquarters are: 709 North Franklin street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Yours in benevolence, brotherly love and harmony.

MARCUS FEUCHTWANGER,
President.

ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE

We wish to reiterate our most urgent request that all matters pertaining to the defamation of the Jew and all such complaints not purely local in their scope, be promptly reported to our central office, 1228 Tribune Building. It often happens that a situation which could be corrected by a diplomatic and dignified letter, is made impossible by reason of someone taking it upon himself to answer for all the Jewish people. The Administrative Committee, which meets weekly, considers most carefully the phraseology and content of every communication and takes action only after calm deliberation. It is thus that we have obtained harmonious action and the best results.

In order that we may promptly learn of all matters which require our attention, we have secured the co-operation of the following newspapers who have signified their willingness to give publicity to our activities:

American Israelite, Cincinnati, Ohio.
Hebrew Standard, New York City.
Jewish Voice, St. Louis, Mo.
The Sentinel, Chicago, Ill.
Jewish Review & Observer, Cleveland, Ohio.
Warheit, New York City.
Reform Advocate, Chicago, Ill.
Chicago Israelite, Chicago, Ill.
Jewish Exponent, Philadelphia, Pa.
Jewish Daily News, New York City.
Jewish Ledger, New Orleans, La.
B'nai B'rith Messenger, Los Angeles, Cal.
Canadian Jewish Chronicle, Montreal, Que., Canada.
American Jewish Chronicle, New York City.
Jewish Independent, Cleveland, Ohio.
Jewish Monitor, Fort Worth, Texas.
Jewish Morning Journal, New York City.
Daily Jewish Courier, Chicago, Ill.
Jewish Criterion, Pittsburgh, Pa.
Columbus Jewish Chronicle, Columbus, Ohio.
Jewish World, Cleveland, Ohio.
Jewish Spectator, Memphis, Tenn.

A Commendable Act

We report with great satisfaction the action of Mr. Fred G. Nixon-Nirdlinger, a Philadelphia theater owner, who caused the following notice to be conspicuously posted in his theaters:

"A Suggestion and a Notice"

"Tens of thousands of Jewish boys in the army and navy of the United States are offering their lives in the defense of the nation. Slurs and gibes upon the courage and sacrifices of the race to which these fighting men belong are obviously impudent and indecent, and will not be tolerated on the stage of this theater; least of all from Jewish performers, who have been the customary offenders in this matter.

"If you feel that you cannot get your act over the footlights without insulting brave boys who are going 'over the top', please consider your act cancelled".

The League wishes to take this opportunity to express its thanks to Mr. Fred G. Nixon-Nirdlinger for his action, which is of incalculable benefit to us in our work. We have had such posters printed and circulated throughout the country with the request that they be prominently displayed in all the vaudeville houses. We shall be glad to provide such posters to anyone interested in helping eliminate the caricature of the Jew from the vaudevile stage.

"Newark Ledger's" Apology

The following letter was received from the publisher of the "Newark Ledger" when his attention was called to an objectionable article appearing in the columns of this paper. We also quote the notice to which Mr. Russell refers:

"I am enclosing copy of notice posted in the news and editorial rooms and also on the proofreader's desk in the composing room.

"I regret the unfortunate reference to the Jewish race that appeared in The Ledger columns more than you can realize, because, during a publishing period of eighteen years, I have had this occur only twice, and both times in the City of Newark.

"Of course, no person who is worthy of consideration from the point of view of intelligence, morals, or position in this community, ever deliberately makes a racial reference in a derogatory manner.

"In the case of the Jewish race, their accomplishments and achievements in every walk in life, in science and art, letters and commerce, stand out so splendidly as to set an example to the rising generation of all races. Probably you yourself have never taken the trouble to check up high school records, but if you did so you would be surprised at the enviable position held by the [illegible] your race.

"Speaking selfishly, both from a personal and a business point of view, my staunchest personal friends and my most loyal business supporters throughout my publishing career have been the Jewish people.

"President Wilson has broken down the few barriers that political prejudice held in Washington against certain high offices being filled by Jews. I think the President's act settled the racial prejudice question not only in America, but in all other really enlightened and progressive nations.

"Of course, as long as there are weak, low minds, persons of narrow vision, with warped intellects, we will have critics of one race or another; but I think even that class of undesirable citizens now realize that its prejudice cannot be successfully directed against the Jewish people.

"Notice"

"On two occasions, matter has crept into the columns of The Ledger, that reflected on the races of people as a whole, in a smart effort on the part of someone to criticize mere individuals who happened to be members of races prominent in the public eye.

"America is at war today in the interest of universal democracy and good fellowship toward all men, where races, religion, politics and even previous condition of servitude have gone into the melting pot for the common good.

"I trust that every department of The Ledger will exert itself to detect anything of this sort that finds its way into the office through carelessness of persons from the outside. It means that we must read communications very carefully, and I wish the mechanical department, as well as the news and editorial departments, to assume that responsibility and co-operation, to the end of making it impossible for these unfortunate references to appear in the columns of The Ledger".

The Kaiser's Master Spy

Those who have followed the serial story appearing in the Chicago Evenning American, entitled "The Kaiser's Master Spy" and have felt indignation at the derogatory references to our people, will experience a sense of satisfaction at the kind offer of co-operation made by the publishers when this matter was brought to their attention. We received the following letter.

"I wish to thank you for calling to our attention the unfair reference to Jews in the story entitled 'The Kaiser's Master Spy.' As you undoubtedly know, this paper has been very careful to avoid any such unfavorable references and all our editors are exhorted to use the utmost care to in this connection. Unfortunately, in this instance the man who handled the story was not as careful as he should have been and we deeply regret that the slip occurred.

"We will be thankful to you at any time for calling our attention to any similar breach that you may see.

Very truly yours,
Chicago Evening American".

Again, The Merchant of Venice

The Grolier Society, which publishes the Children's Encyclopedia, entitled "The Book of Knowledge", signifies its co-operation in our educational campaign by substituting for a scene from the Merchant of Venice, one from the "Taming of the Shrew". Their letter, which we quote herewith, displays their fairmindedness.

"We regret that your letter of August 13th has been delayed so long in answer, but the vacation season is responsible. On my return to the city I find your letter calling attention to page 312 of THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE as an instance, I suppose, of defamation of character. We think that a picture illustrating a scene from Shakespeare's play, in exactly the same manner as the scene above is illustrated, could hardly be considered an effort to defame the character of the Jew. However, as we have had our attention called to it from one or two other sources we considered it best in our new edition to select another scene, namely from the 'Taming of the Shrew', as we have no desire to hurt the feelings of anyone, or convey an unpleasant or misleading impression.

Yours very truly,
The Grolier Society,
M. P. Mills".

It is to be hoped that with the renewed vigilance and co-operation of our coreligionists, who will promptly submit all complaints to our office, our aim—to eliminate those elements which tend to keep alive the prejudice to which the Jews are subjected—will, in the near future, be realized.

THE B'NAI B'RITH AND THE WAR

Address by Mr. Edward Sonnenschein, Dedicating a Service Flag to the Members of the Order at the Patriotic Meeting Held in Chicago, September 29, 1918

Almost everything that could properly be said in the dedication of a service flag has already been said, but while my eloquent friend from California was speaking to you about the aspirations of people today during this world catastrophe, thinking back to a home which their forefathers had many centuries ago, my mind kept reverting to a paragraph in the book of Jacob Rees, whom you remember as the man of whom Theodore Roosevelt said was the most useful citizen in America. In his biography he tells about his youth in Denmark, and of coming here and doing his work here, and yet how he always pined for the land of his birth. He wanted to see the town in which he had grown up. Those beautiful memories were in his mind always. He finally went back to Denmark and he saw the little town of his birth, and he saw his father and his mother, and he loved Denmark. And then he said, "I became sick; I was very sick and they dispaired of my getting well; and I lay in my bed in the hospital where I could see and overlook the blue waters of the bay, but nothing seemed to cheer me, and they did not know what was wrong with me, and then one day I saw a ship coming up the harbor flying the American flag, and I sat up in my bed and I waived my handkerchief and cheered until I cried, and the nurse came in and thought that I was crazy, but I was not crazy. I became well. I arose from my bed a well man, because when I had seen that flag, I recognized that the country of my children's birth was my country, that their flag was my flag, and that I was indeed an American."

So my friends, when this crisis not in our individual lives, perhaps, but in the nation's life came, we all of us recognized, no matter what sky had seen our birth, that this was our land and those who had come from across the seas, knew that this land of their children's birth and of their children's children's birth, was and was ever to be their home, their flag, they were indeed and are Americans.

My friends, it was easier for the Jew than it was for the other peoples, for many of them had come here because they saw an opportunity. Economic pressure had driven them here, but they had rights and citizenship in the lands from which they came. We came here, my friends, to get something which other lands had not given to us—citizenship, equality and heaven for the soul as well as for the body.

The principles upon which this government was built and upon which this government has grown and upon which it stands today, were principles which were consonant with the teachings of the ancient prophets. It was builded upon justice, upon equality, upon truth, upon humanity.

When Germany started the war four years ago, the Jews first felt that there was something inconsistent with his belief, something inconsistent with his individuality and the traditions of his people, because when right was subordinated to might and to blood and to conquest, it struck a jarring note in his system, and there was one thing at the very outset of the war, the very first week of it, which meant that no Jew who knew his Judaism, no Jew who felt within him the blood of his ancestors, could have any sympathy when they called a solemn treaty, sworn to, "a scrap of paper." They struck a note which the Jew could never approve of, because the whole history of the Jew showed that he was true to a treaty not written on parchment and sealed with the great seals of state, but a covenant given to him and made by him with his God, which was not even written down by man for centuries and centuries after it was made, but carried down from generation to generation in the living memories of Israel. That covenant which Israel has carried through all those years of persecution, that loyalty which Israel has shown to that faith, and that covenant made him intrinsically American. He is as much American as those who came from the Mayflower. When war came he was ready.

When Pershing stood at the grave of Lafayette and uttered in four words the greatest speech which has been made since Lincoln dedicated the field of Gettysburg, when he said there at the tomb of Lafayette, "Lafayette, we have come," he had with him there and back of him all the 75,000 American Jews glad to serve under his leadership. Of that number, my friends, we are proud to say that 3,256 are members of the Order of B'nai B'rith. It is to them we dedicate this service flag, and we are proud of them for many reasons.

My friends, we are proud of it for the reason that those 3,256 stars are out of a membership of 36,000 men in the United States. When we consider that the average age of our members is a little over fifty years, you will realize that 3,256 of our young men under thirty-one represents a number out of all proportions to population. It means that when the Jew, together with ten million American boys, in June, of 1917, and thirteen million Americans on Sept. 12, stood with them upon the roll of honor, that in large numbers the Jew had volunteered and had not come under the selective service act.

Now, my friends, if it were merely a matter of pride in what they had done, we might be pardoned for speaking of it, but we do not raise this service flag here as a symbol of pride in all that we have. It is to us and it must be to us a service flag indeed, not representative only of those who are serving under that other banner on the fields of France, but it should mean service for us.

When we dedicate that flag we must dedicate ourselves heart and soul to the principles for which those boys are fighting, for the cause in which our country is at war.

It is our duty to see that those stars of blue do not change into stars of gold. Some of them have already, but we must see to it, my friends, that we do our part that they shall all be blue and that as many of them as possible shall come back to us.

I do not want to take up your time, but I want to call your attention to a couple of posters which have been put out. One of the newspapers this morning had one which certainly stirred the blood of anyone who looked at it. It was by Christy, and it showed an American boy entangled in the barbed wire; it showed him with part of his uniform off; it showed him with the blood upon his forehead, and it showed him with his last action firing, and it said over the top, "His last shot." Underneath it said: "Our last cent for him."

There are many duties that we have right now. We are engaged in a campaign to furnish funds to help those boys to train them, to equip them, to ship them over and to ship them supplies over there, and to send them on to victory with the least expenditure of blood and life. My friends, they had asked nothing except that we give them the wherewithal to fight. They do not ask when they are wounded, when they are even dying, for help. They say to their comrades, "Carry on; Carry on." It is up to us on this side, when they do not ask us to give, but to help, and when we get back everything that we are giving in principal and interest, it is up to us to carry on and on to the uttermost.

There is another poster that we noticed on the way coming over here today, walking over to this hall, and it is hard to talk about it. It shows a picture of ruined Belgium; it shows a mother in the garb of the peasant with a baby at her breast; it shows her ruined home around her, and it says above it the words, "Shall children die and mothers bleed in vain"? America is going to answer that question with a loud emphatical "No", with every resource of American manhood and American wealth and power, America is going to answer that appeal as it has answered every appeal in history "to the last man and the last heartbeat", as was said, "America will go forward".

As an eloquent Frenchman said the other day in speaking of France, "A million or more Frenchmen have already died, and many more will die, but if the last man dies, the women will rise, and when the women are gone, the children will rise, and when the children are gone, the dead will rise, but France will live".

My friends, over a million and a half of our boys have already gone over, and there are a million and a half more that are ready now, and millons more will follow. Many of them will never come back, but if they all should go, they all should give their bright young lives, yea, if after them every other man in America and women and children will be needed, better that they all should go, better that the supreme sacrifice should be made, than that liberty and fredom and justice and truth should die forever, but America will not die.

America with her Allies will win, and with America living, with her Allies living, truth and justice will live, and they will live forever.

My friends, there is only one other word that I want to say. They say that in the old days when Israel was assailed and all the odds were against her, that Heaven fought with her. They say in the story, that the stars in the courses fought against Cicero. So, my friends, the flag and the stars are fighting with us and they will continue to fight, and even when they turn to gold they still fight on, because a man who lays down his life in this struggle does not die, but is still with the others, goes marching on, and it is for us, my friends, safe that we are here in this country, to loyally do our duty and loyally support them, to march on and on to victory and humanity.

THE JEWISH MISSION

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

(Written for the B'nai B'rith News)

Mr. Zangwill is quite right when he contends that nations proclaiming themselves as bearers of a mission are not born with it and that the mission idea is merely retrospectively carried into the past, whereas it is always the precipitate of historical conditions arising long after maturity. It goes without saying that the missionary is never liked. We raise no objections when backward tribes and aboriginal peoples have the higher teachings and the superior civilization imposed upon them. But we resent the superior airs when they are assumed with equals. The Christian may act from the highest motives when he would convert the Jew, sometimes by very questionable methods, to the Christian truth. We rightly, however, hold the ground that an ancient faith like ours may be safely left alone. Yet it is not the Christian alone who denies that the Jews have a mission. It has become the order of the day to make light of the Jewish mission idea in our own camp. The subject will bear candid treatment.

Where Jewish objection is raised to the mission idea, it really contemplates the latest formulation. It is a century old. It was born of modern conditions, principally of the turn which came about through the emancipation in the wake of the French Revolution and the Napoleonic era. It would almost follow of itself that with a world not being transformed before our very eyes the doctrine, no matter how justified then, cannot possibly be maintained now. But we will take it at its old value. The Jew in Western Europe found himself admitted to the rights and duties of a citizen of the land in which he dwelt. Akiba Eger was consistent enough to look the gift horse into the mouth. He would have none of the emancipation which spelt integration into another body. He feared disintegration. The Jew, he said, was not to merge permanently with his surroundings; he was only a temporary dweller. There were to be Jewish colonies throughout the dispersion. Quite as consistent were the great bulk of Jews who gratefully accepted emancipation. They recognized the duty of forswearing the hope of the return. I am speaking, of course, of the thinking leaders in the other camp. The neo-orthodox might treat of the return as something millennial, something that would occur miraculously at the end of the days. But the Hamburg reformers were bent upon a definitive break with the nationalist idea of a return at any period in the future. The Jews in Germany were to be Germans for all time to come. But what about the Jews elsewhere? What was to be the link connecting the Jewries of the world? The answer was not given at once and with the desirable clearness. We must grant to the reformers the honest conviction that far from breaking up the Jewish people they were evolving a formula for its continued existence among the nations. The year 1848 came along and with it modern liberalism. Liberalism is essentially international. Cosmopolitanism was the higher state towards which as a goal mankind was going.

We are reminded of the Cosomopolite in one of O. Henry's stories, whose address is The Earth, Solar System, Universe. Now the reformers, for the most part born and bred in Germany and at odds with the chauvinistic nationalism of the Germans, fell in with liberalism and internationalism and they have transplanted these ideas to this country. They take the status of the dispersed Jew among the nations. They see in the dispersion a God-given instrument for obliterating national distinctions and making the whole world one federated political body. It is self-evident that the Jew would be in his right place in a world so constructed. In national states the Jew is somewhat looked at askance. He is distrusted. It is said that he represents the middle-class, bourgeois liberalism which makes for a weakened nationalism. Hence anti-Semitism. And the article is not confined to Germany. It has raised its head in England. Mr. Chesterton, for instance, might point to the very article by Zangwill in the last Menorah issue as evidence how un-English so thorough a master of English style as Mr. Zangwill is reveals himself in all his covert sneers about the "Rule Britannia" idea. Now the reformers glory in such evidences of Jewish internationalism. The Jew, they teach, is placed athwart the nations to wean them from exaggerated notions of provincial patriotism and to raise them to the Messianic heights of international federativeness. If the Jew is disliked on that very account, well, that is the price he must pay for the high appointment as the bearer of this very definite mission. The future, they say, is with him. Some teachers have fallen in with Herr Sombart's contention that the Jew is the founder of capitalism, and capital is international.

This latest formulation of the Jewish mission, with the slogan "internationalism" to conjure by—I can quote chapter and verse—is mischievous in the highest degree. Mr. Roosevelt for one would scorn it as un-American. Nor is President Wilson's scheme of a league of nations at all to be maintained in the same breath with what is normally understood by internationalism of the liberal sort. In the league of nations the sovereignty of the constituting nations is not to be impaired. And certainly distinct national cultures are to be maintained. International relations there will exist and they will be regulated more efficiently and more clearly. Refractory nations will be disciplined, as the case may be. But that does not yet mean a United States of the World. Professor Neumark, I see, emphasizes an "obscure" verse in Zephaniah (2:11). I did so years ago and paid the price for my temerity. But the truth is with us that the conversion of the world to peace and spiritual truth does not require a giving up of indivilual national cultures nor even a pilgrimage to the Temple of Peace at The Hague or the Temple of the Lord on Zion's heights. Zephaniah apparently disagreed with Micah and Isaiah. And so may we. Each nation from its place and within the potentialities of its own culture may find the way to God and humanity. We need Frenchmen and Englishmen and others; we need Christians and Mohammedans and Jews. The union need not be visible. The Church of God is invisible. The unity must be ideal.

It follows that the Jew should cease to align himself with the internationals of all sorts. The dispersed Jew must perforce merge with each and every nationality of which he is a part, without inter or supranational reservations. If the Jew has a mission, that is to say a task to perform for mankind's good, he must do it from his own place. Judea will be a component part of the league of nations. In the dispersion there is no room for a Jewish separatism. Read the anti-Semite Lagarde and see how the idea of a German Jew boasting of a superior culture towards the German strikes the latter. It cannot be otherwise. It will never be conducive to peaceful relations with our neighbors. At best we in the dispersion can maintain our spiritual connections with the homeland; at best we may hold fast to our traditions and to our historical consciousness. As individuals we lose our Jewish identity. Whatever contributions we make to the world's progress, we do so within the national culture which we adopt for our own, as Frenchmen, Americans, etc. There is no other way, and we may just as well make up our minds about it. In the dispersion our business is to subordinate ourselves quite unmistakably. If we wish to make a noise with our mission, our place is elsewhere. By all means kill the international plank in the Jewish platform of the construction of the reformers. We have no quarrel with reforming Judaism. But the place to reform it is in the homeland. At all events do not reform the world to an international chaos where the distinctions of races and nations and tongues and cultures are no more.

GIFTS FOR FRENCH WAR ORPHANS

JEW AND CHRISTIAN NECESSARY FOR PROGRESS

By Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Times and conditions modify the attitude of people towards the Jew. In Russia, where the government was despotic, the individuality of the Jew was crushed, and his progress was made despite innumerable obstacles and incalculable wrongs. In the more civilized countries the weight of oppression becomes lighter while in countries like the United States and Great Britain the Jew is afforded equality of opportunity. A long period of development separates the United States from Russia and this difference in progress is responsible for the enlightened policy of the republic and the benighted attitude of the latter country towards the Jew.

Is the United States rewarded for its liberal policy towards the Jew? The history of the Jew in America answers this question. The Jew has always defended the Stars and Stripes; has always been on the side of right and good government; has always supported those movements that make, not mar, a country's greatness. His ingenuity, his perseverance and his mental alertness have helped him to add to the wealth and intellectual progress of this country.

It is surprising and, at the same time, a sad commentary on the world's history how few nations understood the value of the Jew and consequently failed to utilize his superior qualities. Is it any wonder, then, that the Jew does not always bear the kindliest feelings towards his Christian neighbors? Would any Christion display angelic qualities towards his tormentors and oppressors? In view of the centuries of persecution that the Jew has suffered, it may be said that he shows exceptional patience under trying circumstances. His patience has been taxed to the limit and stretched to the margin of endurance, yet he was willing to be sacrificed for his faith, and succeeded in outliving his oppressor. Few people there are who have borne the world's woes more nobly than the wandering Jew, and have more readily kissed the hands of his enemies. Slowly, but surely, the world is beginning to appreciate the significance of these beautiful passages in Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice:

"Hath not a Jew eyes? Hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? Fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer, as a Christian is"?

I have no sympathy with those Christions who, as the Templar in the story of Ivanhoe, are ready to curse the Jew, but accept him for his money. The Jew is the peer of his Gentile neighbors. His works, his history, his contributions to the world's progress constitute his claim upon the generosity of the Christians. The Jew has contributed his strength to the progress of this glorious country, and is, therefore, entitled to all the consideration due the builders of the nation.

Neither have I any sympathy for those Christians who labor under the impression that the Jews' salvation is conditioned upon their acceptance of the Christian faith. I am opposed to proselytizing. Each one of us in trying to solve the problem of life in accordance with one's conception of right and wrong, and no one can claim a monopoly of righteousness. During my career as minister I have had added about four thousand members to my congregation; of these members only two were Jews, one of whom voluntarily joined the congregation. I do not recall why the other became affiliated with us. Each congregation has enough work to do, without worrying about saving the souls of Jews. The Jews have a beautiful religion, and they, too, are doing their level best to keep their people within the fold. They should be encouraged in their activity and not disturbed.

Jew and Gentile are necessary for the success of this nation. Both must solve the great and serious problems of life. Each can contribute his share, his thought and his energy towards the improvement of conditions. Let us work together and put our shoulders to the wheel for life is too sweet and too short to spend in bickerings and quarrels. We are all God's creatures and have been sent to do His bidding.

NATURALIZATION OF JEWS IN ROUMANIA

The Roumanian government has set up commissions in every district to examine claims of Jews for naturalization. The commissions consist of a judge and representatives of the Home and Foreign Ministries. The Crown Solicitor has the right to oppose each claim, and both sides have the right to appeal to a Superior Court.

M. Arion, minister for foreign affairs, has announced that a real endeavor to solve the Jewish question will be made by the constituent assembly soon after its convocation. In the meantime the Union of Roumanian Jews has addressed memorials to the government and to Parliament, pointing out the defects of the present concessions and the improvements needed therein, and proclaiming that Jewry would only consider the Jewish question as solved when all Jews obtained equal rights.

THE GERMAN COLONIES IN RUSSIA

The anti-Jewish campaign in the German colonies in the South of Russia has assumed remarkable dimensions. Jews are expelled from houses owned by Germans, who confiscate or "requisition" wholesale their tenants' property and goods.

THE DIASPORA

Monthly Review of Events in the Jewish World

By Gotthard Deutsch

The reviewer of current history in these days of excitement, of irregularity of communication and of strict censorship will be forgiven, when he prefaces his remarks with an apology for his caution in accepting certain reports. Even in normal times an unusual event always leads to exaggerations. When on Sept. 30, 1911, the town of Austin, Pa., was flooded by the bursting of a dam, the papers reported on the first day that "900 of the inhabitants are known to have perished". On the next day the loss was placed "by conservative estimate at 300". On the third day we learned that "the total loss will not exceed 150" and on the fourth day an official report assured us that "the total number of the known dead stands at 38".

War times are especially apt to create a state of mind, favorable to the wildest exaggerations. Albert Cohn, the well-known philanthropist of Paris, in an address delivered in a Paris synagog on Hanukkah 1870 spoke of 100,000 Jews who were serving in the French army. As a matter of fact there were barely 100,000 Jews living in France at that time, and as the German Jews outnumbered those of France at the rate of 6 to 1, and yet had only 4,694 soldiers in the field, one thousand Jewish soldiers for France would be a liberal estimate. It is in the interest of the Jewish cause to remain calm both in judging Jewish achievements and in speaking of Jewish suffering.

Let us apply the rule of conservatism and calmness to this mooted subject first—ZIONISM.

Whether we like it or not, Zionism occupied the front rank in Jewish current history during the last month. President Wilson sent a kind of New Year's greeting to the Jewish people of the United States, published surely not without intention, Sept. 5, two days before Rosh Hashanah. He says: "I have watched with deep and sincere interest the reconstruction work . . . done in Palestine, . . . and I welcome an opportunity to express the satisfaction I have felt in the progress of the Zionist movement in the United States and in the allied countries since the declaration of . . . Great Britain's approval of the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people. . . . I think that all Americans will be deeply moved by the report that . . . the Weizmann commission has been able to lay the foundation of the Hebrew University at Jerusalem with the promise that that bears of spiritual rebirth".

Adapting a well-known German phrase to this message, we shall not turn or twist the words of the chief executive of the nation. He clearly expressed his sympathy with the objects of the Zionist movement and his satisfaction with its progress. A day after the publication of this statement a protest signed by several rabbis of the liberal wing of Judaism was sent to the President, informing him that he was not correctly informed on the ideals of the Jewish citizenship of the United States. This evoked again a storm of indignation in the camp of the Zionists and their orthodox sympathizers who arranged massmeetings and hurled fiery editorials in the Yiddish press at the "haters of Zion". Only a week after President Wilson's indorsement they received another strong support from the British premier, David Lloyd George, who said at a reception in Manchester Sept. 11 to a committee of Zionists that "the fulfillment of (their) historic aspiration . . . is an essential corollary to the necessary enfranchisement of the oppressed peoples of the near East". This again is a statement from responsible quarters which, whether we like it or condemn it, leaves nothing to be desired in clearness of expression. The historian has to be impartial. Zionists see the ultimate aim of Jewish history in the preservation of Jewish individuality and in its peaceful recognition by the outside world. Anti-Zionists believe in the ultimate absorption of the Jews by a united international humanity. Oceans of printer's ink have been spilled in the discussion of the respective merits of these principles. The regrettable feature of the renewed controversy is that both parties cannot agree on aims which must be common to both, namely, the material and cultural development of Palestine, and that they remain unmindful of the fine philosophic thought of the Talmud (Sabbath, 119b): Jerusalem fell because the inhabitants did not respect the opinions of their opponents.

The cultural development of Palestine has meantime made tangible progress. The American Medical Unit which, as an Associated Press dispatch of Sept. 4 informs us, has arrived in Palestine, was warmly received, both in London, July 14, and in Paris, July 24. In the former city Lord Rothschild presided at the reception, in the latter city Baron Edmond, the generous supporter of the colonization movement for more than thirty years, did the honors of the occasion. Prominent non-Jews participated in the event in both cities. In Paris M. Tardieu, high commissioner for the Franco-American war relations, extended personally the good wishes of the government, and in London Lord Cecil, the secretary of state for foreign affairs, sent a message. Even the appearance of Sir Alfred Mond, the "Mechutten" of Lord Reading, who for years kept aloof from all Jewish affairs, is significant for the interest of the outside world. Equally significant is the participation of the Italian "Comitato delle Communita Israelitiche" by deputizing two members to the Weizmann commission. The most satisfactory phenomenon is the fact that something tangible is being done. The British administration with the efficiency characterizing its activity in backward countries coming under its sway, has, if the reports are correct, already solved that problem of sanitation which had occupied the mind of King Hezekiah 2,500 years ago, and has provided a water supply for Jerusalem, and otherwise improved the hygienic conditions of the country. It is highly significant that a non-Jewish writer in the "North American Review" pays a warm tribute to the work done by the Jewish colonists, and it is equally significant that the Russian Jews in spite of the critical situation in their own country, or perhaps because of it are going to work in a business-like manner to meet the various problems of Palestine upon the return of normal times. The Jews of Petrograd formed societies for the establishments of modern hotels, for the production of oil, for general industrial development and for irrigation in Palestine with a capital of several million dollars in each enterprise. W. M. Flinders Petrie, the famous Egyptian explorer, read a paper before a London society of architects in which he presented his plans for the rebuilding of Jerusalem. If he should be as successful as he was in the discovery of ancient Memphis, we may look for great things. It is somewhat aggravating that the sane suggestion of Mr. Zolotkoff to establish in Jerusalem a printing office with modern equipment for the printing of Hebrew books did not meet with more enthusiastic response. Such an establishment would serve both a material and a spiritual aim, and should appeal to Zionists and non-Zionists alike. The University of Jerusalem is so far only a scheme which does not mean to throw cold water on the enterprise, but mere enthusiasm will not accomplish the work. Let us hope that the 15 of Ab, a long forgotten holiday of Maccabean times, selected for the foundation stone laying of the university, will receive a new meaning in Israel's future history.

The admonition to caution requires that we do not overlook some ill-foreboding signs. Count de Gontaut, the French clerical journalist, discusses in the "Revue Hebdomadaire" of May 25 the prospects of Zionism and demands for France the historic right of protecting the Christians in the Orient, claiming sovereignty over Palestine and a special right to control the sacred places of Christianity on the ground that "Catholic" France will best guarantee the freedom of all religions. The Arabic newspapers of New York, interviewed on the question by the "Jewish Correspondent", expressed themselves partly with great reserve and partly with open hostility on the subject of Jewish control of Palestine.

Antisemitic Rumblings

The Bible tells us of the sons of Ephraim who were killed by the people of Gath (1 Chr. 7:21-22), and a Talmudic homily on this passage says they were killed for prematurely attempting to conquer the Promised Land (Sanhedrin, 92b). It is a serious mistake to anticipate the Messianic era, and our experience furnishes us the proof for this fact almost every day. Mr. Louis Marshall learned that the United States Shipping Board placed an advertisement with the New York Times which demanded a "Christian" file clerk. When this was refused by the paper, the text was changed to the requirement that the applicant state his religion. Upon Mr. Marshall's complaint Mr. Charles Schwab, as the director general of the board, issued instructions to the heads of the department that such advertisements are a violation of the fundamental principles of the government. In a letter to Mr. Marshall, dated Aug. 8, Mr. Schwab expressed his regret at the occurrence, but declined Mr. Marshall's suggestion that the clerk responsible for this advertisement be discharged on the ground that she was a woman. The Jews to whom the detractors of their religion hold up the text of the prayer in which the man expresses thanks for not having been created a woman—which by the way is also ascribed to Socrates and Plato—have always shown consideration to woman by extending to her special privileges in the courts (Gittin, 41a). Mr. Marshall as a good Jew will not object to Mr. Schwab's ruling.

Rabbi Bernstein of St. Joseph, Mo., brought a rather commonplace incident to public attention by pointing to Berta Ruck's novel, "Miss Million Maid," in which Jews are presented in an unpleasant light. This is an old story, and as the case of Dickens' Oliver Twist proves by no means indicative of the author's antisemitism. The clearest instance of this kind is the case of Emil Zola, who surely was not an antisemite. We might pass by his politician, Kahn, who is a financial exploiter of his position as something which is connected with actual experiences, but a Jewish servant girl employed in a Christian family and betraying her mistress which he presents in the same "Rougon-Macquart" series, is certainly not typical. It seems that an author figures, as a rule, on the anti-Jewish prejudice of his public.

The Red Magen David over the New York office of this organization was torn down by a group of soldiers who believed it to be a Bolsheviki flag. In itself insignificant, the incident proves that in the eyes of the general public, as we see from various periodicals, the Bolsheviki movement, like everything that is objectionable, is considered Jewish.

The affairs in England seem more serious. Lord Rothschild as chairman of the press committee of the Board of Deputies announced an action against the systematic persecution of the Jews by the Northcliffe press. He asked the government to furnish official data on the number of Jews in actual service and on distinctions won by them which the committee proposes to publish in the various papers. The result of this step has at the time of this writing not been reported. The Board of Deputies also took action in the case of a Jewish soldier who, after being honorably discharged from the army, was refused naturalization and in the case of Jewish internes discriminated against in the London hospitals. We believed such things to be typical of Prussia, where a similar case in the county hospital of Britz led to an animated discussion in the diet April 30, 1910. There is even a government's action on which the Board of Deputies memorialized the government. A new rule exempts the Poles from the restrictions imposed on enemy aliens on the ground that they are in sympathy with the cause of the Allies, though technically Austrian or German subjects. The board objects, and it will seem, not without reason, to the wording "Poles by race" which seems to have been framed so as to exclude the Jews from the benefit of this law. An internal difference in the Board of Deputies is from this distance not quite intelligible. An amendment to the by-laws excludes money lenders from representation. There was some objection to this amendment. It is absolutely impossible that the objectors were actuated by sympathy with the money lenders, but in all likelihood they felt that the introduction of such an amendment at this time was an indirect admission of a certain justice in the antisemitic charges, and therefore a sign of weakness on the part of a Jewish body.

We are naturally even less informed on conditions in the enemy countries which does not mean that the reports are incredible. We are told in reports that come via Amsterdam or Zurich that "Stand and Strucker", members of the Austrian Reichstag interpellated the minister on the exclusion of Hebrew and Yiddish letters from the mail and on annoyances of Yiddish newspapers. Another grievance was that the minister did not allow the registration of Yiddish as mother tongue. The minister promised relaxation of the restrictions on Yiddish letters and newspapers and consideration of the demand that Yiddish be recognized as a language. Under the conditions mentioned in the introduction it is impossible to have a clear view of the situation. The uncertainty of the report is seen in the name Strucker, hitherto unknown, though perhaps a misprint for Straucher, a well-known Galician politician. The demand for the recognition of Yiddish as a language, especially in a country like Austria, where the German dialects differ so much from each other and from the written languages and where every educated Jew who knows Yiddish knows German, seems from this distance a childish demonstration. The report that Prussia closed her boundary to Polish Jews, while equally unascertainable, is quite probable. The first tangible achievement of the antisemitic movement in Prussia was the expulsion of "Poles" from the eastern provinces under Minister von Puttkamer in 1885. In Prussia unwelcome Jews are "Poles". In England, as the action of the Board of Deputies seems to indicate, they are not Poles. This is one of the Zionist arguments.

Roumania

The unofficial nature of our information on foreign events is especially painful with regard to Roumanian affairs. It seems certain that the peace treaty between Roumania and the Central Allies made a stipulation favorable to the Roumanian Jews. The official text is not made known to us, a fact which the Jewish Chronicle rightly deplores. The unofficial reports have it that in the new bill, passed by the Roumanian parliament, full political and civic equality is granted to all Jews, born in Roumania of Roumanian born parents, to all those who fought in the wars of 1913 and 1916, and to all professional men who have practiced their profession for ten years prior to 1916. This treaty was discussed in the Reichstag from different viewpoints. The moderate liberals approved of the situation, the conservatives hid their disapproval of the measure behind the criticism that it was unwise to meddle with the internal affairs of a foreign government, and even the antisemites restricted their disapproval of the measure to the remark that these questions ought to have been left to the final peace negotiations. The Socialists alone protested against the solution as inadequate and asked the government what guarantee there was that Roumania would this time honestly fulfill its obligations. The representative of the government replied that it seemed wiser to accept such conditions as the Roumanian representatives were willing to grant and which the German government would be able to enforce.

The importance of this partial concession may be measured by the grumblings of the discredited politicians who are now living in a voluntary exile. Take Jonescu, the ex-minister of the interior, said to the representative of a Swiss paper: "The unlimited absolute equality of the Jews will not come through this peace treaty but when Roumania shall be free from the German yoke". M. Pichon, the French minister of foreign affairs, said in a letter to the Alliance Israelite Universelle that France, faithful to her traditions, will do everything to bring about a just settlement of the Jewish question in Roumania. The French government is convinced the restricted emancipation under German pressure is not in accord with the "generous declarations" made in June, 1917, by Take Jonescu and Bratiano. The government of France will at the opportune moment take steps to insure that the very wide views of these great Roumanian statesmen will prevail. A similar declaration was made in a letter written Aug. 2 by the Italian ambassador to London upon the order of Premier Sonnino to the Hebrew publicist Nahum Sokolow. Baron Sonnino, by the way, is the son of a converted Jew and a Christian, English mother.

We have our own ideas about the "wide views of these great statesmen" and our just doubts as to the sincerity of their promises. Bratiano, the son of the man who was responsible for the evasion of the Berlin treaty, said to a representative of the Vienna "Neue Freie Presse" in 1909, that the condition of the Jews will improve, "if" the general condition of the country will improve, but that the Jewish question is one for Roumania alone to solve. When in the following year the Jews of Roumania discussed the holding of a congress on their situation, the very same "wide-viewed and great statesman" declared in the Roumanian chamber, Feb. 24, 1910, that only Roumanians possessed the right of free assembly and therefore a Jewish congress could not be tolerated. After the Balkan war of 1913 Jake Jonescu,

ECHOES OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE CELEBRATION OF THE I. O. B. B.

THE B'NAI B'RITH

The seventy-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith has been celebrated this week and the Jewish Community of Chicago, the city in which the headquarters of the Order are located, has during the four days' celebration heard a great many things about the work and worth of the B'nai B'rith. The anniversary celebration of the whole Order was augmented, moreover, by that of the fiftieth anniversary of the Grand Lodge, No. 6, which took place at the same time.

That the officers of the Order or the members of its Executive Cammittee decided to celebrate the anniversary on a large scale regardless of the war spirit and the war economies which ordinarily act as a check to big celebrations is but an evidence of the fact that the B'nai B'rith fully realizes its new and great possibilities and opportunities and did not, therefore, hesitate to call special attention to itself through the celebration. For, the B'nai B'rith has a greater opportunity in the present crisis than that which any other Jewish fraternal organization may have to do telling work for all Jewry. While in point of numbers the Order is much smaller than several other Jewish fraternal organizations, yet the quality and calibre of its members and their standing and influence are such that it is best in a position to accomplish many and great things, not only of a national, but also of an international character.

The world, at least that part of it whose opinion will count at the termination of the war, is in a most receptive mood now for a consideration of the aims and aspirations of such an altruistic organization as the B'nai B'rith. The principles of justice, liberty and humanity have for seventy-five years formed the basis for the efforts and endeavors of the B'nai B'rith. Its energy has ever been directed towards ameliorating the physical, mental and moral condition of mankind through human helpfulness. The fatherhood of God as exemplified in the brotherhood of man has througnout its existence been the inspiration and propelling power of its life and its labors. For these things the Order has lived and striven all these seventy-five years. And it is precisely these things for which the Allied nations have now unsheathed their swords in the battle of righteousness. Hence, the unprecedented opportunities and the unlimited possibilities of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith at this particular time of stress and struggle.—The Jewish Ledger.

A NOTABLE CELEBRATION

Reports have reached us of the fitting celebration of the diamond anniversary of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, and of the golden jubilee of one of its branches, District No. 6, which was held in Chicago last week. From all over the country, leaders high in the councils of the order came to participate in the commemorative proceedings. Splendid addresses were delivered by men familiar with the Order's history and accomplishments and competent to speak with authority on its hopes and ideals.

For seventy-five years the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith has been in existence and the story of those years is one which is interesting, instructive and inspiring. In the realm of Jewry there is no organization, fraternal in character, which may be compared with it. Service has ever been its watch-word. To serve the Jew and to serve humanity have always been its guiding purposes. Institutions that have been reared, such as the homes for the aged, asylums for the orphans, sanitariums for the sick and the others that it has founded or fostered bear striking witness to the spirit of service which has animated it.

Within the past quarter of a century the order has broadened its scope and enlarged its vision. It has rendered notable service in behalf of the cause of our people the world over. In not a few cases it has been the spokesman for the rights of the Jews and its voice has been respectfully heard and greatly heeded. One of its justly celebrated creations has been the formation of the Anti-Defamation League. Through the medium of this league the fair name of the Jew has been protected. Through its agency the so-called stage Jew has been practically removed from the boards. Caricatures of the Jew in newspaper, magazine, book, play or film have almost become eliminated. Recently the Order displayed its wide-awake spirit in sensing and providing for the recreational needs of our Jewish soldiers and sailors. In various cities close to camps club rooms were fitted up and everything was done for the welfare of our boys. A short time ago this activity was merged with those of the Jewish Welfare Board, it being felt that all welfare work should be under the direction of one national organization.

The I. O. B. B. has ever been actuated by the lofty ideals of benevolence, brotherly love and harmony. These ideals, together with that of democracy, which permeates the Order, have been instrumental in making the lodge room the meeting place for the followers of the various interpretations of Judaism and have helped to bring about a strong feeling of unity amongst us. We have always regarded the B'nai B'rith as the helpmate of the synagogue. We feel that it stands for applied Judaism. It has justified its right to existence. Light has been its battle-cry and light, intellectual and spiritual, it has sent forth into the world. It has proven itself to be a blessing and will continue to be a blessing for all Jewry. May the work of its hands go from strength to strength!

—Toledo Israelite.

SEVENTY-FIVE YEARS OLD

The special issue of the B'nai B'rith News for September-October is one of especial value and interest, inasmuch as it commemorates the seventy-fifth anniversary of the foundation of Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, and contains articles of real worth both literary and historical.

Beginning with a brief but comprehensive historical sketch of the gradual progress of the Order, we pass on to the "History of Organiaztion in Judaism", by Gotthard Deutsch, which in itself is an introduction to the history of I. O. B. B.

Dr. S. N. Deinard's article on "How Old Is Anti-Semitism"? is well worth reading, while "Ambition", by Rev. Dr. Beth Hausman, rabbi of Temple Beth Israel, New York City, and the second installment of "The Sages of Israel", the tenth of a series of essays on Jewish leaders, by Rabbi Samuel S. Cohon of Chicago, should be carefully read and pondered over.

Cleverly written as are such articles as "Sktches of Modern Jewish History", by Frank H. Short, President of the California Bar Association, and "Spiritual Results of Jewish War Relief Campaigns", by Albert P. Lewin, instructor in English, University of Missouri, they do not outclass such contributions as "The Seventh Month", by Dr. Max L. Margolis, and "A High and Holy Appeal o the Conscience of the American Jew", by Rev. Dr. Jacob H. Kaplan of Reading Road Temple, Cincinnati, Ohio, which are two productions of solid worth.

Besides a number of interesting articles and reports on I. O. B. B. activities and institutions, this anniversary number of the B'nai B'rith News also contains other noteworthy articles, such as "The Jew—His Destiny", by Charles C. Pavey, the "Situation of the Jews in Roumania", by Prime Minister Marghiloman, and the fifth installment of "The Philosophy of a Proletarian", by "a Peaceful Workman".

Well worth while though every issue of the B'nai B'rith News has ever been, yet this anniversary number is such that we have no hesitation in saying that any true Jew who fails to secure a copy is wilfully robbing himself of much pleasure and enlightenment.—Jewish Voice, Seattle.

DIAMOND JUBILEE OF THE INDEPENDENT ORDER B'NAI B'RITH

The Order B'nai B'rith celebrated its diamond jubilee on October 1st. It was an important occasion not only for the members of the Order, but for Jewry at large.

Chicago, the headquarters of the Executive Committee of the Order, was chosen as the city in which to hold the principal celebration. The festivities were of a high order, and the speeches were marked by the reaffirmation of its lofty principles—loyalty to Judaism, to Country, and to Humanity.

The Order is seventy-five years young. It was brought into being in New York City in October, 1843. Its main object was to unify Israel for moral and mental uplift; to strengthen the allegiance to the government under which they dwell and to break down the barriers that existed between Jew and Jew. The founders builded well. They established in the midst of Jewry a power for good which has justified its existence.

The defenseless, the downtrodden and the oppressed in every land have always had a sturdy defender in this Order. It interceded for suffering peoples everywhere and demanded justice for the Jew before the Bar of Nations.

While in the beginning of its career inducements to join were sick benefits and endowment, these were gradually eliminated and today the Order is an altruistic organization. The various charitable institutions for the child, the aged, and the sick throughout the country are monuments of the practical efforts of the Order.

The benefits to the members are less tangible though no less real. Its greatest work has been that it has served as the melting pot of Jewry. Into the lodge room were drawn all elements from all classes of Jews. It gathered those who were lost to Israel and kept those which other influences tended to separate, and maintains its strong sway over Jewry for good which it has had from the first. Through this fraternization it sends forth men temperate, uplifted, broadened.

The Order can review its past work with satisfaction. Nor need there be any fear as to whether it will continue to labor as effectively. Conditions are changing, and new problems will be before it. The Order is progressive, live and virile. Its work may have to be altered, but its influence will ever be the same as long as it continues in the future as in the past to exemplify its motto of Benevolence, Brotherly Love and Harmony.—Denver Jewish News.

The Independent Order B'nai B'rith are celebrating their seventy-fifth anniversary and great preparations are being made in Chicago to memorize the event in a manner befitting the solemn occasion. The I. O. B. B. has every reason to be proud of its past and to be proud of its accomplishments. In the field of humanitarian work it has great accomplishments to its credit and it may also be proud of some of its political activities. If the order does not progress in the present as it did in the past, and if it does not hold the same place in the life of American Jewry today as it did twenty or thirty years ago, it is mainly due to the fact that it did not keep pace with time and did not remain in touch with the life of our people and its development. Thirty or forty years ago, an organization like the B'nai B'rith could well afford to take a neutral attitude to Jewish political questions affecting the life of our entire people. Today it can no longer afford to do it. It must commit itself to a certain policy, and because it does not do it for one reason or another, it remains outside the political struggle, and therefore, of course, also outside of active Jewish life. In this way the I. O. B. B. reduces itself to a semi-philanthropic organization, which, while doing good philanthropic and humanitarian work, cannot possibly attract the attention of the masses. The Independent Order B'nai B'rith is well organized and has a considerable membership, and if its leaders could make up their minds to revise their old attitude to the great Jewish problems of the day or if the rank and file of the Order would rejuvenate the organization by electing new leaders, alive to their great task, the Order would not only be an order of the past but of the future, and would considerably contribute to the growth and strengthening of Jewish life, both in this country and abroad.—American Jewish Chronicle.

THE B'NAI B'RITH

The B'nai B'rith Order celebrated its seventy-fifth anniversary last Sunday in various cities throughout the country. Its jubilee comes at a time when this city is subject to the epidemic, so that no public celebration could be held here. But the Philadelphia members of the Order have not forgotten the occasion, and they will no doubt arrange a suitable commemoration to take place at some time in the near future.

The B'nai B'rith has had an honorable and useful career. It has answered the needs of a large number of Jewish communities in this country and a smaller number abroad. It has been a factor for good wherever it has established itself. In some localities, particularly in the West and South, it occupies a larger place in the communal life of the Jewish people than it does in the metropolitan centers in the East; but even there it has its loyal adherents, who are actively interested in the various enterprises in which it is engaged. The Order is holding its own in point of material strength despite the fact that its benefits are for the general welfare, and not for the members exclusively. The Order has always maintained the honor and integrity of the Jewish name in high degree.—The Jewish Exponent.

THE DIAMOND JUBILEE

On Sunday seventy five years had elapsed since the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith was founded in this city. Twelve Jews, of German origin, headed by the intrepid Henry Jones, the immortal organizer of this splendid Jewish institution, called it into life. They were, besides Jones, William Renan, Isaac Rosenberg, Isaac Dittenhoefer, Michael Schwab, R. M. Rodacher, Henry Kling, Valentine Koon, Samuel Schaefer, Jonas Hecht, H. Heineman and M. Anspacher.

From modest beginnings the Order grew, and rapidly did its membership and the number of its subordinate lodges increase. By 1868 over 20,000 names were enrolled in its lists, and this was probably the zenith of the prestige and prosperity of the B'nai B'rith in the American Jewish community. Since that time the order has deepened and internationalized its appeal and sought to become a factor for the benefit of the Jews throughout the world. Thus, in 1893, when the Order passed its half-century mark, its members numbered over 30,000, while today there are in good standing more than 40,000 loyal Sons of the Covenant.

Hence the present anniversary finds the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith well equipped to deal with the Jewish and humanitarian causes it has so energetically made its own. Today, as throughout its long and honorable career of usefulness, it aims to unite the Jewish people in the work of promoting their highest interests and those of humanity. It endeavors to develop and elevate the mental and moral character of all the Jews within the sphere of its influence. It seeks to inculcate the purest principles of philanthropy, honor and patriotism, supports science and art, succors the sick and the needy among the poor, and rescues the victims of persecution.

This noble program, to which the B'nai B'rith has been so markedly faithful, suffices to endow the institution with the right to live and thrive for many, many times seventy-five years. That the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith in this, its anniversary period, will advance from strength to strength, that it will ever renew its youthful vitality and, at the same time, remain true to its great and time-honored ideals, is and must be the sincere prayer of every Jew in America and throughout the world.—Hebrew Standard.

Welcome, thrice welcome, to the men and women from out of town, who come to this city during the coming week to join heartily in the celebration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the existence of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith. While the order did not see the light of day in the city of Chicago, it is eminently fitting that here this milestone in its history be celebrated for the distinguished President of the Order, Mr. Adolf Kraus, has his home here, and the honor is due him to commemorate this event in this great and growing western metropolis. Perhaps in no period of the existence of the Order has greater activity been displayed than during the years that Adolf Kraus guided its destiny. Great and stirring events have occurred in the life of Israel during these years, and it required a man possessed of the foresight and insight of Mr. Kraus to help solve these problems so that they would result in the greatest good to the cause of Israel. And Mr. Kraus has always been ready in times of crises to give his time and thought and energy in the solution of these problems.

None can begin to estimate the good that has come out of the efforts of the B'nai B'rith during the pivotal years of its existence. It has sought to unite the forces of Israel the world over. It has called into existence many charitable and eleemosynary institutions in all parts of our country and in other countries. For the order is not merely confined to America. It is international in its scope. Whenever a crisis occurred in the life of Israel the Order B'nai B'rith was on hand to do what it could to straighten it out. It is a vital agency in trying to mitigate the prejudice against the Jew through the instrumentality of the Anti-Defamation League. And what it has done is simply an earnest of what greater efforts it is going to put forth in the reconstructive work of the future. We look to see the B'nai B'rith increase its force for good in the coming years. When it commemorates the centennial of its existence, may the men who are with us today still be with us, lending their aid and counsel in building up the life of the Jew and Judaism the world over. Hail, all hail Order B'nai B'rith! May it go from strength to strength to the glory of God and the good of all humanity!—The Sentinel.

NEWPORT NEWS LODGE NO. 783, I. O. B. B.

The present epidemic has unfortunately not failed to visit Newport News, Va., and to inflict an irreparable loss upon the Jewish Community there, and especially upon Newport News Lodge No. 783, I. O. B. B. through the demise of one of its most beloved members, Brother William A. Graff, P. P. The deceased brother passed away in the very prime of his life, 31 years of age. The deep mourning of the relatives of the departed is shared by the entire Jewish Community of Newport News. Brother William A. Graff possessed a keen understanding of the ideals, and noble principles of the I. O. B. B., and knew how to appreciate and to translate into practice, its inspiring teachings. By profession an attorney-at-law, he was well qualfied to render real valuable services to the Independent Order B'Nai B'rith, in general, and to the Newport News Lodge of the I. O. B. B. in particular, whether for the Social Service Committee, or the Vaudeville Vigilance Committee, or for any other purpose. When advice or help was needed, William A. Graff, blessed be his memory, although always extremely occupied, had plenty of time. On several occasion he delivered instructive talks to the brethren of his lodge. He was a lover of the Hebrew language, and he greatly enjoyed divine services at which our sacred tongue played an important part. When he commemorated the "Yahrzeit" of his sainted mother, he himself read the "Maariv—and Shacharith—Services", intelligently and most solemnly; he also assisted the rabbi of his congregation on Yom Kippur.

When the Newport News branch of the Jewish Welfare Board, U. S. Army and Navy, was organized, Brother William A. Graff was elected chairman. It afforded him a great deal of pleasure to spend his time, energy and money for the sake of a cause which was dearer to his heart than any other. Through his influence, thousands of Jewish soldiers on their way to France—Newport News is a port of embarkation—were made to "feel at home", at the Jewish Welfare Center.

Brother William A. Graff's funeral was unique; it was one of the largest ever held in Newport News. It was also attended by a good many non-Jews; the Bar Association was represented in a body. Funeral services were conducted by Bro. N. Speier, a very intimate friend of the deceased. Bro. Sol Peyser read the B'nai B'rith funeral prayers. The "Elks", too, showed their respect to Brother Graff, by holding a service in his honor. The deceased is survived by his widow, his young daughter, Sherley, three sisters, his brother, E. J. Graff, vice-president of Newport News Lodge, and his father, the treasurer of Newport News Central Committee for Jewish War Sufferers.

The remembrance of the righteous is a blessing.

B'NAI B'RITH OF SAN FRANCISCO

A class initiation was the principal feature of the meeting of Golden Gate Lodge, No. 129, which took place on Wednesday evening, Oct. 16, 1918. The degree team of the Committee of Fifty officiated.

A program of musical and literary features was presented, which was very much enjoyed by a large number of members and visiting brothers from sister Lodges.

Committee of Fifty Entertains

Inmates of the two Jewish Homes of the Aged were guests of the Committee of Fifty of the local B'nai B'rith lodges on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 6, 1918, when they were taken in automobiles on a sight seeing tour through the city. This affair is an annual event under the ausnices of the Committee of Fifty and is participated with much interest by the old folks. Members of the Ladies Auxiliaries assisted in providing for the enjoyment of the guests.

A number of members of the San Francisco Lodges crossed the Bay on Tuesday evening, Oct. 8, 1918, to attend a Rally and Class Initiation held by Oakland Lodge No. 252. The degree team of the Committee of Fifty of San Francisco performed the ritualistic work. Mr. Justin H. Steinhart was the principal speaker of the evening.

Golden Gate Lodge, No. 129, is publishing an attractive bulletin under the name of "The Golden Echo". It is replete with interesting accounts of the members in the service at home and overseas.

Enlisted men of the army and navy were the guests of the two local Ladies' Auxiliaries of the B'nai B'rith, namely, Columbia and Modin Ophir, at a dance given by the Auxiliaries on Sept. 21 in the B'nai B'rith Hall. At the conclusion of the evening refreshments were served.

B'NAI B'RITH OF CHICAGO

Ramah Lodge

An unusually well attended meeting of Ramah Lodge, No. 33, was held at Covenant Club on Oct. 14, 1918. A large number of applications for membership were presented and a class of fifteen new members were initiated by the Degree Team of the Lodge.

The War Activities Committee reported that it caused a circular to be issued to all the members of the Lodge requesting their most active participation in the recent Liberty Loan campaign; also the sum of $1,000 of the Lodge funds was invested in Liberty Bonds in addition to other bonds purchased by the Lodge.

The delegates to the recent Grand Lodge Convention presented a full report of the proceedings and of the festivities in connnection with the Golden Jubilee of the District and the seventy-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Order.

The Intellectual Advancement Committee of the Lodge was directed to prepare a course of lectures to be given at the meetings of the Lodge and also to arrange for suitable entertainments for the members and their families.

Oriental-Hillel and David Fish Lodges

As a result of the influenza and the subsequent orders of the municipal authorities forbidding the holding of public meetings, no meeting of Oriental-Hillel Lodge or David Fish Lodge was held during the month of October. Committees of the Lodge, however, in conjunction with the officers, attended to the urgent business of the Lodge.

Central B'nai B'rith Council

The monthly meeting of the Central B'nai B'rith Council was held in the early part of the month of October and was well attended.

A full detailed report of the B'nai B'rith Summer Camp for Boys was presented, showing that a two weeks' vacation was given to 162 Jewish boys in the period between July 2 and Aug. 24, at a cost of over $3,000, of which amount over $900 was appropriated for equipment. The Council approved of the activities of the Boys Summer Camp and resolved to continue the work during the coming season, and to make a special effort to increase the facilities so that at least double the number of boys may be taken care of.

The report of the B'nai B'rith Free Employment Bureau of Chicago showed marked activities during the preceding month, and although the number of applicants was slowly decreasing from those reported during the previous months, the case of those who may be classified as dependents, defectives and disability increased in large numbers and thereby placed a great deal more work upon the staff to provide suitable employment for them.

The report of the Propaganda Committee of the Council showed that for the Diamond Jubilee celebration of the Order a short campaign for membership resulted in the securing of over 400 applications, of which number about 250 were initiated in the class initiation held on Sept. 30, 1918.

Covenant Club

The Covenant Club of Chicago opened its season's activities with a stag and entertainment at the Club, which was unusually well attended considering sanitary and economic conditions prevailing at the time. About 200 members assembled for a bountiful supper served, during which various vaudeville numbers were successfully carried out. During the evening a patriotic appeal for subscriptions to Liberty Bonds was made and as a result thereof almost $50,000 was secured in plus subscriptions from those present at the entertainment.

MANHATTAN - WASHINGTON LODGE, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Manhattan-Washington Lodge No. 19, through its president, Brother Gabriel Davidson, and its secretary, Bro. Phillip Cowen, arranged a very interesting literary program for the meeting held October 23rd. There was an illustrated lecture on, "The Jewish Soldier in Camp", "The Jewish Soldier at the Front", and "Transporting the Boys to France". The literary program was followed by a dance. The lodge has also arranged a Thanksgiving Chanuka entertainment and dance to take place November 27th.

OAKLAND LODGE, OAKLAND, CAL.

Governor Moses Alexander of Idaho, a member of the Order, was recently entertained at a luncheon by Oakland Lodge, No. 252, at the Hotel Oakland, where Judge George E. Samuels formally introduced the distinguished visitor to his fraternity brothers. Governor Alexander delivered an eloquent address regarding results of the present war.

AKIBA LODGE, NEW YORK

Akiba Lodge No. 173 has been going forward so rapidly and doing things in such a remarkable manner that it is becoming a criterion in New York; as Brother Herman Asher, treasurer of District No. 1, recently remarked: "Akiba has a way of doing things and achieving results which is peculiarly all its own".

Twenty-three new active members, who are, each of them, a credit to the Order and Judaism, have been initiated into the lodge since the first of the year; ten of them since the first meeting of September. Twenty-two applications pending. Other lodges make spasmodic spurts or so-called drives for new members; not so Akiba; if there are not at least three new propositions presented at each meeting the "Tank Corps" gets on the job and there is something doing.

Fourteen brothers have answered the call to the colors; most of them "Over There", in that great big field of action, fighting for what our Order stands for, "Justice, Light, Truth and Peace". One of them was severely wounded; but all of them are anxious to get home and meet the boys of Akiba and once more take an active part in the work of the Order.

A beautiful "service flag" to perpetuate the names of these brothers was presented to the lodge by Rev. Dr. Joseph Silverman, on behalf of Past President Sydney S. Landau, on April 9th. This was a great patriotic rally for the Third Liberty Loan.

On June 11th, Congressman Walter M. Chandler, of New York, journeyed all the way from Washington to New York to address the members of Akiba and their friends and he was given some reception.

Several dances were held at which the lodge room was filled to capacity; besides there were several "Southern Nights" with real darky entertainers and Teddy Schmerl's famous jazz band.

Akiba has taken an active part in all of the Liberty Loan campaigns; this time the members present at the meeting of Sept. 28 decided to go out for subscriptions from 100 per cent of the members. Every member present on that night pledged himself to subscribe; on October 8th, the sum of $20,150 was subscribed for by twenty members present; Brother Maurice P. Davidson, president of District No. 1, who was present, was so enthused by the patriotism shown that he said, "I would deem it a great honor if Akiba Lodge would permit me to subscribe $1,000, through Akiba". Did we let him get away? If you think so, you don't know the members of Akiba.

The war has brought forth many sayings that will live in history, but one which the members of Akiba will remember and will stand like a monument over the life of our treasurer, Joseph Silk, who has been a member of the Order since 1872, was what he said when he pleaded for subscriptions to the Fourth Liberty Loan; in telling the members of how he left Hungary for this country and landed in what was then known as Castle Garden, he told us of the day he arrived in New York and said "On that day I then and there became an American citizen".

Keep your eyes on Akiba, there is always something doing when she meets.

THEO. SCHMERL.

ACTIVITIES OF DISTRICT NO. 3

Through the arrangements made by the Grand Secretary of District No. 3, Mr. Edward Hemple, Mr. Abraham Berkowitz, chairman of the Social Service Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 3, I. O. B. B., and Harry Platowsky, secretary to the Social Service Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 3; in company with Mr. Marcus Feuchtwanger, president of District Grand Lodge, No. 3, I. O. B. B., held a very important meeting at the William Penn Hotel, Pittsburgh, recently, at which place a Social Service Committee was organized for the western end of the district, and at which place a representative gathering of 35 delegates took place and ways and means developed for the successful launching of a campaign for $5,000 in order to establish permanent headquarters with an efficient director in the city of Pittsburgh and to inaugurate a large brotherhood movement and kindred features relevant to the social service department of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith.

The meeting was the most enthusiastic and interesting one that was ever held under the auspices of the B'nai B'rith and augurs well for its future success.

Arrangements are now in the course of preparation for the launching of a similar campaign in the city of Philadelphia by the B'nai B'rith to embrace every feature of the Social Service endeavors. It is the opinion of the active men in charge that Philadelphia will not only equal Pittsburgh's undertaking, but will far surpass it in its financial strength, as well as its general activities.

B'NAI B'RITH OF DENVER

Denver Lodge No. 171 held a regular meeting on Sunday, October 13th, on which occasion Lieut. Walter T. Kohn, District Supervisor 8th District Sanitary Corps, U. S. A., spoke on "Law Enforcement as it Affects the United States Army".

Four minute talks on "Patriotism" are rendered at each meeting of the lodge, and at this meeting Brother Arthur F. Friedman made the patriotic talk.

At a meeting of the lodge, held on October 27th, Brother David E. Harlem made the four minute talk.

The first address of the season was given at the September meeting by Brother Adolph Seidler. "A Silent Member's Impressions" was the subject and he handled it most interestingly.

"Big Brother" Cowen conducted services at the State Penitentiary in Canon City on the high holiday.

Referring to this work by the B'nai B'rith, the Denver Jewish News comments editorially as follows:

"The local B'nai B'rith Lodge deserves credit for conducting services for the Jewish prisoners in the State Penitentiary on the holidays, as it has done in the last few years. A word of hope at the right time may reclaim someone who has fallen by the wayside and lead him from wrong to right. We are glad the B'nai B'rith is performing this duty".

The membership campaign is still going on with a view of securing sufficient new members to offset losses incurred by a large number of the members of the lodge answering the call to the colors.

The lodge has also been called upon by the Treasury Department to give its valuable aid in the campaign connected with the Fourth Liberty Loan. The subscriptions by the members to the Third Liberty Loan were highly commended and appreciation was expressed by the department for the liberal support by the members.

As a result of the Vaudeville Vigilance Committee, a supposed joke which would create a wrong and injurious impression of the Jews was eliminated from a play at one of the local theaters.

B'NAI B'RITH CLUB FORMED BY MEMBERS OF PISGAH LODGE, DETROIT, MICH.

Coincident with the celebration of the Diamond Jubilee of the Order in Chicago, a B'nai B'rith Club has been formed in Detroit by a group of members of Pisgah Lodge of the Order in that city. Plans for such a Club have been under discussion for a long time. Members have felt that a downtown center for recreation, social activities, meeting place would be of much benefit to the Order and would become a new center for commanual work. Club rooms have been selected, furnished and opened at the building at No. 64 Broadway. Arrangements have been made whereby luncheons will be served to members and guests, and provision has also been made for the holding of entertainment and social activities and patriotic activities.

Membership in the Club will be opened to all members of the Order. Mr. Adolph Freund, Past President of District Grand Lodge No. 4, Trustee of the Jewish Orphan Asylum of Cleveland, was elected first President of the Club. It is evident to all that the Club can fill a useful niche in the life of the city. The need of such a downtown center, easily accessible, democratic and progressive, has long been felt. This is why the organization was so readily formed and encouraged by men engaged in downtown business and professional life.

Thus, on the whole, a bright future of useful activity opens before the organization. A great deal of interest has been displayed in its plans since it became generally known that the Club had been formed. More definite plans for the future remain to be announced later. But the members and friends of the organization feel that a bright future of growth and activity is opening before it.

AKRON LODGE, AKRON, OHIO

Wednesday evening, September 25, a meeting was held for the first time in three months. Communications were read from the president of the district urging energetic measures to secure new members to take the places of the numerous B'nai B'rith men who have joined the fighting forces of the nation. A membership campaign soon to be started is expected to increase the membership of the lodge by at least 150.

In the near future there is to be held, under the auspices of the lodge, a large patriotic meeting. Addresses are to be delivered by prominent out-of-town speakers. A service flag is to be dedicated, there being up to date 20 members of the Akron Lodge with the colors.

It was decided to increase the annual contribution to the Akron Federation of Jewish charities to the sum of $150.

GRAND PRESIDENT GUTSTADT AND PARTY EXTENSIVELY ENTERTAINED DURING STAY IN PORTLAND

Richard E. Gutstadt, of San Francisco, grand president of District No. 4, accompanied by Mrs. Gutstadt and her mother, Mrs. Platt, arrived in Portland Sunday, Oct. 6, 1918, and were met by a committee composed of members from the local lodges and were driven to the Portland Hotel. In the afternoon they were taken on an automobile trip over the city and to the principal points of interest. In the evening a dinner was given in their honor at the Portland at which covers were laid for thirty.

Sunday night a joint meeting was held at the B'nai B'rith building by the Portland lodges. A class of 37 were initiated, including 30 soldiers from Vancouver Barracks, by the degree team of Theodor Herzl Lodge, headed by Grand President Gutstadt. After the initiation an open meeting was held and about 300 people attended. Grand President Gutstadt and Rabbi Jonah B. Wise made eloquent addresses, touching on both the Order and the war. District Deputy Alexander Bernstein presided and Rabbi Montaz gave the benediction. Refreshments were served and one of the most successful and largely attended meetings of the B'nai B'rith was held.

Monday afternoon the party was taken on the Columbia River Highway as far as Eagle Creek; a dinner was given at Chanticleer Inn, covers being laid for 40. Tuesday a luncheon was given at the Portland Hotel by the Portland lodges, covers being laid for 60. Grand President Gutstadt, Past Grand President David N. Mosessohn, Hon. Ben Selling and Rabbi Jonah B. Wise spoke. District Deputy Bernstein acted as toastmaster. Tuesday the local auxiliaries of the Daughters of the Covenant entertained Mrs. Gutstadt and her mother, Mrs. Platt, at the Benson Hotel, with a luncheon. Mrs. M. Wax acted as toastmistress. Those responding were Mrs. Alex Goldstein, president of the Oregon Auxiliary; Miss Minna Boscowitz, president of the Jacob Block Auxiliary; Mrs. Jacob Lauterstein, past president of Oregon Auxiliary, and Mrs. Richard Gutstadt, wife of the grand president.

Tuesday evening Grand President Gutstadt attended the meeting of Theodor Herzl Lodge and the ladies attended the meeting of Oregon Auxiliary. Grand President Gutstadt and party left Wednesday morning for Tacoma and the north.

B'NAI B'RITH OF CLEVELAND

The B'nai B'rith Symphony Orchestra holds rehearsals every Monday evening at the B'nai B'rith building.

Mr. Alfred A. Benesch, Second Vice-President of District Grand Lodge, No. 2, participated in the Diamond Jubilee celebration of the Order held in Chicago.

Mr. Maurice Kahn, Secretary of Cleveland Lodge, addressed a Liberty Loan rally in Youngstown recently, and his appeal met with a liberal response.

A large audience turned out to hear Rabbi Abba Hillel Silver at the special gathering of Cleveland Lodge, held on Sept. 26, 1918.

Rabbi Silver recently returned from the battlefields of France and Belgium, and for two hours held his audience spellbound.

This was the first public meeting held under the auspices of the Cleveland Lodge, I. O. B. B., will hereafter continue to give one public meeting a month.

President Haber of Cleveland Lodge announced the appointment of standing committees of the Lodge for the ensuing year as follows:

Executive Committee—A. Lewinthal, Chairman.

Propaganda Committee—Eugene E. Wolf.

Anti-Defamation Committee—S. B. Hibschman.

Activities Committee — Herbert R. Dreyfoos, Chairman.

ACTIVITIES OF DISTRICT NO. 1 LIBERTY LOAN CAMPAIGN

President Davidson, whose appeal to the lodges all through the district in behalf of the Third Liberty Loan netted about $1,750,000 worth of bonds, has also circularized the lodges in behalf of the Fourth Liberty Loan and the result has been gratifying. The Government has been very appreciative of President Davidson's efforts as well as the efforts of those patriotic and faithful men and women who worked hard and energetically to assist in this great patriotic cause. Among those who were of especial assistance to the president in the Fourth Liberty Loan were Bro. Samuel Stark of Brooklyn Lodge No. 753, and the daughters of B'nai B'rith Chapter No. 1, of which Mrs. B. Kessler is the active president; also Bro. Louis Greenwald of Hebron Lodge No. 5.

ARGO LODGE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Argo Lodge No. 413, Washington, D. C., held its first meeting after the summer vacation on Sept. 25, 1918. A special feature of the meeting was the initiation of a class of fourteen candidates and the initiatory work was conducted by a special degree team composed of the officers of the Lodge.

Hon. Simon Wolf, ex-President of the Order, addressed the Lodge on the work of the Order and its accomplishments during the seventy-five years of its existence, calling attention to the fact that the Order will celebrate its Diamond Jubilee in Chicago the following week.

Members of Menorah Lodge, No. 771, of Baltimore, Md., came in a special car to Washington to participate at this meeting. Joseph A. Zamoiski, its President, spoke in behalf of the soldiers' welfare work carried on in Baltimore and in Washington. Judge Milton Strasburger pointed out that Washington was the first city in the country in which the Jewish people organized systematically for the soldiers' welfare work, and that B'nai B'rith was the leading spirit in the movement.

Capt. Julius I. Peyser, who is ex-President of District Grand Lodge, No. 5, called attention to the fact that forty-three members of Argo Lodge are now overseas serving in the cause of the world's liberty. He pointed out most expressively that it was up to all America to support the administration, not only to contribute their "bit", but that if need be give their all, in the same spirit as the loving mother who gives her son for the great cause of democracy.

Philip L. Sykes, a leading Baltimore attorney, called "the gold medal man" of Baltimore, expressed the appreciation of Menorah for the invitation from Argo, and said: "In the near future we expect to have Argo with us in Baltimore".

Dr. Leopold Glushak, commissioned in the Medical Department of the army, spoke most illuminatingly of the great work being done in the reclamation of our soldier veterans.

Sol Herzog, now the first Vice-President of District Grand Lodge, No. 5, welcomed the Baltimoreans in behalf of Argo.

TOLEDO LODGE, TOLEDO, OHIO

On Tuesday evening, Oct. 8, 1918, Toledo Lodge, No. 183, in a fitting manner celebrated the Daimond Jubilee of the Order. Rabbi David Alexander and Bros. Harry Levinson and Sam Messing spoke on the progress of the Order, and Brother L. M. Frank, who attended the celebration in Chicago, submitted a full report of the feseivities in which he participated.

The most interesting meeting of the Order was held by Toledo Lodge, No. 183, on Tuesday, Oct. 8.

The attendance was very large, numbering over 100 members. Brother L. M. Frank, member of the General Committee of the District Grand Lodge, who attended the Diamond Jubilee Celebration of the Order in Chicago, made an interesting report of the program of festivities. He described the growth of the Order from its infancy as it was historically reviewed at the Chicago celebration. He also reported the patriotic services, at which a service flag with 3,256 stars was dedicated to the members of the Order.

Interesting reports of the Convention of District Grand Lodge, No. 2, were read as follows:

Report on International Affairs—Rabbi Alexander.

Report on Charitable Institutions—Brother Sam Messing.

Report on State of the Order—Brother Harry Levinson.

Lieut. Abrahamson of the United States army and a member of the Lodge, who addressed the Lodge, was warmly greeted.

ACTIVITIES OF ESHCOL LODGE, DAYTON, OHIO

Eshcol Lodge, No. 55, of Dayton, Ohio, started their season of activities with three big affairs. The first was held on Sunday, Sept. 29, when the members of the Lodge assembled in large numbers to participate in the Fourth Liberty Loan drive. The second big affair was the Jubilee celebration which marked the seventy-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Order. The celebration was held on Sunday, Oct. 6. A large class of candidates was initiated in the evening and a number of prominent speakers made addresses to the members. The Chanukah ball will mark the third big event and will be held in the latter part of November. The committee who has charge of the affairs of the Lodge promises an evening of pleasure which will eclipse all former events. Part of the proceeds will be given to worthy charities.

SAGINAW LODGE, SAGINAW, MICH.

In order to bring home a forceful message from the celebration in Chicago of the diamond jubilee of the Order and the golden anniversary of District Grand Lodge No. 6, and to put the great lesson into actual practice, Saginaw Lodge No. 636 held an open meeting Sunday Oct. 6th, 7:30 p. m., at their hall at Forester's Temple. The keynote was for a United Jewish Community. That this noble object was put well under way, even at this first meeting, is best exemplified by the presence of the heads of all the Jewish societies of the city, namely: Mrs. Samuel Seitner, president Sisterhood Cong. Beth-El, also superintendent of the Sabbath School; Mrs. B. I. Rosenberg, president Ladies' Auxiliary, Cong. B'nai Israel; Miss Lillie Lenhoff, president Ladies' Aid Society; Miss Lillie Levinson, president Young Peoples' Society; Brother Max Heavenrich, president Cong. Beth-El; Mr. Charles Goldstein, president Cong. B'nai Israel; Bro. J. H. Stark, president Saginaw Lodge No. 636, I. O. B. B., and Bro. A. D. Philippe, chairman Jewish Welfare Board, also a great many members and friends of the named societies. The sentiment was unanimously in favor of the movement, and all present pledged their full support. It is planned to have monthly meetings of this character and other social activities in order to develop not only the spirit of a United Jewish Community, but to assist to the full extent in furthering the greater object of a United Israel.

B'NAI B'RITH OF PORTLAND

Mr. David M. Mosessohn, Past President of District Grand Lodge, No. 4, was the honored guest at a luncheon given by the Portland Lodges at the Multnomah Hotel on Friday, Oct. 4, 1918. Judge Otto J. Kraemer acted as toastmaster.

Responses were made by District Deputy Alex Bernstein, Hon. D. Solis Cohen and Dr. A. Tilzer. Rev. A. Abrahamson gave a prayer for the success and welfare of Mr. Mosessohn in his new field of endeavor. A beautiful gold life membership card was presented by Theodor Herzl Lodge with suitable resolutions adopted at its last meeting, making Mr. Mosessohn a life member of the Lodge, the first life membership given by any Lodge in that district, and was presented by District Deputy Bernstein in a neat and appropriate speech. Mr. Mosessohn responded feelingly and stated that he deeply appreciated the honor conferred by life membership as well as the tribute paid him by the presence of a large gathering of well-wishers at a busy time of the day. Judge Kraemer closed with a splendid tribute to the guest of honor and wishing him Godspeed.

Oregon Auxiliary, Daughters of the Covenant of Portland, Ore., gave a luncheon for Mrs. David M. Mosessohn as the guest of honor at the Benson Hotel, this being a farewell occasion before Mrs. Mosessohn's departure for New York.

Seventy-five members of the Auxiliary were present. Mrs. Jacob Lauterstein acted as toastmistress, and responses were made by Mrs. A. L. Goldstein, President of the Auxiliary; Mrs. M. Wax, Past President; Mrs. N. H. Heller, Trustee, and Mrs. David E. Cohen, Past Vice-President.

Mrs. Mosessohn is Past President of the Oregon Auxiliary, Daughters of the Covenant, and has held the office of Recording Secretary for the past two years. At the last meeting of the Auxiliary a resolution was adopted making her a life member of the organization, and a suitable parchment with the resolutions adopted will be presented to Mrs. Mosessohn before she leaves.

The B'nai B'rith Building of Portland, Ore., has been given to the Commission on Training Camp Activities for the duration of the war, at such time as the building may be needed for war purposes.

The Commission for Training Camp Activities offered to pay for the use of the building, but the Board, from patriotic motives, declined to accept the offered remuneration.

At the meeting of the Oregon Auxiliary, held on Tuesday evening, Oct. 8, 1918, Mr. Richard E. Gutstadt, of San Francisco, president of District Grand Lodge No. 4, witnessed the initiation of several candidates, including Mrs. Platt, the mother of Mrs. Gutstadt, who was made an honorary member.

DISTRICT NO. 1

Bro. Myron Sulzberger, president of Mt. Sinai Lodge No. 11, not only subscribed very liberally himself towards the Fourth Liberty Loan, but also assisted the President by sending a very appealing circular letter to the members of the lodge, who responded very liberally.

Bro. S. Priester, of Edward Everett Lodge No. 97, has proposed a [illegible] of energetic men for [illegible] lodge, who will prove a [illegible] tion.

Mrs. Caroline Hartman, the mother of Brother Charles Hartman, died in New York after reaching a good old age. She was a devoted mother in Israel and, as an old resident of New York, was well known to a great many people by whom she was greatly loved and respected. Bro. Hartman received messages of condolences not only from many of his friends in District No. 1, but also from different parts of the country.

Bro. Myer L. Victorius, member of the General Committee, just returned from an extended trip in the west. Bro. Victorius is very enthusiastic about the B'nai B'rith work in the west, which, he says, is the most popular and most spoken of Jewish activity.

Bro. S. W. Goodman just completed his twenty-fifth year of service as secretary of Hebron Lodge No. 5. He was the recipient of a very handsome token in appreciation of his long and faithful services.

Bro. Dr. H. Ettelson, of Ararat Lodge No. 13, has enlisted as a Government Chaplain.

Bro. William Klapp, of Rehoboth Lodge No. 38, proposed a number of members in his lodge, who were initiated by a degree team from the district under the leadership of Bro. Clarence G. Bachrach. Bro. Klapp is determined to make Rehoboth Lodge one of the most active lodges in the metropolitan district.

Congressman Isaac Siegel, member of Henry Jones-Lebanon Lodge No. 79, will shortly address his lodge on his experiences in France.

Corporal Joseph Wolfe, of Worcester Lodge No. 600, died at Camp Devins and was buried in Worcester under the auspices of the lodge. Bro. Archibald M. Hillman and other brothers of the lodge took charge of the body, as the deceased had no relatives in the city, his only brother being with the Army in France.

Bro. B. Davis, who was superintendent for five years, resigned as a result of ill health and Mr. M. Rothschild has been appointed in his place. Mr. Rothschild is a man of considerable experience and it is expected that he will prove a very efficient superintendent. Mrs. M. Rothschild has been appointed matron. She, too, like her husband has had considerable experience in social work.

Brother Corporal Isidor Keller, of Manhattan-Washington Lodge No. 19, died at camp and was buried in New York City, October 10, 1918. A delegation of the lodge was present.

President Davidson and Secretary Dr. B. M. Kaplan rendered valued service to the War Relief and Welfare Committee in Hudson County by addressing audiences in the interest of the cause. Bro. Sam Lerner and Bro. M. Davidson, formerly of Portland, visited different congregations in Jersey City on the High Holidays in the interest of war relief.

The first regular meeting of Montefiore Lodge, No. 70, of Buffalo, N. Y., occurred on Oct. 2. Mr. Ernest C. Hartwell, Superintendent of Education of Buffalo, delivered an interesting address before a large and enthusiastic group of members.

DISTRICT NO. 2.

In honor of the B'nai B'rith Diamond Jubilee celebration, Cincinnati Lodge instituted a membership campaign on Sept. 21, 1918. The President of the Lodge appointed a Campaign Committee of sixty members, and to each of these members a select list of prospects was distributed for the purpose of personally interviewing them and to secure their membership.

The Committee held a number of meetings to receive reports of the campaign, and these meetings were addressed by prominent members of the Order.

As a result of the campaign a large number of candidates were secured.

A regular meeting of Toledo Lodge was held on Tuesday evening, Oct. 22, 1918. A "Smoker" was the main feature of the evening.

Gan Eden Lodge, No. 110, of Terre Haute, Ind., has a membership of 135, of which twenty-four are in the United States military and naval service. Considering the fact that this is an old Lodge and has a number of members above the age of fifty, it is remarkable that almost 18 per cent of its membership is enrolled in the United States service.

DISTRICT NO. 4

Etham Lodge No. 37, of Sacramento, Cal., held an interesting meeting on Sept. 10th, this being the first meeting of the lodge after the summer vacation. Letters were read from members of the lodge who are now in the service of our country.

B. F. Peixotto Lodge, No. 421, of Salt Lake City, and the local branch of the Jewish Welfare Board entertained twenty-five soldiers of Jewish faith from Fort Douglas on the recent big holidays. The soldiers were the guests of the most prominent families in the city.

At the first meeting of the season of B. F. Peixotto Lodge, Dr. Cornbluth, representative of the Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society, gave a talk on the activities of that organization.

Brother M. Marcus, president of the local branch of the Jewish Welfare Board of the United States Army and Navy, also addressed the meeting, explaining the work of the board and its plans for the future.

A large number of candidates were initiated at the meeting. Rabbi William Rice and Brother Daniel Alexander, members of the Intellectual Advancement Committee, delivered short talks of much interest. A number of Jewish boys in uniform were entertained. At the conclusion of the meeting a musical program was rendered and refreshments were served.

DISTRICT NO. 6

A special meeting of Louis D. Brandeis Lodge, No. 833, Regina, Can., was held on Sept. 11, 1918. Owing to the resignation of President S. Perlman, election was held, at which Brother M. F. Kovsky was unanimously elected President, and Brother H. Katz elected Vice-President.

A committee on by-laws submitted report, and the proposed by-laws was unanimously adopted and ordered printed and distributed among the members.

At a business meeting of Lake Cities Lodge, No. 696, of Fort William, Can., held on Sept. 1, 1918, a degree team was formed and candidates were initiated. Quite a lot of business was transacted. Satisfactory reports were made by various standing committees and the meeting proved most successful from all standpoints.

Members of Pisgah Lodge, No. 34, of Detroit, Mich., have succeeded in forming a B'nai B'rith Club at the recent meeting of the members, which was largely attended. Suitable quarters were rented, officers were elected, committees were appointed, members for the club were secured, and all arrangements were completed. Mr. Adolph Freund, the Past President of the District Grand Lodge, [illegible] the Club. His [illegible] the success of [illegible]

[illegible] NO. 7

Ascension Lodge, No. 543, of Donaldsonville, La., jointly with the congregation, dedicated a service flag of eleven stars at the Synagogue recently.

Corsicana Lodge, No. 275, of Corsicana, Texas, gave a luncheon at its last regular meeting, held on Sunday, Oct. 6, 1918. The attendance was large and an enjoyable time was had. Among the out-of-town visitors were Rabbi Faber and Mr. B. Wadel, of Tyler, Texas, who addressed the gathering.

B'NAI B'RITH OF SEATTLE

Rainier Lodge No. 627 held its first meeting of the season on Sept. 18, 1918. Being the first after the vacation, the meeting was most interesting.

The lodge resolved to hold only one meeting a month and appealed to the Grand Lodge to carry out this resolution. In support of same it was pointed out that on account of war conditions the holding of only one meeting a month would give the members and officers of the lodge more time to give attention to war and other patriotic duties.

COVENANT LODGE, DULUTH, MINN.

Covenant Lodge, No. 569, of Duluth, Minn., as a result of its campaign for membership, secured a large class of candidates and have arranged for a banquet and class initiation to be held on Oct. 20, 1918. The lodge has, however, been obliged to postpone this affair by order of the Safety Commission, who has ordered all public meetings closed so as to aid in the prevention of spreading the influenza epidemic.

ANTI-SEMITIC ATROCITIES IN UKRAINE

Petrograd—The Odessa Jewish Communal Council has sent a protest to the government against the astounding treatment of Jews at Okni (in the province of Podolia). Heavy fines are continually being imposed on Jews for trifling offenses. For instance, a Jew whose cattle strays into another man's field must pay 25,000 roubles. If he cannot find such a sum, he and his family are cruelly beaten. Generally Jews unable to pay the frequent fines are tortured. At Turtshitz several Jews are reported to have been burned alive during a pogrom.

COMMUNICATED

Editor B'nai B'rith News:

We desire to report to you the following case which was presented to our lodge for consideration and on which we immediately took action some few weeks ago.

One of the members of Pisgah Lodge, a naturalized Austrian, went to visit in Windsor, Ontario, which city is immediately across the river from the city of Detroit. On attempting to return to his home city he was stopped by the immigration authorities of the United States on the grounds that he was an alien. This brother immediately got in touch with our president, Brother Miller, who took the following action. A wire was sent to the office of the Honorable Simon Wolf and Congressman Doremus of this city, with a view of admitting this man to the country again, as he was in business in the city of Detroit, having two stores established, and is also a married man with children. After a period of four days, the acting committee received notice that the matter was being looked into very thoroughly in Washington and we could expect favorable action. The following day word was received that this brother would be admitted to the United States without any further question, due to the efforts of the Pisgah Lodge.

Yours,
B. B. L. & H.,
Sidney J. Newman,
Secretary.

BULGARIANS MISTREAT JEWS IN GREECE

Jewish and Mohammedan subjects in eastern Macedonia suffered terribly during the Bulgarian rule of that country, it has been proven by investigation. Most of the Jews in Seres were deported and many died from hunger. Mohammedans who were not molested during the stay of a Turkish regiment which garrisoned the town for five months, suffered worse treatment after its departure for Asia.

When the allies entered the towns they were met with enthusiastic demonstrations by the people. Jews here have subscribed to a fund for the relief of the people of Seres and the great rabbi at Saloniki went to Seres to survey the conditions there.

ITEMS OF INTEREST

In the recent primaries held in Chicago Judge Henry Horner, Judge of the Probate Court, and Judge Harry M. Fisher of the Municipal Court were renominated by a large majority.

Others nominated were Sidney Lyon for State Representative, George Mayer for Congress, A. J. Sabath, renomination for Congress. All the nominees are active members of B'nai B'rith.

Governor Whitman of New York recommended Major Michael Friedson for a colonelcy for his splendid achievements as Quartermaster General of New York State Guard.

Mr. Leonard Zeissler of Chicago has been appointed private Secretary to Chief Justice White of the United States Supreme Court.

RUSSIAN JEWISH EXILES CANNOT RETURN

Barred From Courland and Lithuania by German Decree

In an article condemning the Jewish policy of the German administration in the East, the "Volksstimme" of Chemnitz states that the decree prohibiting Jewish-Polish laborers from entering Germany applies also to Courland and Lithuania, and that under this decree the return is prohibited even of those Jews who were forcibly removed by the Russians at the time when the German armies were overrunning the former Russian Empire. The Volksstimme points out that the anti-Semitic attitude of the German authorities is having a bad effect which cannot be removed by ministerial promises.

B'NAI B'RITH CLUB HOUSE POPULAR

The Saturday evening affairs at the B'nai B'rith Club House, Tacoma, given by the Tacoma Branch of the Jewish Welfare Board grow more popular each week. Good cheer and spirit prevails at all times. A splendid orchestra provides the music for the dancing, and tasty refreshments are served by the ladies. A large crowd of men in service may be found at this building each week-end. Sleeping accommodations are provided for 105 men. Here each man is his own lord and master, arising as early or sleeping as late as he desires. This building has all the features of the modern club house, and all its facilities are provided for the sole use of men in the army and navy.

ECHOES OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE CELEBRATION OF THE I. O. B. B.

I. O. B. B. SEVENTY-FIVE YEARS OLD

The seventy-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith is being celebrated in Chicago. It was at first planned to have a large celebration—possibly nation-wide. But on account of the war, the leaders thought that this would be out of place. The celebration was held in connection with the fiftieth anniversary of the establishment of the Order in District No. 6.

The B'nai B'rith stands out now, as it always did, as the most representative Jewish order in the world. Its accomplishments cover many pages; its membership contains the names of the most illustrious of American Jews.

May the Order grow from strength to strength; may it ever stand out as it always has—for the charatcer, the safety and the democracy of Israel.—Jewish Monitor.

The Chicago Jewish community will this week be the host of the representatives sent on to the Diamond Jubilee of the I. O. B. B. and to the Golden celebration of the District in which Chicago is. The Order presents a record of achievement to be read in the institutions fostered and maintained, in the intellectual life of the members encouraged, and in the ennobling and humanizing influence of some of its undertakings. In the larger calls that of recent years have come frequently to the Jewish community the B'nai B'rith has responded nobly and has used the power of its organization for good. The work of the Anti-Defamation League, under the auspices of the B'nai B'rith, has been well worth while. Chicago Jewry is glad to welcome visitors so crowned with the crown of good deeds.—The Reform Advocate.

EMANUEL LODGE, MONTGOMERY, ALA.

Editor B'nai B'rith News:—Allow me to congratulate you on your last splendid issue of the News in commemoration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of our noble Order. Both its general appearance, as well as its valuable contents, are deserving of special merit and appreciation. Its historical items and all other information it contains are certainly of much value to every Lodge of the Order, and should be to every individual member.

(Signed) L. MEYER,
Secretary.

DR. G. DEUTSCH, CINCINNATI

The last number of the B'nai B'rith News is indeed highly creditable, and I note with satisfaction the illustrations, which, if adopted regularly, would add very much to the attractiveness of the paper; and more so, if they should illustrate current history.

DR. LEO M. FRANKLIN, DETROIT

I am in receipt of the splendid Anniversary Number of the B'nai B'rith News. I am also glad to learn that the celebration in Chicago was very inspiring.

DR. RUDOLPH I. COFFEE, CHICAGO

The Anniversary Number of the B'nai B'rith News has just come to hand and it is a most praiseworthy issue. I congratulate the Order on this very fine journalistic issue.

MR. I. J. ASCHHEIM, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Am in receipt of the Jubilee Number of the News, and congratulate you and the President on its composition. There is enough in that one issue to compensate a good enthusiastic B'nai B'rith for all the time he is devoting to the furtherance of the Order's interests.

MR. H. D. STRAUS, ROCHESTER, N. Y.

I take pleasure in saying that the last issue of the B'nai B'rith News is the best we ever received. I find therein good and interesting reading.

DR. BERNARD M. KAPLAN, NEW YORK

I congratulate you upon the splendid Diamond Jubilee Number of the B'nai B'rith News. There is quite a demand for that issue in New York.

ORGANIZE SECOND JEWISH BANK IN JAFFE

A second Jewish bank is being organized in Jaffe. That city, as it is well known, already has one bank, that being the Anglo-Palestine Company, a branch of the Jewish Colonial Bank in London.

plications that arose by the removal of a Jew from one place to another, often from one side of the street in a village to another, for it actually happened that a state line in 1812 ran through a village, making those living on the west side as citizens with equal rights and prohibiting their residence on the east side altogether.

The volunteers of 1813 had been promised by royal order first consideration in appointment to offices. There was no word said as to religion, and chancellor, Prince Hardenberg, had declared in a letter to the father of a Jewish soldier who had won a medal for bravery that no such distinction was intended, but when it came to a test, a candidate for office who possessed all the requirements and had served in the army with distinction was told that "temporary bravery" was not the only requirement for public office. The minister of finance went a step farther and proposed that municipal offices and the rights vested in landed estate holders should also be declared offices under the state, and the positions of surveyor and auctioneer, filled by appointment, though not salaried, were indeed declared inaccessible to Jews Jan. 31, 1820. A royal order of June 30, 1822, excluded Jews even from the rank of non-commissioned officers, though during the war several Jews had won commissions. One of them, Meno Burg, was a special favorite of Prince August, who proposed him for a captaincy. The King replied that inasmuch as Lieutenant Burg was such an excellent officer, he must surely have arrived at the conviction of the superiority of the Christian religion. Lieutenant Burg had not, and it took years before he received the rank due him. He died as major, remaining until the outbreak of the present war the only Jew who reached such a rank in the Prussian army. Municipal offices remained accessible to the Jews in spite of the above stated opposition, but newly created offices of autonomous corporations, as representation on the county board (Kreistag) and provincial council (Landtag) stipulated the exclusion of the Jews. These diets acknowledged this privilege by resolutions which declared the law of 1812 a hasty act (Uebereilung). Subsequent developments proved the contrary. The Austria of Metternich's time shall be left to a separate treatment.

the "other wide-viewed and great statesman", said in an interview with a representative of the "Aurore" of Constantinople: We "think" of giving complete equality to the Jews in the newly acquired territories, and we "may" also grant the petition of the Jews who served in the army; about the other Jews I can 'say nothing for the present". The joint committee of the British Jews approached Sir Edward Grey on Oct. 13, 1913, with regard to the rights of the Roumanian Jews according to the treaty of Berlin. The reply was that the British government would consult with other governments on the question how to secure to religious minorities the rights granted to them under the Berlin treaty. These rights M. Mishu, the Roumanian minister to London had in a note of March 17, 1913, declared to be absolutely safe, as far as the Jews in newly annexed territories were concerned. Subsequently, however, it was found necessary to demand proofs of these people that they had been Turkish citizens in 1878. It is impossible to foretell at this moment what kind of trick the Roumanian politicians of the future will discover in order to evade their new obligations. They have sufficiently proven their ingenuity to make it unnecessary for us to trouble about it. We hardly think, Mr. Marshall, who considered the step taken by our department of state on Aug. 5, 1913, instructing the ministers to Greece and Roumania to propose to the respective governments a guarantee of equality for all inhabitants as a victory, will be equally sanguine now. The government of Italy, of whose fairness to the Jews there cannot be the slightest doubt, was willing to accept in her commercial treaty with Roumania concluded March 20, 1907, a clause that the condition of "foreigners" shall not be touched by this treaty, and did raise no objections, when a law of April 1, 1908, subjected all "inhabitants of Roumania" to military service. The law was significantly dated, April 1. When it was a question of onerous duties, the Jews were "inhabitants"; when it was a question of rights, they were "foreigners"; and this by "very wide" views of these "great statesmen", Bratiano and Jonescu

Monthly Review of Events in the Jewish World

THE AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS. A profound Midrash (Gen. Rabba, Sec. 70) says: It is written (Hosea, 12-13): "Jacob fled into the field of Aram, and Israel served for a wife, and for a wife he kept sheep." Jacob is a symbol for Israel. He had to toil before he married and had to toil after he married. So you will suffer from oppression both before the redeemer shall be born and after he shall be born.

The Jewish Congress, held in Philadelphia, Dec. 15-18, 1918, was not only the most memorable event in the Jewish history of the year that has come to a close, but it marked an epoch in the history of Jewish organization. It assembled for the first time Jews who were representatives of all classes and opinions, from the old-fashioned leadership of men prominent by wealth, service to the community and social standing to representatives of humble wage earners, from strictly orthodox rabbis who might have formed a Beth Din under Elijah Wilna to aggressive free thinkers. It is marvelous that these people could agree on a platform not merely in defending the rights of Jews in lands of oppression, but also on Israel's future. Even the great optimist, Theodor Herzl, might have been skeptical had he been told that 21 years after he published his "Judenstaat," American bankers, judges and college professors would unreservedly indorse his plan of a "home for the Jewish people secured by international law." Even more has happened. This Congress indorsed the plan of group rights for the Jews in lands where this is necessary. This intricate problem shall be dealt with in connection with the countries for which it has been framed.

The unity of sentiment created by this Congress cannot better be demonstrated than by the resolution of the Po-ale Zion, the Zionistic socialists, held in the same city of Philadelphia, Dec. 25-31. This organization, which emphasizes socialism above Zionism, declared that it will remain within the Zionist organization until the Jewish home shall have become a reailty.

HOPES AND DIFFICULTIES IN PALESTINE. An unpleasant reminder at this moment is the text of a secret treaty concluded between Russia, France and Great Britain in 1916, and published about a year ago in the Manchester Guardian from the selection of secret documents made public through the Russian revolutionists. This treaty provided for an international protectorate over Palestine formed by these three powers "with a view to securing their religious interests." Something evidently has happened in the meantime that changed the views of the British government. Mr. Lloyd George found in these busy days time to confer with Dr. Chaim Weizman and Mr. Herbert Samuel on the Jewish aspirations with regard to Palestine, which he asked these gentlemen to submit in a new memoir. Nations struggling for recognition display a vivid sympathy with Jewish national rights. The Ukrainians and the Jugo Slavs are unanimous in their recognition of the Jewish nationality and in the indorsement of the Palestinian scheme. The former held a feast of fraternization in Lemberg which may have given the signal for the pogroms of which mention shall be made later. The birth of the redeemer has not immediately ended Jacob's toil. The Austrian Zionists who are most immediately affected by the strife of nations also indorsed the idea of a Jewish homeland and a Jewish nationality. Even the Anglo-Jewish Association, presided over by Claude G. Montefiore, the representative of what we might call Paulinian Judaism, "where there cannot be Greek and Jew, circumcision and uncircumcision, barbarian, Scythian, bondman, freeman" (Col. 3, 10), relented in its negative attitude, rescinding on Nov. 17 its former resolution to keep all discussion on Palestine from its deliberations.

While Judaism shows currents tending to a union, its enemies are strongly divided. Albert Monniot, Edward Drumont's successor as editor of "Libre Parole," expresses his sympathy with Zionism, while the Arabs see in it a grave menace. Dr. R. G. Hadad, the president of the Syrian National Committee in America, made public the wishes of his people, in a memoir handed to President Wilson. They demand a federation of states extending from the Taurus mountains to El Arish and from the Mediterranean to the desert, where Arabic shall be the official language and where "immigration shall be so regulated as to protect the interests of the native population and to avoid peril to the union of the Syrian nation and to the safety of its government." This means little chance for Ben Yehuda's dictionary and the Jewish cultural center in Palestine. The representatives of the English Jews, of the American Jewish Congress, of the Jewish National Council of Ukraine and of the Alliance Israelite will have a hard task at the peace conference in Versailles, unless the Zionist Commission, by this time perhaps already in Palestine, consisting of Dr. B. Flexner, Mrs. Fels, Mr. Louis J. Robinson, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise and Dr. Sehmariah Levin—the latter has still some difficulties in obtaining a passport—should be able to impress the Arabs of Palestine with the advantages to the country of the Jewish homeland.

PRE-MESSIANIC TASKS. If the redeemer was born with the Balfour declaration of Nov. 2, 1917, the Midrash is vindicated. The pogroms in Galicia, especially in Lemberg, surpassed even the Russian massacres of 1905 in atrocity, if only half of what was reported is true, and have no parallel even in the blood-stained annals of Polish Jewish history since the Cossack rebellion under Chmelnicki in 1648. We are willing to admit that the reports may be exaggerated as to the number of victims. One report spoke of 1,100 killed, another raised the number to 3,000. Such round figures are usually not exact. It is, however, different when one report speaks of 956 victims who were buried in the Jewish cemetery, and the "explanations" by Polish leaders, coupled with threats, demonstrate beyond doubt that if humanity should voice its sentiments as strongly as it did in the case of the Armenians, the proposed Polish republic would be placed on one level with Turkish despotism.

POPOLSKI IN PLAIN ENGLISH. From the conflicting and vague newspaper reports the following may be taken as the gist of the facts. Lemberg which is largely a Ruthenian city, situated in an almost entirely Ruthenian territory, was taken by the Poles on Nov. 22, who, now being liberated, cherish the same ambition of territorial aggrandizement of which they were the victims in the eighteenth century. The Jews were charged with neutrality in this conflict and with a treasonable act by having telegraphed to President Wilson for protection. Wherever they appeared on the street they were murdered. On the following day, a Saturday, the savagery reached greater proportions. Numerous Jews had sought refuge in a synagogue, but the mob attacked the building and set it on fire. The incendiaries rushed into the quarter mostly inhabited by Jews and continued their work of destruction, setting houses on fire and preventing at the point of bayonets the inhabitants from making their escape. Similar reports come from numerous other cities. The names are often misspelled in transmission, but some that can be identified show that murder and pillage was not confined to the territory disputed between Poles and Ruthenians, but occurred also in the western section of Galicia, as in Tarnow, where the population outside of the Jews, who form one-third of the total, is entirely Polish and Roman Catholic.

ATTITUDE OF THE AUTHORITIES. A committee of Jews, headed by Rabbi Thon, of Cracow, called on the military commander, Pilsudski, in Warsaw, who gave evasive answers. He was a military man and under orders of the government and would act according to these orders. To the Associated Press he spoke in the style of the Muscovite statesman of old, like Ignatiev and Pobiedonoszev, of the difficulties which the Jewish problem in Poland presented, and laid the blame for the massacres at the door of the Ruthenians, who had opened the jails and let the lawless element loose on the city. He is seconded to some extent by the representative of the assimilationist Jews, Noah Prilucki, who holds the Jews responsible for the event because they insist on the recognition of their specific nationality. Ignace Paderewski, the candidate for the presidency of the Polish republic, took his task easier and blamed the whole report on "distorted German propaganda." This propaganda may thank Pan Paderewski for paving its path, for when he entered the city of Posen an attack was made on the Jews, the synagogue was shelled on Sabbath and a number of worshipers killed. Details are still missing, but enough is known to justify for Jews the drawing of a balance in favor of German over Polish rule, for during the whole time of Prussian control of Posen, lasting nearly 150 years, pogroms occurred only once, and this was in 1848, when the Poles thought the time for their liberation had come and attacked the Jews. Another case in favor of the Jews is the situation in Warsaw. During the Russian domination no Jew could obtain employment in the railroad service. During the German occupation about 3,000 Jews were so employed, but almost all of them were promptly discharged when the Poles became masters of the situation.

The Polish leaders, who know quite well that such events are bound to prejudice public opinion against them at this moment, are trying to reduce the importance of the pogroms. Moraczewski, the minister of foreign affairs, said to the above named Jewish committee that the Jews have alarmed the foreign press to such an extent that people in foreign lands must think, "God knows what happened." It was really a small matter. Only a few thousand Jews were killed in a population of three to four millions. There are plenty more, as Pan Saleski, Polish minister to Switzerland, politely hints, pointing to disorders of a similar nature that occurred in the prospective Czecho-Slovak territory. The Polish Liquidation Committee, in a statement issued through the embassy in Vienna, makes the hint stronger. The fact of pogroms is flatly denied, but the statement adds: "If the Jewish press will continue to slander the Poles it will paralyze the power of the government over the masses." Translated from Popolski into plain English this means: If you Jews will not condone a few thousand pogrom victims, which are needed for the sake of humoring up the citizens of the future republic, we shall do worse still.

VIEWS OF OUTSIDERS. The London "Times," which for years has been decidedly antisemitic, minimizes the events, claiming that there were some attacks on the Jews because they are supporters of Austria and sympathizers with the Bolsheviki, and in addition they are "a percentage far higher than any people can digest." This is just exactly the argument that the Turks used when they massacred Armenians and Greeks. The Bolsheviki argument comes particularly handy. It was made not so long ago by Rev. George Symonds in an address before the Metthodist College in Berea, Ohio, in which the preacher of the gospel of non-resistance to evil harangued the students to use their fists against any one of these Bolsheviki who might try to enter Berea. The Westminster Gazette offers profiteering by the Jews as an excuse, and so it goes all along the line among those who are considerably disconcerted over the poor diplomacy of these Poles, who did not wait with the pogroms until Poland should have become an independent state in whose internal affairs no outsider can mix. Count Harry Keller, previously German ambassador to Poland, gives the key to the situation. The Poles, he says, always hated the Jews, even when the latter were submissive, yielding to all the arbitrary treatment of their brutal masters. Now the Jews have become self-conscious, they insist on liberty, and this makes them even dangerous. The best instance is furnished, the count says, by the new constitution which the German government introduced for the Jewish congregation in Warsaw. It did not suit the Poles, for it was demoncratic and took the power out of the hands of the assimilated plutocrats, who were the servants of the Poles. So the Polish government insisted on amendments which would paralyze the real object of the law, among which was a provision—incredible but true—that converts to Christianity should retain their right to vote in the Jewish "Gmina." This created such indignation that the communal leaders found it wiser to resign and to leave the control of the congregation in the hands of the self-assertive Zionist and nationalist elements.

The agitation has been transferred to this country. The Poles of Boston and environment began an antisemitic propaganda. Casimer Gonski of Milwaukee publishes in the Wisconsin News of Dec. 9, 1918, the usual trash of the kindness of the Poles in centuries of oppression and warns the Jews against demanding privileges—probably the privilege of safety for life and property. A Polish priest in Long Island preached to his congregation a boycott of the Jews, but warned them to keep this secret as well as the Jews know to keep the secret where they obtain the blood for their Passover ritual.

THE ARMENIANS ON THE EAST AND THE SYRIANS ON THE WEST. A brief dispatch, dated Budapest, December 28, announced that Premier Bratiano had made an official statement to the effect that full equality of rights was granted to the Jews. Let us hope that the report is authentic and—which is of greater importance—that the son will not repeat the trick of his father and nullify in practice what he proclaimed in theory. The story is indeed surprising after we had heard only a week previous that the French and British governments had given to Rumania the friendly "advice" to stop the antisemitic agitation which, under the leadership of professors and officials, had propagated the program that no international conference can compel them to deal with the Jews as they saw fit. Such agitations are usually staged by the governments to present the excuse that a constitutional government is bound to carry out the will of the people. An order prohibiting the use of Yiddish in Besarabia and a typically Rumanian trial of three soldiers who had killed and robbed Russian Jewish refugees and were freed on the ground that the victims had come to Rumania to spend their money for a Jewish propaganda are no encouraging signs.

The chaos in what was once Austria is also ill-foreboding. In Vienna anti-semites called a mass meeting to protest against the fact that the Jews are monopolizing the power of the government. The late president of the congregation, Dr. Alfred Stern, wrote shortly before his death that, in view of the antisemitic agitation in spite of the sacrifices brought by the Jews, Jewish nationalism was the only possible policy. Jewish soldiers formed an organization for self-protection and patroled the city. Similar organizations were formed in Prague, Theresienstadt, Bruenn and Olmuetz, due probably to the contention between the German and the Slavic parties, who are very likely inclined, like the Poles and Ruthenians, to blame the Jews when their designs to control the cities do not succeed. In various cities, notably in Vienna, Prague and Budapest, motions were introduced into the city councils to expel the Galician Jews, who are under the present political situation aliens outside of their province and enemies at home. In Hungary the agitation assumed a directly brutal character. The synagogues were raided during the services to find Galician Jews whose presence might have escaped the knowledge of the police.

In Russia affairs present an insoluble entanglement. Paul Miliukoff, who under the czar's regime was a devoted advocate of the Jewish cause, appeared in Paris on a mission which evidently was unwelcome to the government, and he was ordered to leave. Before leaving he spoke of the Jews in the bitterest tones as undivided supporters of the Bolshevist movement. The same Miliukoff was on May 25, 1914, excluded from the Duma for pleading the cause of Beilis against the intrigues engineered by the then minister of justice, Sheglovitov. In Finland, which was for centuries the victim of Russian despotism, the Jews are discriminated against and excluded from engaging in certain manufactures on the claim that they are profiteers. The Zionists of Hungary organized an army of 10,000 men to defend themselves against mob rule, and late reports from various Hungarian cities, notably from Presburg, prove that the measure was justified. Details are missing, but the names of the places where the riots occurred give a key to the situation. Presburg is a German city in a Slovack country under Magyar domination; Galgocz (Freystadtl) and Neutra are Slovack, Sopron (Oedenburg) is partly Magyar, partly German. Attacks on the Jews occurred in this section of the country, always in days of political trouble. A Slovack army, fighting for independence during the revolution of 1848, attacked the Jewish quarter of Presburg on the seventh day of Passover, April 24, 1848. Serious disorders occurred in connection with the excitement created by the ritual murder trial of Tisza Eszlar, Sept. 28, 1882, and Aug. 4, 1883. The Jewish community suffered serious losses by a fire which laid the old ghetto in ruins, May 17, 1913. The famous Yeshibah, which hard at the gates of Vienna maintains undiluted medievalism, is not likely to survive the inroads made by all these disasters. Conditions in Germany can hardly be ideal. The Junker element distributed handbills in large numbers inciting against the Jews as monopolizing the government and as responsible for Germany's defeat, which was planned by the Jews Sonnino and Roosevelt. Even Maximilian Harden, nee Witkowski, while condemning antisemitism, finds that there are too many Jews in the government. He, like the London Times, which German antisemites declare to be the organ of the Jew, Northcliffe, originally Stern of Frankfort, believes that a nation cannot digest more than a limited percentage of Jews.

PERSONAL NOTES. The only Jew definitely known to be a member of the peace conference is Paul Hymans, Belgian minister to England and at one time special envoy to the United States. He is professor in the law department of the University of Brussels, member of the Belgian parliament, as was his father before him. Besides him Lord Reading from England, Lucien Klotz from France, Bernstein and Max Warburg from Germany are mentioned in press dispatches, none of which has at the time of this writing been officially confirmed. The Czechs sent a Jew, Dr. Borsky, as minister to Rome and appointed Joseph Stransky as minister of commerce, and Leo Winter as minister of the interior. None of these names have been known before, which is not to be wondered at, considering the mail interruption lasting for nearly three years. The republic of Lithuania has not only a special minister for Jewish affairs, but also a Jewish minister of commerce—how could it be otherwise?—and another Jew as assistant secretary of state.

The elections to the British parliament are at the time of this writing not known in all detail. There were twenty Jewish candidates, of whom at least eleven were returned, mostly re-elected, as Lionel de Rothschild, Sir Philip Magnus, Sir Philip Sassoon and Edwin Montague, while Herbert S. Samuel, the first Jew who entered the British cabinet, was defeated. It is announced, however, that the party will make room for him by persuading a member who holds a safe seat to resign.

We have to chronicle two losses to communal life. Sir George Faudel Phillips resigned from the presidency of the Board of the London Jewish Hospital and Orphan Asylum. Sir George was Lord Mayor in the jubilee year of Queen Victoria, and the son of a Jewish Lord Mayor—we may add the grandson of a Polish immigrant tailor. This record of achievement will be lost to the Jewish people. His children have joined the church, as has the family of his brother-in-law, the late Lord Burnham, originally Edward Levy, who made it easier for them by going over to the church himself.

Vienna lost its president, Dr. Alfred Stern, who died at the age of 87. He was a native of Vienna, which is a matter of record owing to the short history of the present Vienna congregation, which grew out of a mere handful of about 2,000 "tolerated" Jews in 1848 to 175,000 in 1910. Originally a representative of the Vienna Bourgeois ideal, the antisemitic movement which forced him out of the city hall, made by and by a declared Zionist of him, and shortly before his death he resigned, leaving the administration of the congregation in the hands of the Zionists, who have now the satisfaction that the new chief rabbi, H. P. Chajes, declared himself a Zionist when he was received in audience by the ex-Emperor Charles.

The convention of rabbis and preachers, which met in New York Dec. 24-25, and resolved to join the Orthodox Rabbinical Union, is not fully intelligible to outsiders. We do not know why the members did not do so from the outset. It is interesting to observe its modernism in the educational program, which demands Hebrew as language of instruction, a uniform curriculum for Talmud Torahs and similar innovations which only a few years ago were denounced reform. Eppur si muove. The annual Farmers' Convention, held Dec. 7-9, was highly gratifying by its program of self-help, motivated by a denunciation of The Baron de Hirsch Fund. Right or wrong, it is self-help which ultimately must succeed, as we have learned from the many subsidized attempts at colonization.

It deserves exceptional mention that with all the heavy demands made on Jews as Jews, Mr. Julius Rosenwald was among the first to subscribe $50,000 to the Young Memorial, planned in honor of the former superintendent of Chicago schools, Ella Flagg Young.

American readers will be glad to learn that Prof. Boris Schatz, the sculptor, has returned to Jerusalem from the place of internment where the Turkish government had exiled him, and will be able, unhampered by a corrupt and unsympathetic administration, to develop his Arts and Crafts School, Bezalel. Even determined anti-Zionists will in this case agree with A. A. Berle in his recently published book, "The World Significance of a Jewish State," dedicated to Louis D. Brandeis, "exemplar and leader of the liberating influence of the Jew in American life," that a Jewish art, developed through the inspiring influence of a historic soil and with the enthusiastic aspiration of laying plans for a future, will be an asset in the world's civilization.

We may proudly close with a reference to one of Israel's contributions to mankind's moral possessions. The Dutch premier, Beerenbruck, stated in the chamber that the former German emperor was entitled to the right of sanctuary in Holland. Israel's immortal law giver proclaimed this right of protection of guilty and innocent alike against passion and mob rule.

COMMUNICATED.

Kansas City, Mo., Nov. 30, 1918.

Dear Editor:

I want to congratulate you on the Jubilee Anniversary number that I received for October, especially the "Preamble" that's printed on back page. It shows what the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith stands for and what the B'nai B'rith has taken upon itself to do. I had it framed and hung up in my office. I think every good Jew should have this "motto" in front of him and practice it every day in his life. Again I congratulate you and thank you for the number.

I remain, Sincerely yours,

TOBY BRENNER.

WHAT THE HEBREW UNIVERSITY WILL MEAN TO THE JEWS AND TO THE WORLD.

The following study of the significance of the Hebrew University at Jerusalem has appeared in the London Times and in the Philadelphia Public Ledger, and is written by the Jerusalem correspondent of both of these publications:

The festivities in connection with the laying of the foundation stone of the Hebrew University on Mount Scopus are over, and as the days pass one cannot help wondering at the mysterious force inherent in such symbolic acts. Everybody feels that Dr. Weizmann, the president of the English Zionist Federation, was right when he said on that day, "The Hebrew University is no more a dream, it has became a reality." For the only real reality is perhaps human will, and, therefore, solemn rituals proclaiming the public consecration and recognition of such will are, in the long run, more decisive, certainly more stable, than buildings.

This solemn ceremony on Mount Scopus was the triumph of one steady, consistent and, alas, sorely tried will. The idea of a Jewish university has a rather long story. Some twenty years ago a group of young Zionists began propaganda in favor of the foundation of a special university for Jews. At that time it was premature to think of Jerusalem, so they meant a university anywhere—somewhere in free Europe.

Such an institution was an obvious necessity in those days when thousands of young Jews of both sexes in Russia found the gates of the local faculties shut in their faces, and were compelled to go to Germany, Austria or Switzerland for their studies. There they had to live in surroundings foreign to their own mentality and habits, and, therefore, not seldom unfriendly—unfriendly sometimes to the extent of actual boycottage.

Besides, half of them, if not the majority, had to face permanent starvation. But what especially aggrieved the initiators of the movement was the dispersion of young Jewish intellectual forces, which if collected together and submitted to uniform educational influences, could be turned into a great redeeming factor in Jewish life. A Jewish university was so obviously indispensable that it met with the fate of all true solutions of social problems—it was ridiculed; rejected and forgotten—forgotten by all except the initiators, or, more exactly, the principal initiator, Dr. Chaim Weizmann.

The Jewish Intelligentsia.

The effects of a Hebrew university will reach far beyond its educational purposes. In the first place, it will be a powerful weapon in inner Jewish politics throughout the world. Being by its very nature above party strife, it will unite all forces and attract co-operation of such groups and personalities as would perhaps shrink from open collaboration with other forms of the Jewish national renaissance.

Further, although conditions in Russia have changed, still hundreds, if not thousands, of Russian Jews, and a good many of other countries—just the most responsive elements from a Jewish national point of view—will probably prefer the Jerusalem Academy to their local ones, and in this way the dream of gathering the dispersed intellectual forces under one spiritual leadership will be realized. In Palestine itself the university will definitely secure the moral position of the Jews as a civilizing element, thus helping to counterbalance their numerical inferiority.

But one of the most interesting and at present least realized features of the Hebrew University will be its direct colonizing effect. The experience of the Jaffa College showed that the higher schools possess a strong colonizing magnetism. It attracted to Palestine a considerable number of middle-class families, who could not come before owing to lack of adequate education for their children. The Jews are mostly town folk with rather high educational requirements, and are generally accustomed to a rather high cultural atmosphere.

One of the most complicated problems of the Zionists has always been that of attracting into Palestine sufficient numbers of the intelligentsia to supply teachers, doctors, lawyers, engineers, officials, or simply social workers. Besides their immediate value, these elements possess relatively high standards of life, and increase the demand on local labor. But the intelligentsia only goes where there are at least the beginnings of an adequate milieu. This will be supplied by the university.

And knowing the Jewish keenness for higher education, it can be said without fear of exaggeration that within ten years of the first lecture delivered on Mount Scopus, the university settlement alone will present a flourishing little town of many thousands of inhabitants.

A great impression was made by the telegrams of congratulation received from the British and French Governments. The fine wording of the first was highly appreciated, and cheered with that inner warmth which comes naturally where one feels the breath of real inner friendship rejoicing in one's joy. The French cable also caused a sensation of pleasure and satisfaction.

"The City of the Book."

In connection with the university, another project is being eagerly discussed in Palestine and abroad, and will probably materialize soon after the war. It is a scheme of "The City of the Book," adjacent to the site reserved for the university settlement. The idea is to concentrate there gradually the Hebrew book printing industry so as to supply the whole of the Diaspora from Jerusalem with Jewish literature, sacred and profane.

Before the war the number of Talmudic, Rabbinic and prayerbooks sold in different countries amounted to millions yearly. Warsaw and Vilna were the principal centers of publication, but the war seems to have destroyed them, and Jerusalem could gather and utilize what remains of the skilled labor. Adding the "profane," and especially educational Hebrew literature, of which the demand is increasing daily throughout the world, a flourishing industry could be created, giving sustenance to many thousands of families, and strengthening the position of Jerusalem as a leading force in all branches of the Jewish revival all the world over.

THE ANTI-JEWISH EXCESSES IN HUNGARY

The following particulars of the pogroms in Hungary have been received. At Korosmezo, the rioters killed a Jew, Rosenthal, and his wife. The peasants, organized as a citizens' guard, participated in the plundering and in the murders. At Alsokalinfala, two Jews were shot. The rest of the Jewish inhabitants fled from the village and abandoned all property. At Pressburg, the Jewish quarter was destroyed. At Kishkumperlet-haza, fourteen Jews were killed. In Domboq Szeleslonka, the authorities ordered all Jews to leave the townlets within twenty-four hours. Offenders were threatened with death. All the Jewish residents (numbering a few hundred families) fled from there and left behind all they posessed.

At Marmaros, armed bands entered the synagogue and killed three Jews. The Zionist Organization of Marmaros-Sziget hastily organized a self-defense company to protect the lives of the local community, which consists of ten thousand Jews.

At Stonfa, all Jews were ordered to leave the place. When our co-religionists entered the trains all their property was plundered in the townlet. Afterwards the expulsion order was cancelled and the Jews were allowed to leave the railway carriages.

At Nagy Bombat, the material losses suffered by the Jews during the pogrom amounted to ten million crowns. At Sopran, the Jewish Lieutenant, Dr. Pongracz, was killed. The value of the damage done during the riot amounts to some millions of crowns.

News of pogroms, during which goods were plundered and many Jews were killed, also arrived from Kapuvar, Czorna, Galgacz, Vocksh, Kishikeresh, Nagi Cota, Szambek, Barsha, Epenez, Kishkunhalash, Izasseczul, Felsoszelistye and from the districts of Hermanstadt, Bihar, Neutra, Paszto, Gomer, Szabadka Galszecs, Banat, Komaron, and Weissenburg.—(Jewish Chronicle, London.)

THE JEWS AS FIGHTERS

(From the Providence Journal.)

Commendable! The Jew of the ancient world was a fighting man. His early kings were all great soldiers. No people ever fought with more fanatical devotion than did the Jews in the centuries of persecution immediately preceding the Christian era. Throughout the Christian centuries the Jew has been a man without a country and until modern days a universal object of persecution. With no land to fight for he naturally lost his martial qualities. The great struggle which has been going on, a struggle to make all the world a safe place to live in, has given the Jew his opportunity. American Jews have a brilliant record to their credit and have supplied a larger percentage of soldiers than is proportionate with their population. Jewish women, too, in the work of the Red Cross, the food administration and the Liberty Loan campaigns have done their full share of patriotic service.

Sketches of Modern Jewish History

By Gottbard Deutsch

XIV

From the July Revolution to the February Revolution (1830-1848)

For many months were the diplomats of Europe assembled in Vienna, and between balls and grand operas they patched up the map of Europe, raised dukes to grandukes, grandukes to kings, decided on indemnities, on titles and etiquettes for retired sovereigns, issued pompous manifestos, and probably believed by and by that they had done a lasting job by embalming decayed principles and feeding them to people as helpless as soldiers who are fed on embalmed beef. Who would refuse the putrid mess would be courtmartialed, and this would make it sound.

The end of this illusion came soon enough. On the 28th of February a revolution broke out in Paris. King Charles X, the legitimate king of France, recognized as such by European diplomacy, had to leave France and vacate the throne for the benefit of his distant cousin, Louis Philippe, who, born as the son of a guillotined father, seemed to combine democracy with royal blood, just the proper kind of mixture needed for a compromise between radicals and reactionaries. It was a concession which could satisfy neither side, but the saddest experience of all this was the fact that European diplomacy not only had made a bad job of its work of reconstruction, but that a legitimate cousin of a legitimate king had accepted the throne out of the hands of rebels.

All of Europe, especially Germany, Austria and Italy, showed conditions which were just as artificially patched up as the throne of the Bourbons. Would they last? This was the question which filled many a "legitimate" heart, the owners of jewelry, dispensed by these generous hearts and the holders of jobs, distributed in accordance with its vibrations. The answers to this question were undoubtedly manifold, but one thing was fairly certain. It was safer to shorten sail before the storm should break. Some concessions to the demands for a more democratic form of government had to be made, and in the list of the relics of medievalism that needed trimming, the condition of the Jews occupied a place of considerable importance. Two countries, Austria, which had made no concession to the spirit of modernism in the treatment of the Jews, and France, which had first held the beacon light to the nations by taking that daring leap from almost unmitigated medievalism into unrestricted modernism, shall occupy our attention first. Another country, new as a state and new as a place of Jewish settlement which fortunately did not have to revise medieval legislation, the United States of America, begins to play an ever growing part in Jewish history. This is the typical significance of the twilight era between the two revolutions.

France had, on Sept. 27, 1791, declared that the Jews should enjoy full civic equality with all other citizens. This principle remained intact during the reactionary Bourbon government from 1815 to 1830. Whatever the reason for this remarkable fact may have been, it remains a fact. Yet the new government created by Louis Philippe found it expedient to show its favorable attitude to the Jews. It went a step beyond Napoleon's recognition of the Jewish church in giving them a consistorial organization (1808) and introduced a bill into the chamber proposing that Jewish ministers be salaried by the state just as was done with the Catholic priests and the Protestant clergy. Count Portalis, in pleading for the passage of this bill, Jan. 29, 1831, spoke of the great progress which the Jews had made since their emancipation and of the favorable impression which he had received as imperial commissary from the Sanhedrin of 1807. The bill became a law Feb. 8, 1831, and remained in force until the separation of state and church was decreed in 1905. An amendment to Napoleon's law of 1808, by which the consistories were created, was passed May 25, 1844, and gave a better organization to the communal institutions, although, different from German states where the state would not recognize Judaism as a church, membership in the Jewish congregation was not compulsory.

There is, however, a difference between the declaration of a theory and its application in the practice of the government authorities, and a still greater difference between such a theory and its unquestioned acceptance by public opinion. For both facts the history of the French Jews during this period furnishes us many examples. While the constitution of 1791 placed the Jews on a footing of full equality with non Jews, the courts would occasionally enforce the special Jewish oath. This subject is so important and will occupy us so often that an explanation is in place. Medieval legislation considered the Jew an alien entitled to his own laws in court. There was originally nothing invidious in this theory, and it occasionally was a benefit to the Jew. While the Germanic laws required as evidence in court an ordeal by a fight or by touching hot iron or putting the arm in a cauldron of boiling water, the Jew, whose law did not know of such barbarity, merely swore upon the Torah. In the course of medieval development when hostility to the Jews grew, this oath was so altered as to reflect on the Jew's honesty or to humiliate him. Some French courts held that the constitution had not abolished this oath, inasmuch as this legislation had not been directly abrogated. As often is the case, Jews were so shortsighted as to work against their own interest for reasons of personal spite. In a lawsuit between two Jewish parties the plaintiff demanded that the defendant swear the oath in the synagog in the presence of the rabbi who had to admonish the affiant that perjury was a sin even when committed in a non-Jewish court, that Kol Nidre does not annul an oath and the like. Rabbi Lazare Isidor of Pfalzburg, in whose jurisdiction the case occurred, not only refused to assist at the ceremony, but would not allow the synagog to be opened for this purpose, Dec. 31, 1839. He was charged with contempt of court, retained the services of Adolphe Cremieux (1796-1880), afterwards famous as a statesman and leader in Jewish communal affairs, and then already a celebrity of the French bar, who pleaded so successfully that the case was dismissed, and finally the Court of Cassation to which appeal was made rendered the opinion that the constitution had eo ipso abrogated this oath March 3, 1846.

It took almost as long before political equality was realized in the return of a Jew to the national parliament. The first Jew elected to the national legislature was Benoit Fould, returned from the district of St. Quentin in 1834, nearly half a century after the legal theory had been proclaimed. In England just the opposite took place. Baron Lionel de Rothschild was elected in 1847, eleven years before the law was passed which made it possible for him to exercise his privilege as member of the House of Commons. Benoit Fould was soon joined by his brother, Achille Fould (1800-1867), who was several times minister under Napoleon III, and had been the latter's financial backer. In 1840 Achille Fould pleaded eloquently for the recognition of the Jewish Sabbath during a debate on Sunday legislation, speaking of the "religion to which he had the honor to belong," but while nobody knew of his conversion to Christianity in an official way, he was buried by a Protestant minister. His family is completely estranged from Judaism. In 1842 three Jews were members of the Chambre, Achille Fould, Cremieux and Colonel Cerfberr. The parliament had to deal with some Jewish questions, especially in connection with the commercial treaty between France and Switzerland, which country, though a republic with a democratic constitution, discriminated against foreign Jews in the same way as Russia did until recent times. France protested, as did also the United States, against a discrimination, prejudicial to her own citizens on the ground of a difference of religion, but this protest raised in the Chambre in 1846 resulted merely in a weak reply by the minister that he would consider the question when the time for the renewal of the treaty would arrive.

The wide gap between theoretical law and practical sentiment became more strongly evident in 1848, when the revolution broke out. Mobs, irritated by the reactionary measures of the minister Guizot, who, though a Protestant, was accused of favoring the Jesuits in their designs on Italy, began to assemble in the streets of Paris, Feb. 23, 1848, and on the following day Louis Philippe abdicated his throne. Three days later riots broke out in Alsace. In Durmenach the Jewish mayor, Aaron Meyer, had to flee for his life, in Brumath and Maursmuenster (Marmoutier) the houses of the Jews were looted, and many inhabitants fled to Swiss territory, as they had done on a similar occasion after the storm on the Bastille in 1789. The excesses continued sporadically through the year, and Napoleon III government had to threaten strong reprisals in a circular of Dec. 27, 1848, in order to keep the mob in check. It is not known that the Jews were accused of anything in particular which might serve as reason for these mob attacks. It was merely the spirit of lawlessness, encouraged by a political upheaval that turned against the Jews as the weak, as has been regularly the case in the world's history. The people of Alsace had never acquiesced in the principle of the French revolution. In fact the French nation had not. When, in 1838, the Jew Rodriguez, a descendant of the fugitives of the Spanish Inquisition, who from the sixteenth century on had sought refuge in southern France, was elected mayor of St. Esprit, six aldermen resigned, and when, in 1849, Isidore Cahen, subsequently editor of "Archives Israelites" was appointed professor of philosophy at the Lycee Vendee, the bishop of Lucon placed the college chapel under interdict. Pope Pius IX indorsed his action, and the government was compelled to recall Cahen.

It is reported that when Guizot, the minister responsible for Louis Philippe's fall, met Prince Metternich, the once so powerful Austrian statesman, like himself an exile in London, he asked his Austrian colleague how a revolution could have occurred in the well-policed Austrian empire which had no free press and no semblance of a parliament. Metternich replied: J'ai quelquefois gouverne l'Europe, mais l'Autriche jamais." If the story is true, Metternich was overmodest, for if there was any overgoverned country on the face of the globe, it certainly was Austria. Different from various German states Austria had made no concession whatsoever to the spirit of the age in her treatment of the Jews. It is still a puzzle to me in spite of the excellent study of the subject by Max J. Kohler, recently published, why Metternich, who kept the Jews of Austria in the status of the eighteenth century, should have advocated in 1815 the retention of the liberty granted them under the French regime in the free cities of Germany. In Austria the practice of his administration went back to sixteenth century models. An imperial order of Dec. 12, 1832, reinforced a law, issued in 1568, which excluded the Jews from all mining operations and even from temporary sojourn in mining towns. They were supposed to be responsible for the scarcity of specie by exporting silver. Raphael Koenig, a locksmith in Mislitz, Moravia, who had under considerable difficulties obtained his certificate as master mechanic in Vienna, wanted to buy a house outside of the ghetto. He had to appeal directly to the emperor, who graciously granted this concession in 1835, with the proviso that the permit would be withdrawn in case Koenig should cease to work at his trade.

At the same time the government continued in its efforts to "civilize" the Jews. The Jews of Galicia who until recent times possessed a practical monopoly on keeping inns in villages were threatened in an order, dated March 24, 1841, that they would have to choose between this occupation and their "Jewish costume." As a special favor the poet Ludwig August Frankl (1810-1894) received the privilege to publish a weekly in 1842, a privilege otherwise denied to Jews. The government watched over the spiritual life of the Jews, prohibiting in 1838 the use of Hebrew prayerbooks printed in a foreign country, though this order may be due to the protectionist policy of Metternich. At any rate the importation of "dangerous" ideas from abroad was strictly watched, and the Scotch missionaries, Mc. Cheyne and Bonar, who visited Galicia in 1839, had to leave their books, including English Bibles, at the custom house before they crossed the Austrian border. One would really like to know what Metternich understood by a loose government.

The autonomous corporations—if we may apply this term to Austria before 1848—were, if possible, still less sympathetic to the Jews. Karlsbad possessed the privilege "de non tolerandis Judaeis." At the same time Jewish health seekers who spent their money in the city, were not unwelcome, and therefore a Jewish restaurant, a synagog and even a sanitarium could not entirely be excluded, but it had to be restricted to the season from April 1 to Oct. 31. The city council of Karlsbad declared these restrictions as "Europas weiseste und humanste Gesetzgebung." Vienna, which theoretically still excluded the Jews from residence, although about 2,000 souls were living there under special and "temporary" grants, bestowed in 1843 the honorary freedom of the city on Solomon von Rothschild in recognition of his great merit in having built the first railroad in Austria. He could not have held a clerical position in the city hall, but was an honorary citizen, a true picture of the contradictory status of Austrian Jewry. Anecdotes are often a valuable source of historic information, and therefore the following story which illustrates the precarious condition of the Jews might be recorded. Baron Solomon, the Austrian baron and honorary citizen of Vienna, would never lend his influence to a personal plea against the Jewish disabilities. His reply to all such demands was given in his Frankfort dialect: "My Degives (pull) I need all for myself." The measures of relief in Jewish disabilities were ludicrously petty. An imperial order of Oct. 1, 1846, abolished the most invidious features of the Jewish oath, which was indeed some progress, but the treatment of the composer Meyerbeer, who came to Vienna in 1847 to see one of his operas performed shows the pettiness of Metternich's government in its most typical application. The degrading "Leibzoll" had been abolished by Emperor Joseph II in 1782, but only in name. A Jew arriving in Vienna, had to report at the "Judenamt" and pay a fee for a permit of two weeks' sojourn. It was obviously impossible to enforce the law in the case of such an international celebrity, but law was law, and so a way out of the difficulty was found by declaring that Meyerbeer, as the possessor of the Prussian legion of honor, was a "cavalier" and therefore no Jew.

The "Judenamt" remained in force until an imperial order of March 10, 1848, changed it to a "Fremdenamt, No. 3." The number 3 was as typical as the whole business of petty bureaucracy. Three days later the revolution broke out. A young Jewish physician, Dr. Adolf Fischhof, inspired the assembled crowds by an address to demand a popular form of government. Metternich resigned. The semi-idiotic emperor Ferdinand proclaimed a constitution. Among the martyrs of the revolution was the Jewish student, Heinrich Spitzer. He was buried together with the others in a separate grave, the Jewish preacher Mannheimer, the Catholic priest Fuester and a Protestant minister officiating together. The provisional constitution, issued April 25, proclaimed religious liberty, the Reichstag, convened first in Vienna and afterwards in the little town of Kremsier, passed, on August 5, a resolution abolishing all restrictions on the Jews. Five Jews, the Vienna preacher, Isaac Noah Mannheimer, the rabbi of Cracow, Berish Meisels, the latter appearing in the Polish Jewish costume, the above named Adolph Fischhof, Dr. Joseph Goldmark, like Fischhof, a physician, afterwards a manufacturing chemist in New York, and father-in-law of Justice Brandeis and Professor Felix Adler, and a Galician merchant, Abraham Halpern, were members of the Reichstag, Fischhof was made assistant secretary of the interior, and the golden era of universal brotherhood seemed to have become a reality.

My native town boasted of a "freethinker," Yossef Loeb, a former Bachur of the Prague Yeshibah, whose wife was the first woman in our town to wear her hair uncovered. He said to my grandfather: "The Meshiach has arrived," but my grandfather did not think so. He proved to be right, and he found a supporter of his views in a man of an entirely different mental caliber. Heinrich Landesmann (1821-1902), a most remarkable man, better known by his pen name, Hieronymus Lorm, who achieved great fame as poet and philosophical writer, although from his boyhood he was completely deaf and in later years also blind, said in his novel "Gabriel Solmar": "Auf diese Sturm—und Drangperiode wird eine Thurm—und Strangperiode folgen." It was as he predicted. On the 31st of October, 1848, Vienna was taken by the imperial troops. Prince Windischgraetz, the commander, proclaimed martial law. Among the victims selected by the reaction was Hermann Jellinek, the brother of the famous preacher, who was executed, Nov. 23. Bauernfeld, the Austrian playwright, neither a Jew nor a radical, said: Jellinek, a radical journalist of little consequence, was selected because reaction needed a Jew to discredit

THE JEWS OF FRANCE

By Stephane Lauzanne

Editor-in-Chief of "Le Matin" and member of the French War Mission to the United States.

In sending this article, "The Jews of France" Mr. Lauzanne writes the following explanation:

"Since two years, practically since I left the army and the front, I have unceasingly tried to show how my people, all my people—Jews or Gentiles, aristocrats and peasants—had suffered and fought for the great common cause of justice and civilization and, being myself a Roman Catholic, I always felt that there would never be too much justice rendered to men who do not belong to my religion or my social 'milieu.'

"But there is something more. This war has been above all, a war for right and human dignity and independence. If there could still be a doubt about that, the fact that all the Jews of France, old or new, rich and poor, have fought with all their heart and strength is the best demonstration of it, because the Jews, in the past, have always struggled for those principles and have the most suffered of injustice, brutality and autocracy."

I hesitated a little after having written these four words, "The Jews of France." Why, when speaking of France should the Jews be mentioned in any particular way—the country which first realized the principles of equality and fraternity knows no distinctions of race or religion—and why, when speaking of the Jews, refer especially to those of France?

My hesitation however, did not last long: When speaking of France it is well to speak of her Jews, not only of the older Jewish citizens, but of the great number of them who have only become French in recent years. It is a matter of peculiar interest to see, how, in the turmoil of war, they have acted as to the manner born. When speaking of the Jews, it is well to speak of those of France because in France more than elsewhere, they were called upon to take part in the struggle, to endure and suffer and fight.

One incident sums up the attitude of the Jews of France in the war. That incident occurred on the very day war broke out. It has been related a great many times, but it is well worth repeating, for it is symbolical.

On July 31, 1914, when mobilization was decreed—the people responding loyally and enthusiastically—the "Universite Populaire Juive," in Paris, drew up an appeal addressed to every Jew who was then in the metropolis, to all those who came from Russia, Poland, Roumania, and who had not had time to become naturalized. The appeal requested them to enlist without delay under the tri-color flag, and to fight side by side with the French soldiers. It was written in both French and Yiddish, and was immediately posted in all the windows of the Jewish quarter in Paris. The following day an enormous crowd surged into the rooms of the "Universite Populaire Juive" each wishing to be inscribed without delay and to be given a card affirming his enlistment. An entire legion was formed in this way within a few days. Less than a month later, all these men were on the battlefield.

That they fought admirably no one could possibly deny. In the first place, the many Jewish names to be found in the long list of citation in the order of the Army bear witness to that fact. Another proof will be found by turning to an account of the Zouave regiments in the war; the citations are too numerous to mention, and the Zouaves have more Jews in their ranks than any other corps. Thirty to thirty-five per cent of the First, Second, Third Fourth and Eighth Zouaves, organized at Algiers, were Jews and these regiments were among those who played a decisive part in the Battle of the Marne.

In this world drama, more important than the man who performs some deed of valor on the battlefield, is the man who towers above the masses—writer, philosopher, thinker — whose words, actions and attitude are sources of strength and light and beauty. Of this type of man, there have been many among the Jews of France. There was that great Rabbi of Lyons, Abraham Bloch, who heard a Breton lad—a Catholic—ask for a crucifix as he lay wounded on the battlefield; he got one and brought it himself to the lips of the dying boy. He paid with his life for that admirable act of religious solidarity. Then there was the great Rabbi of Paris who each week attended the meetings of the National Relief Council, sitting at the council table side by side with the Cardinal Archbishop of Paris and Pastor Wagner recognized as the head of the Protestant churches of France. Who can ever tell the story of those meetings of the National Relief Council? The best means of alleviating misery and misfortune of every kind would be discussed, and "in no case"—I was told by Mr. Louis Barthou, who often presided —"was any attempt made to find out to what religious creed or to what political party such and such a group or such and such a family belonged. When a Catholic needed help, the most eager was the Rabbi of Paris. There was never at any time any discussion—and a vote was never even taken, every decision being invariably unanimously adopted."

Again, there is that writer who, more than any other, has contributed to sustain French morale by the steady, clear and patriotic articles he wrote for four years in the "Figaro": I refer to Joseph Reinach, also a Jew.

And there is that great philosopher who served France's cause abroad, traveling through the world, and speaking to every thinker, every philosopher, every mind where there still lingered some doubt: Henry Bergson, another Jew.

The Jews of France are prominently identified with the academic, scientific, artistic and commercial life of the country, the legal and medical professions, politics and journalism. They hold high commission in the Army; we find them as Cabinet Ministers and in the Government service and with all their heart and soul they are serving the cause of France and of civilization.

So in this war, the Jews of France, with unswerving devotion, courage and eloquence, have risen, both individually and collectively, to the heights, and during this world tragedy have performed deeds that have aroused universal admiration. They were the first to understand the importance of the drama in which was being decided the fate of the powers of liberty versus the powers of oppression.

I can hear some say: Then, after the war, anti-semitism will be a thing of the past in France?

This is my answer: To became a thing of the past, it would have had to be, at some time, a thing of the present. Anti-semitism has never existed in France as a deep seated or serious condition. It was only—like anti-clericalism—a political weapon. It gave rise to newspaper articles, to plays, to a few street demonstrations, but it has never been accompanied by legal or social ostracism or official persecution. Every profession, every office, every honor is open to Jews in France—just as is every hotel and every drawing room—including the "salons" of the old French aristocracy.

I can hear still other say: You forget the Dreyfus case.

No, I do not, and it is an absolute historical error to make of the Dreyfus case an episode of the struggle between Gentile and Jew. It cannot be denied that most of his co-religionists sided with the prisoner of Devil's Island, but it must not be forgotten that some of his most ardent defenders were noted Catholics: Labori, Duruy, Cornely. And among his most relentless opponents were two Jews: Mr. Arthur Meyer, editor of the "Gaulois," and Mr. Gaston Pollonnais, editor of the "Soir." At the two councils of war held in Rennes, two judges declared themselves in favor of the innocence of Dreyfus, and one of them was Lieutenant Colonel de Brion, who every morning before the trial, and every evening after it was over, would kneel for hours before the altar of the Virgin in an old church of Rennes.

Dreyfus was not sentenced by the first council of war because he happened to be a Jew, but because that council had almost received orders from the Minister of War to so sentence him. Dreyfus was not condemned by the second council of Rennes because he belonged to another race, but because that council, rightly or wrongly, deemed it proper to maintain the prestige of the heads of the army and not run counter to a decision of the first council.

The two forces confronting each other were not Catholic on one side, and Jews on the other, but rather Justice and the Army—the former placing above all other considerations the principle of justice, the latter refusing to admit that the heads of the army could be disavowed, or their authority weakened.

Does all this mean that the Jews of France form a perfect and model section of the community?

By no means, and the Catholic who is writing these lines and who has given them grudgingly the praise that is their due, has also the right to criticise them, without laying himself open to misunderstanding. The greatest fault of the Jews of France is that they have not remained Jews in the religious sense of the word. Many of them are to be seen in the salons of the Faubourg Saint Germain, very few in the synagogue of the Rue de la Victoire. . . . They are quite willing to proclaim their origin, but not their faith. In this connection no better portrait of the ideal Jew has been drawn than that given in a letter—one of the finest I have ever read—from a Jewish officer to Mr. Maurice Barres. He has done better than merely give us a picture of the Jew as he should be: he is that Jew:

"I would that we were better known, we Jews who are not ashamed of our race and who do not spend our fortunes in offering shooting parties to ruined noblemen. I fear that you only see two kinds of Jews:

"First the small aristocracy with enormous fortunes, and who are of little interest (characterized by its humility before the great names of Catholicism).

"Secondly, the Polish Jews who overrun our country and who in order to live, follow all employments (these latter only interesting because of the misfortunes which they have endured in Russia).

"But there are still the orthodox Jews, who are sincere, profoundly loving their country, not seeking to dazzle others by their fortune or their luxury of bad taste: in fact the good middle class. You are too prone to think that the Jews are a people apart having some peculiar mentality. Between a 'Nucingen' and a 'Gobseck' there is something else.

"At the front I have experienced some trying times, for during the first winter we had not yet accustomed ourselves to this war of 'moles,' and in the Vosges (col de Sainte-Marie), we suffered terribly from the cold. The only thing which counted for the men was physical suffering, but, as an officer, I passed painful days. The inaction weighed upon me. The solitude of our wooded mountains engenders melancholy, unhappy sentiments, and finally a general sense of lassitude. It was then that my faith came to my rescue and saved me morally. I remembered the prayer that I had been taught to say when a child before kissing my mother at night and which is very similar to your 'Our Father.' I prayed, and the Lord sustained me, gave me calm. Each time that I was forced to a decision I thought of Him and I was at rest.

"At the moment even of attack, duty imposes enough upon you, enough to do, so that one has little time except to receive orders and to carry them out as best one can. But before that! The half-hour preceding the advance or the offensive reconnoitering assumes a tragic grandeur. Every one, Catholic, Protestant, or Jew, pulls himself together and the real believers at this moment are easily recognized by a calm which cannot be fictitious.

"I write this in all sincerity. Each time that I saw I was facing death, I thought of Him, and my duty seemed natural and unworthy of any praise. When I lay buried, I thought that I was mortally wounded and my first thought was still of my God.

"The Jewish religion is not made for the masses, for it does not consist of small, external practices, but solely of the idea of God and of the survival of the soul. This explains why there are so few believers.

"It has happened to me, wishing to fortify myself, that I have gone into a church and knelt down, and I cannot feel that this was any sacrilege.

"I have now shown you simply the very state of my soul, knowing that I could rely upon your sympathy."

(Letter from Sub-Lieutenant L., December 29, 1916).

This letter is admirable because from beginning to end there breathes through it deep religious feeling, and all religious feeling makes for beauty and sentiment. It is like a great torch lighting up the dark corners of life and helping one to find the path. The kind of torch matters little: the important point is that it should burn.

The Jews of France, splendid Frenchmen, will be splendid Jews, if following the example of their co-religionists in America, they remain as true to the best traditions of their fatih, as they have been faithful in serving the land of their choice and the cause of humanity.—The Jewish "Forum."

THE POLISH-JEWISH PROBLEM

On Monday last the Times published a communication from its Warsaw correspondent, who dealt with the several problems with which Poland has now to deal. He said that, in the main, they were: first, the reconstruction problem; second, unemployment; third, the Jewish problem; and, fourth, the Bolshevist danger. He goes on to say:

Of these the Jewish problem has already attracted foreign attention, because of pogroms at Lemberg and elsewhere. One says "pogroms," but coming to details, I have made inquiries, and from Jewish sources here I am told that the pogrom accusation is leveled in two cases, really at Lemberg and Kielce. Pogrom sems a big word to use for Kielce, where, according to this same testimony, there was a riot and four persons were killed.

Lemberg is a more serious affair. As I have had occasion to say, several streets were burned out. The central synagogue was sacked, the scrolls of the Covenant torn from the Ark and pierced with bayonet thrusts, and other scenes of vandalism took place. Jews say they think there are 1,000 persons missing, but with regard to figures the only thing that can possibly be done is to await the report of the committee which has been sent to Lemberg to inquire into the happenings there. There is a mixed committee on which Jews sit. One does not need to be long in this country to learn that figures are used like missiles, and are to some extent produced to meet the needs of political offensives. Jews prejudice all their case, too, by maintaining that Poles do nothing to repress disorders and that no Polish shops were burned, an assertion that my own experience on the spot proves to be inexact.

However, Lemberg is but a symptom of the whole Jewish question overhanging the future of Poland. In Russian Poland 14 per cent of the population is Jewish, in Galicia 11 per cent, and in some of the chief cities the proportion soars enormously beyond this. The chance that Poland might become a self-governing state had never occurred to the majority of Jews, but now that it has happened there has begun among them an agitation which the Poles declare is compromising for the security of the new regime.

The Jewish Program

This Jewish movement finds expression in the program of the National Jewish Party. I have had an interview with Prilucki, a member of the Warsaw Municipal Council and leader of the party, who developed for me this program. He spoke in the name of 90 per cent of the Jews. He said to me:

We recognize the Polish State, but within the limits of that state we demand a certain autonomy. Jewish nationality must be recognized by the Polish Government. All Jews within the Polish borders must be enabled to form a union personelle, enjoying public and private rights. In the domain of public instruction and "social institutions" that union must be quite autonomous. It must be able to found schools at the expense of the Polish State, and the Polish State must renounce all right of entry or control over these schools. We pay our share of taxes to the state, and therefore have a right to demand that money shall be found for our schools out of our contributions.

We shall elect on a universal suffrage basis a Supreme Jewish National Council, which will have undivided control over schools and social institutions. A Minister of Jewish Affairs will be elected furthermore by us to arrange with the Polish Government for the execution of the orders of our Supreme National Council. Social institutions will embrace hospitals, a credit bank for artisans, and all analogous concerns dealing with our people's welfare.

The Jews, of course, in addition to voting for their council, will also ballot for the Polish Parliament, but their representatives will abstain from casting votes there on educational and social questions where their interests fall under the separate regime.

I asked Prilucki how instruction would be given. "Entirely in the Yiddish and Hebrew languages," he replied. "Polish history will be taught in Yiddish."

I asked if he aimed at producing Polish citizens from the schools. He pondered his answer, then said: "From a political point of view, Poles; from a national point of view, Jews."

In addition to the National Party is the Jewish Party, which wishes simply equal rights for Jews amid all other Polish citizens. This party is small in numbers, especially in the cities, but has responsible adherents. There are also Zionists, of whom the religious-minded wish to return to Palestine. Another group live in Poland as Zionistic citizens.

This, therefore, is one problem for the settling of which the arrival of General Haller's Army is to lay the first basis.—London Jewish Chronicle.

JEWISH CULTURE AND THE PRINTED HEBREW WORD

By Leon Zolotkoff.

Since time immemorial, "The Book" has accompanied the Jew in his wanderings, protecting him against complete submersion and dissolution as a people. The Jew, in turn, has invariably held "The Book" in supreme veneration and assigned to it the place of honor. To supply the demand for copies, there grew up and developed, long before the Christian era, a guild of scribes who produced parchment scrolls of the Pentateuch and Hagiographa, and copied the books of the Prophets, the Psalms, and the prayer books. The profession of the scribe, though paying poorly, was nevertheless highly honorable. There is on record the prayer of a Jewish sage who prayed that the scribes might never grow rich lest they abandon their sacred work.

When the printing press came into being, in the first decades of the fifteenth century, the Jews did not hesitate to utilize its services for the multiplying and spreading of The Book, the great variety of philosophical and religious works, and such other books as were necessary for synagogal services and for religious study. The printing press was adopted by the Jews as a sort of mechanical scribe "writing with many pens" simultaneously. The printing art assumed in their eyes the character of a sacred profession, a semi-religious function. In the preface to many an old volume mention is made of the printer or the typesetter engaged in the "holy work" and faithfully performing his duties.

Keeping Pace with the Advance of Hebrew Learning.

Any one desiring to examine the development and growth of the Hebrew press since the time of Gutenberg would only have to follow the zigzag path of Hebrew learning and Hebrew culture since the fifteenth century. He will find along the line of his research a record of nearly all the Hebrew presses that existed during this period. The history of the Hebrew press and that of Hebrew culture have always, since the invention of the press, complemented each other. Wherever there was a revival of Hebrew learning, poetry or philosophy, there a Hebrew press would soon be established; and conversely, wherever a Hebrew press was to be found, the traces of a growing Hebrew culture could easily be recognized.

For a few decades after the appearance of the printing press, the Jews in German lands were not permitted to engage in the printing art. In Italy, however, the condition of the Jew was much better. The spirit of Renaissance prevailing during the time of the Medicis had naturally affected the Jews. The cultural activities of Immanuel Rommi and Leone Romano in the preceding century exerted an influence upon the Jews in the days of the Medici. And in 1475, for the first time, the Hebrew press came to the assistance of the Hebrew revival in Italy. The first Hebrew book issued by the first Hebrew press was the Pentateuch, with Rashi's commentary by the printer, Abraham Garton, in Reggio, Calabria.

The activity of the Hebrew press kept pace with the growth of Hebrew culture in Italy. In the course of twenty-two years after the appearance of the first printed Hebrew book there appeared the literary, philosophical, exegetical, grammatical, ethical and religious masterworks, such as the Shulhan Aruch and Joreh Deah, the "Duties of the Heart" (Hobath Hal'baboth), by Rabbi Bachia, the works of Maimonides, Nachmanides, many detached books of the Bible and complete Bibles with commentaries, and a variety of prayer books. Besides these there also appeared many secular works in imitation of the literature of the Italian Renaissance.

Spain—Germany—Italy.

In Spain Jewish cultural development had reached its highest point during the decades preceding the expulsion of 1492, and again the fact is marked by the appearance of the Hebrew press—in 1482 in Spain and five years later in Portugal. With the expulsion the Jews spread over Europe, and eastward toward the near Orient. Twelve years later we find printing presses in Constantinople and Saloniki, where Gershon Soncino, "the wandering Jew of Hebrew typography," had come to aid the Jewish printers. Meanwhile conditions in Germany had not permitted the Jews to employ the art of printing. But in 1513 a press was established at Prague by Gershon ben Solomon Cohen, founder of the printing family known as the "Gersonides." Subsequently other presses arose in numerous German cities, among them Christian establishments producing Hebrew books for university use. In Paris, too, where there was a revival of interest at this time in the study of Hebrew, a press was established by the clergy, and Elias Levita, a Jewish grammarian, was invited to take charge of it.

From Italy the industry spread to Switzerland, and an excellent printing press was installed at Basle. After 1540 Venice became the center of the Jewish printing activity. Daniel Sifroni, a Jewish master-workman, left Italy and went to Switzerland about 1575. Under his influence, like that of Soncino in Italy, other presses sprang up in addition to that at Basle. The movement of Jews to Denmark resulted in 1598 in the establishment of a Hebrew press at Copenhagen. Besides Italy and Turkey, Poland offered a place of refuge for hunted and exiled Jewish wanderers, chiefly those from Germany. Accordingly, Hebrew presses began to make their appearance in the east, notably at Cracow and Lublin.

From the West to the East.

In Holland, a rich and cultured community had sprung up at Amsterdam, where the Marranos, men of wealth and independent position, devoted themselves to the material development of Hebrew literature. Under their guidance, the Amsterdam press grew into the finest press in Western Europe, and practically controlled the Jewish printing trade for almost a century. The work of the Amsterdam presses was of peculiar excellence, and was conducted under noted and learned auspices. When the restrictions in Germany were removed, numerous presses appeared at Frankfort, Salszbach, Dessau, Hamburg and Berlin. During the nineteenth century, with the Jewish emancipation in Western European lands, Hebrew learning as a group activity was largely abandoned, and Jewish presses gradually dwindled into insignificance.

But the Hebrew press in reproducing the Torah was apparently destined to share its fate. Of the words of the Torah it was said that when they are at the lowest ebb in one place they rise in new splendor in another. Extinguished in Western Europe, the Hebrew press awoke to great activity in Eastern Europe, where new centers of Hebrew learning required the services of the printers' press. The most pretentious Hebrew printing establishment grew up in Vilna and Grodno under a patent granted by the Polish King, Stanislaus August, to Baruch ben Joseph Romm. Many other large printing houses arose in Eastern Europe to compete with the house of Romm, but none attained its size or popularity. It existed in the family for over 180 years, until its destruction, like many other Jewish printing houses in Poland and Lithuania, by the ravages of the present war.

The Need and the Opportunity in Palestine.

It is evident to every one more or less familiar with the subject that the center of Hebrew cuture which is now developing in Palestine is likely, in the course of a generation or even a shorter period, to excel in extent as well as in intensity all other Hebrew cultural centers in the diaspora. The wonderful revival of the Hebrew tongue, which is now regaining the long lost support of political as well as academic factors; the Hebrew schools already in existence; the Hebrew university, the cornerstone of which has just been laid; the technological institute at Haifa, which under the changed conditions will undoubtedly be opened as a Hebrew institution; the expected increase in the Jewish population of Palestine—all these circumstances are most favorable to the rise of a powerful cultural center which will require a highly developed Hebrew press to satisfy its needs. For with the war at an end, the printed Hebrew words, next to their daily bread, will be the thing for which millions of our brethren will yearn. Educational and religious books and Hebrew literature of every description will be in greater demand than ever, both because of the nearly complete exhaustion of the supply, and because of the extraordinary revival of the Hebrew spirit. There has therefore arisen a crying need for a Hebrew printing and publishing center—a modern printing establishment efficiently equipped and capable of producing a reasonably large, if not an adequate, supply of Hebrew books to satisfy the demands of the Jewries of the world.

The logical location for such a printing and publishing center is in the spiritual center of the world-Jewry, Jerusalem. It should be provided with the most approved and up-to-date equipment; linotypes, presses and motor power of the best models; a modest but efficient photo-engraving and electrotyping plant; a small but well equipped modern book-bindery, and facilities for printing in Hebrew, Arabic, English, French, German and Russian. The aims of the establishment should be:

(a) To print, publish and supply religious and secular Hebrew books.

(b) To produce a superior quality of printing work for the government and public institutions, to publish Hebrew text-books for the schools, and also to do printing for commercial houses.

(c) To form a center for the printed word around which shall group themselves those who have a message for their people or for humanity and are in need of the printing art to convey their messages to the world.

The Practical and the Sentimental

A printing and publishing establishment, so equipped and set in operation, would supply work to a small army of printers, linotype operators, type-setters, pressmen, stereotypers, photo-engravers, bookbinders, booksellers, etc., and support them and their families, thus adding substantially to the economic resources of Palestine. A considerable number of Jewish craftsmen in the printing trade who have been thrown out of work because of the ruin of the printing establishments in Palestine and in Russia would find employment and would rehabilitate themselves as useful toilers in the land of their fathers.

The task of supplying religious books to the Jewries of the world would in itself form a vast industry. The imprint "Jerusalem" on Hebrew books, particularly of a religious or educational character, would offer a stronger appeal to the sentiment of the people than similar books printed elsewhere.

It is estimated that an investment of $200,000 would be required for the erection and equipment of the plant and setting it in remunerative operation. Judging by the number of the printing and publishing houses which Palestine supported before the war there should be no difficulty in supply even the most pretentious printing establishment with sufficient local business to make it pay. There were about seventy printing establishments in Palestine before the war. The war ruined them all—the establishments and their owners. Many of the latter are now in America; others are in Egypt and England. A few of them will be in a position to re-establish themselves as printers. But there is none to establish a well-equipped and efficient modern printing house. They had none before the war. When Palestine was in need of real artistic printing it had to import it from Egypt. Liberated from Turkish oppression and from that state of insecurity which is the result of arbitrary rule, Palestine, the homeland of the Jewish people, experiencing as she must and will a spiritual, cultural and economic revival, will be unable to do without the assistance of an efficient and well-equipped modern printing establishment. The publication of standardized books—religious and educational—will naturally require some time for preparation; almost from the start, however, there should be plenty of local business for the government, for the banks, for the schools, for private business houses, for publishers of newspapers, etc., to keep the plant in operation.

As long as the war lasted it was evident that there was no opportunity to do anything in Palestine for the promotion of the enterprise. Now that peace is actually here, the least that could and should be done is to prepare the plans and the means for their realization. No time should be lost in carrying out the project as soon as practicable.

The First Encouraging Steps.

In discussing the scheme with a number of public spirited Jews interested in the welfare of Palestine, the writer suggested that there be formed a Jerusalem Printing Works Association (Beth D'phus Jerusholayim), the form of the organization to be a trust syndicate along the lines of similar organizations existing in the United States and in Great Britain. By the terms of the trust agreement the shareholders should elect the trustees and authorize them to carry out the enterprise. There should be issued 4,000 shares of the par value of $50.00 each, the purchaser of a share paying $10.00 at the time of the purchase, $20.00 at the completion of the entire subscription, and the balance after the erection of the building in Jerusalem. The payments would thus cover a period of at least three years and would constitute no hardship on the least affluent subscriber.

The proposition met with so much encouragement that when a meeting of prospective shareholders was called at the Hotel La Salle, Chicago, on Sept. 8, $6,000 was then and there subscribed by about twenty people. And the subscribers with but one or two exceptions were not wealthy people at all. The most encouraging fact is that several of the subscribers are practical printers, and some of them had been engaged in the printing trade in Palestine before the war and intend to return to Palestine immedately after the war.

Thus the Jerusalem Printing Works Association (Beth D'phus Jerusholayim) has sprung almost automatically into existence, and there are reasons to believe that in the near future the trustees under expert guidance will be in a position to proceed with the establishment of the printing house in Jerusalem in accordance with competent plans and specifications and with the most approved models of modern printing establishments.

THE DINNERPAIL'S FRIEND.

A man who was tremendously interested in your cost of living and in your having enough food to eat died the other day in Rome. He was David Lubin, American Jew, world citizen, most noted international agricultural prophet and leader of all times.

Quite likely you never heard of David Lubin. At best your acquaintance with him and his life work may have been limited to reading his periodical reports of food crops in this country or that. You may have thought him a farmer or the farmer's friend and guide.

But he was more the city consumer's friend and guide.

David Lubin was a man with a great purpose. He struggled for the goal of well-fed bodies the world over, at prices reasonable, fair alike to consumer and producer. Fighting for this purpose compelled him into battle with the horde of toll takers who wantonly increase food prices and decrease food supplies for their own selfish profits. He was one of the first Americans to advocate the parcel post as a medium to promote direct dealing between producer and consumer.

Years ago David Lubin made a fortune in a Sacramento mercantile establishment. He quit working for himself and began working for hungry mouths, in India as well as the United States. It was his idea that the first requisite for the establishing of food production and distribution upon a proper basis was an accurate knowledge of world production and consumption. He suggested the formation of an international agricultural crop reporting institution, which met with lukewarm support in Washington. Abroad, the idea was better received. The ikng of Italy gave the institution a building and an annual income to cover expenses, and David Lubin went on to Rome as America's representative.

There the former California merchant placed his fingers on the pulse of the world's food. He made it his business to know how much food was being grown and how much was needed, and where. Everything he learned was given to the public, and no longer was it easy for food-hoarding speculators to spread false stories of foreign crop excesses to lower prices to American farmers and fake reports of crop failures to boost prices to consumers.

For the first time in history the world knew how much food it produced and where food supplies were stored. It was David Lubin who made this possible. He believed that, in time, his international institution would prevent overproduction or underproduction of any food product anywhere, and that, manifestly, would benefit the grower of food as well as the eater of it. David Lubin is dead, but the impetus he gave the movement promises to carry it on to Lubin's goal.—St. Paul Daily News.

JEWISH NATIONALISM

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

Written for B'nai B'rith News.

Just now the subject of Jewish nationalism is before the forum of public opinion; nay, by virtue of the action of the Jewish Congress which recently met it is bound to be brought to the attention of the statesmen gathered to settle the affairs of mankind. It may well be worth while to examine the subject at closer range. Let it be said that the subject is a novel one, at least in the form which concerns us now, that of national autonomy for the Jews in the dispersion. For at the outset it is fundamental to state that we must discriminate between that and Zionism, which is the securing of nationhood and the autonomy that goes with it for the Jews of Palestine. Non-Zionists and even anti-Zionists are willing to concede a measure of autonomy to the Jewish colonies in Palestine now in existence or destined to be created in a larger number. One may look upon the Palestinian problem from the philanthropic angle. One may look upon Palestine as a land to be opened to Jewish immigration, as another haven or center for wandering Jewry. But, I take it, every one would be satisfied to see conditions there develop so as to afford to the Jew and to Judaism safer and wider fields for operation and development, in other words, a greater measure of autonomy. What the anti-Zionist fights shy of is the political aspect. He does not want a Jewish state and he does not want a Jewish nation. What he fears is the impairment of the status of the Jew outside Palestine, which even the provisions of the British Declaration cannot to his mind entirely dispose of. Still he can understand Zionism, and only the most hide-bound doctrinaires will interpose obstacles in its way. Zionism is no longer a subject for debate. The future autonomous Jewish settlement of Palestine is a fact to be reckoned with.

What is meant by Jewish nationalism in the dispersion as distinct from Zionism is Jewish autonomy along national lines in the dispersion. Its author is no less a distinguished person than the well-known historian Dubnow. It may well be said that his spirit hovered over the Philadelphia gathering, even as his name was expressly mentioned and his authority invoked in committee. Dubnow, like so many of our anti-Zionists, believes in the permanency of the dispersion. And who for that matter does not? Surely the Zionist does not expect all Jewry to be settled in Palestine. It may and it may not happen that in the wake of the Palestinian settlement there will be an exodus to adjacent countries, to Mesopotamia perchance and to Egypt, thus transferring the center of Jewish gravity from the West back to the East. But as conditions are now, we have to reckon with the bulk of Jewry remaining in dispersion. The formula of equal rights upon individualistic lines, that is for every citizen as an individual, has not worked out quite well. It has meant a disintegration of Judaism. Ghetto conditions cannot be revived. The Jew lives in the world and the world, so to speak, puts a premium upon apostasy. The centrifugal forces are far too powerful for the individual to make a stand and successfully combat them. The attempt was made to consign Judaism to the synagogue. But the synagogue was admirably adapted as it was created for the dispersion so long as the atmosphere around it was of the ghetto. Jewish culture as it existed in the ghetto cannot be maintained by an insular institution like the synagogue. If, therefore, the Jew is to continue in the dispersion where he must abide, and if the old safeguards are inadequate, the formula of cultural or national autonomy must be accepted. Now "nationalism" as conceived by Dubnow for minorities like the Jewish is an unwonted concept to the Anglo-Saxon ear. The principle of nationality seems to us to be bound up with territory. Dubnow disclaims such imputations. He takes nationality in the cultural sense. A nationality is there where there is sameness of language, history, traditions. Consequently, in the concrete, the Jews in Poland for instance, would demand to be recognized as a nationality in all but territory. And for that matter they have lived in that territory for some centuries. What they want is to have their own internal administration and particularly their own schools supported by general taxation.

Ahad-haam long ago put himself on record against Dubnow. He likewise believes in the permanency of the dispersion. As is well known, he is a Zionist, but not of the political persuasion. He believes that Palestine should be given cultural autonomy, and he expects that from Zion will go forth a stimulus to keep the dispersed Jew a Jew. Ahad-haam, no less than Dubnow, sees in the synagogue a dying institution. That of course is a subject upon which it may be permitted to hold different views. But what is important in discussing the present subject is to bring out the salient points in the philosopher's contentions with the historian. National autonomy in the dispersion, if it is to accomplish what Dubnow expects of it, must be effective, complete. For the Jewish child to grow up a Jew, imbued with Jewish consciousness and Jewish ideals, there must be created a surrounding absolutely Jewish, which of course is an impossibility in the dispersion. The child cannot be shut in in the narrower world when the large world is within reach. After all it would mean a ghetto, and the ghetto, even when self-imposed, is powerless in the modern world. All that the nationalists after all are able to create is a certain measure of cultural isolation, and to the extent that it is limited it is bound to fail of its object. The problem of schooling is uppermost in all minds. The Jewish child to remain a Jew must be schooled along Jewish lines. A modicum of religious instruction has been a failure. Complete Jewish education is an impossibility in the dispersion. And we must doubt whether Ahad-haam's hope in the efficacy of the Jewish spirit to work at a distance, from Palestine to the diaspora, is at all to be thought of seriously.

Unless we are willing to consign the ten or twelve millions of our brethren who must remain in the dispersion to slow extinction, we must stop to consider other and more practicable means. Ahad-haam concedes that the instinct of self-preservation will make the Jew wary of any formula safeguarding his existence upon a certain condition, whether it be an incomplete system of national autonomy, or, we may continue, the problematic potency of the influence from Palestine. Unless, therefore, we are ready to surrender, and that the instinct of self-preservation forbids, we must after all accept for the dispersion the formula of religious autonomy. In Palestine, religion may be severed from the state; it will have to be severed from the state certainly when the Jews will form there a minority. There will be there so much of the Jewish atmosphere that it will be ample to keep the Jew a Jew and the Jewish child imbued with Jewish consciousness. In the diaspora I cannot see any other way for maintaining ourselves except as a religious organization. We shall have to enlarge the religious concept as it applies to Judaism. For Judaism has never been a mere religion. But all the other ingredients will have to be subsumed under religion. It will not mean that we shall exercise coercive measures. But it will mean that if one is not against us he is with us. We do not recognize Christians of the Jewish nationality. There will be Christians and Mohammedans in the Jewish state in Palestine. But in the dispersion the lines must be drawn as heretofore. We must sail here under the religious color which, however, must stand ready to be tinged with the cultural hue. It is the Jewish school that stands in the foreground of discussion. Well, the religious school of the diaspora need only be a modernized leader, nothing more and nothing less. Hebrew must be taught; the Scriptures and the post-biblical Jewish literature must be read in Hebrew. Religion and attachment to the sacred things of the nation (kodsh ha-ummah) will come through the study of Jewish literature. Those who like the writer went through the same schooling will remember that we learned Judaism not from a catechism. And yet we are all imbued with the Jewish spirit, full Jews to our last breath.

The synagogue is not dead, it may be dying, but it can be resurrected, if it be once more a synagogue, a house of gathering for the people, and not a church. And it matters little whether the church-synagogue is of the reform or of the orthodox kind. The institutional synagogue by all means, but it must be kept solely for Jewish institutions, for the dissemination of Jewish literature, for the cultivation of the Hebrew tongue, ancient and modern, for the discussion of living Jewish problems, for the building up of the full Jewish consciousness. And if there be a center in Palestine and if its influence shall be strong to work upon us, it must have a medium through which to work, and that can be only the synagogue as I conceive it and the synagogue school.

Who Killed Christ?—Was It the Jews, Or Was It the Roman Army of Occupation?

By George L. Hutchin, Author of "Judarael" and other Biblical and Historical Works.

In response to the appeal of the Anti-Defamation League for exact justice to all I wish to confess a long line of grievous faults for my brethren and to atone for those sins by humble apology and penitence.

In the alembic of the brain is a little lamp of reason. Let that little lamp burn.

For more than two thousand years the grasping world has borrowed its religions from the Jews and never given them just credit. For centuries the world has misunderstood the Jews, and has maligned and persecuted that splendid people and made life for them a heartsore and a weary struggle, until now, when we stand in the shadows of a new world and are about to have a righteous readjustment measured by the golden rule, it is fitting that all nations heed and urge the Jewish demand for "world liberation and not toleration."

Let that little lamp burn.

Christ Jesus was a Jew. A luminous star hung above the manger of his nativity in Nazareth. Into his body was breathed the spirit of divinity, and he came among men as a hope of that better life beyond the stars where there are no kings nor czars. His mission was to heal the afflicted, to make the blind see, to cure the lame and to raise the dead. His wondrous works aroused deepest interest, and vast multitudes became devout followers of the faith, which finds a worthy exponent today in Christian Science, the sanctuary of all the groping, penitent and seeking children of God.

Astride an ass, Jesus invaded Jerusalem to achieve greater conquests, by the arts of peace, and surely not by the sword. When he had arrived, he found the predatory army of Caesar that came to loot and extort the riches of the Hebrews. To the legions of Rome nothing was sacred but the invincible power of Rome. The "profiteers" like evil birds of prey, had followed the sword of Caesar to reap a golden harvest they had not sown. Emboldened by their success over the peaceful natives, the "profiteers" invaded and profaned the holy temples of the Jews, and Jesus, becoming incensed at the usury and extortions and desecrations of the robber barons, scourged them hence. They were furious, even as the "profiteers" of today are maddened by the loss of opportunity to filch from the poor and needy. They plotted His destruction. They were powerful as the Wall Street of today. They started an insidious propaganda to set the Legions of Rome against the meek and lowly Nazarene. They complained that Jesus had proclaimed himself King of the Jews and said that he was the son of the King of Kings who dwelt in Heaven.

Was it a Jew that desecrated the holy temple of his God, and profaned the worship of his Fathers? No! Never in a million years. No! It was the usurers from Rome that Jesus scourged from one sanctuary with the galling thongs of His scorpion whip.

Was Jesus arrested by the Jews for this treasonable threat of usurpation? No! He was arrested by Roman soldiers, who by threat of torture unto death and a bribe of thirty pieces of silver, induced Judas Iscariot to kiss the Master as a token of identity. To his credit be it said the pangs of conscience caused Judas, the betrayer, to suicide.

Let that little lamp of reason burn.

Jesus was dragged before the courts for trial on the charge of high treason, there being no other violation of an espionage act to which he was amenable. To the predatory hosts the rule of Rome was sacred as the word of Holy Writ.

Who tried Jesus, the Jews? No! The "profiteers," who have not changed their hearts from that day to this, tried Jesus.

Who was the trial judge that presided over this celebrated case? Was it a Solomon or a Daniel or another Jew? No! It was Pontius Pilate, the Roman, set up as Governor of Palestine.

And when Jesus made his plea before Pilate, that hardened jurist was so unnerved and shocked by the evil work of the "profiteers" that he called for an ablution, stating that he wished to wash his hands of the whole business. Justice, though blind, could see the frame-up big of mischief.

But the "profiteers" were politically powerful in that day, even as they are now in America, and they threatened to disgrace and unseat him if he did not condemn the Son of God.

Let that little lamp burn.

Jesus was handed over to the "profiteers," and the Roman soldiers assisted them in dragging our Savior through the dust to his doom, bearing the weighty cross on which He was to meet His fate.

The Romans, who alone had authority to execute condemned criminals in Jerusalem in that period, haled two robbers to Calvary and crucified them upon the crosses prepared. And between these two thieves Jesus was nailed upon his cross and given a crown of thorns. This was a mode of execution unknown to the Jews up to that time. Crucifixion was a barbarous conception of the Roman Empire where Christians were often fed to ferocious wild beasts and butchered by gladiators to make a Roman holiday.

Let that little lamp of reason shine.

After a night of agony in the Garden of Gethsemane, and Jesus had ascended the cross, who was it that came forward and thrust his cruel spear through the quivering heart of the Prince of Light? Was it a Jew? No! It was a Roman soldier.

And the great white light that beat upon His intellectual brow dazzled us with the splendor of His genius and made us drunken with the wine of His words.

All that was mortal of Christ Jesus had passed away, but his soul still lives, for it is immortal and death has no sting beyond the grave. His gracious spirit fills all the earth where it carries a wondrous message of love to the hearts of men and heals the sick and banishes pain and disease, and makes the world look brighter and better under the gonfalon of the devout scientists of the latter days.

Let that lamp light the way.

When the Jews were faithful to their God of Israel, they were protected and prospered. But when they strayed away after strange gods, they were punished and scattered. They are God's chosen people, and He surely loved them, for He made so many of them. They were His interpreters, and they carried His great message to all the peoples of the earth.

The rough knocks of the world have polished them until today they can proudly name of their race many of the most prominent statesmen, historians, scientists, barristers, jurists, artists, actors, literateurs and philanthropists.

For centuries the gravest injustice has been done unto the Jews. Immortal Shakespeare, who never knew the Jews, for there were no Jews in England in his day, depicted Shylock in the "Merchant of Venice" as a fiend incarnate, boisterously clamoring for his pound of flesh. Unwittingly and unjustly, that master mind of drama put a blight upon the Hebraic character that will take ages to correct and atone. The world owes much to Jewry.

Neither in history nor in the Bible is there such a character as Shylock. Shylock is only the figment of drama's chloral heated brain, a phantasy, which, when read, or acted, with all the thrilling allurements of the stage, thoughtless people saw and believed.

And now that the Armageddon is over and the world is gathering around the table of peace, the very least that justice could suggest would be to insure the realization of the Jewish dream of centuries, the dream that Palestine shall have "her place in the sun" and become a free and independent state and a power among the nations of the world.

Let the little lamp shine on.

In the days when it was nobler to be a Roman than a king it was commanded that there should be rendered unto Caesar those things that were Caesar's. Today, I say, humanity demands that Christendom atone for the errors of the past and render unto the Jews those great and just rewards that are theirs.

From the melting pot of the ages let us pour out a universal brotherhood and pledge justice and liberty eternal.

We have just counted another pearl upon the rosary of time when humanity should make its new resolve, a resolve of atonement.

In this twilight zone of predatory failure and ruin of autocracy let that lamp of liberty so shine that justice shall make her proper awards. Let the agonies of Dreyfus, Mendel Beilis and the thousands of other Jewish martyrs be atoned as the conscience of the world is enthroned.

Let us make the Ghetto the playground of happiness, and the inquisitorial courts of Cohila the palace of justice, with exact liberty and equity for all.

The foregoing article was sent in the form of a letter to Mr. Sigmund Livingston, chairman of the Anti-Defamation League of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, and is published without comment.

HEBREW HUMANITARIANISM

By Edward Chauncey Baldwin, Ph. D

In President Wilson's War Message to Congress of April 2, 1917, occurs the following sentence apropos of Germany's disregard of international law: "I am not now thinking of the loss of property involved, immense and serious as that is, but only of the wanton and wholesale destruction of the lives of non-combatants, men, women and children, engaged in pursuits which have always, even in the darkest periods of modern history, been deemed innocent and legitimate."

In the annotated reprint of the message, published under the title "The War Message and the Facts Behind It", by the Committee on Public Information in June of the same year, occurs the following comment. "Mr. Wilson could have gone further back than "modern history". Even in the most troubled period of the Middle Ages there was consistent effort to spare the lives of non-belligerents. Thus in the eleventh century not merely did the church enjoin the "truce of God", which ordered all warfare to cease on four days of the week, but it especially pronounced its curse upon those who uotraged or injured not merely clergymen and monks, but all classes of women. We also have ordinances from this "dark period" of history forbidding the interference with shepherds and their flocks, the damaging of olive trees, or the carrying off or destruction of farming implements. All this at a period when feudal barons are alleged to have been waging their wars with unusual ferocity."

As a matter of fact President Wilson might have gone still "further back" to a period sixteen centuries earlier than that referred to by the learned editor of his message for a precedent to shame the lawless apostles of "kultur". The Hebrew law expressly forbade some of the atrocities that have shocked the modern world. It was forbidden by the provisions of the Deuteronomic Code to cut down fruit trees even in an enemies' country (Deut. 20:19-20). By the same code it was forbidden to attack a fortified city without first demanding its surrender. If the city yielded and opened its gates, the population, instead of being put to the sword, were to become slaves.

The treatment of such slaves was in Israel tempered with mercy. Bodily injury at the hands of the owner that caused the loss of an eye or a tooth entitled the slave to immediate manumission (Ex. 21:26-27). An injury to a slave causing death the same day was treated as murder (Ex. 21:20-21). If a slave escaped, the law forbade those with whom he had taken refuge to return him to his master (Deut. 23:15-16). Moreover, the law provided, not only for the humane treatment of slaves, but for their admittance under certain conditions to a share in the religious privileges of true Israelites. They were not allowed, any more than the Hebrews themselves, to work on the Sabbath (Ex. 20:10). The main reason assigned in Deuteronomy for the institution of the Sabbath as a day of rest is "that thy man-servant and thy maid-servant may rest as well as thou. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt" (Deut. 5:14-15). The non-Hebrew slave might even join in the Passover Feast provided he first became circumcised (Ex. 12:44; Deut. 16: 11-14). This does not mean that he was required to become a proselyte, for there is no mention of baptism or sacrifice, which would have been required before he could become a child of the covenant. Moreover, in the command to observe the joyous festivals of Israel, the slaves are expressly mentioned as included in the invitation to "rejoice before Jehovah, with the Levite that is within thy gates, forasmuch as he hath no portion, nor inheritance with you". (Deut. 12:12).

That these attempts to render warfare more humane were not mere paper legislation, but that they represented, to some extent at least, the practice in Israel is attested by the historical books. These furnish the earliest recorded instance of humanity shown to prisoners of war. The story of Elisha and a marauding band of Syrians whom he led by a ruse into Samaria, is highly significant (2 Kings 6:22-23). When the king proposed to kill them, the prophet answered: "thou shalt not smite them; hast thou taken captive with thy sword and with thy bow those who thou wouldest smite? Set bread and water before them, that they may eat and drink, and go to their master. And he prepared great provision for them; and when they had eaten and drunk, he sent them away, and they went to their master." And the historian adds "the bands of Aram came no more into the land of Israel."

Again, according to the chronicler, a prophet of the Northern Kingdom by his intervention obtained the release of two hundred thousand Judean captives who had been brought to Samaria as slaves. (2 Chron. 28:15).

These considerations simply emphasize the indisputable fact that modern humanitarian principles, which underlie the agreements known as international law, have their roots in Hebrew thought, and are instances of the debt of the modern world to that race which alone of ancient races respected human life.

SENSATIONAL CASE IN ROUMANIA

Sub-Lieut. Jovin, Sergt. Freasculescu, and Pte. Novascu will shortly appear before a Roumanian court on the charge of shooting three Odessa Jewish merchants, and robbing them of 200,000 roubles. The case has a sensational history. When the murder became known in Russia in 1917, the then Minister of Foreign Affairs (in Kerensky's government) demanded an inquiry into the matter. The first hasty examination exonerated the officer and soldiers who took part in the crime, on the ground that they were able to "prove" that the three victims came to Roumania to agitate "for the emancipation of the Jews and for revolutionary purposes." At a later date it transpired that 200,000 roubles had disappeared from the pockets of the murdered Jews; hence the suspicion arose that robbery and not the alleged revolutionary propaganda of the three merchants and the supposed desire of the officer to protect the State was the motive for the crime. A new inquiry was instituted, and other accomplices are now being searched for, the second theory as to the cause of the crime being supported by many witnesses.

JEWISH GUARD DEFENDS VIENNA

The Jewish Correspondence Bureau, Berne-Lausanne, reports that as the organization of the German-Austrian national guard is not yet complete, Vienna was left without protection. The Jewish National Guard at once placed several battalions of the Guard at the disposal of the town. The commander of Vienna expressed his gratitude to the leaders of the Jewish National Guard for the assistance rendered in the time of need. Commenting on this fact the Frankfurter Zeitung writes: "It is very interesting that Vienna, which has always been a center of anti-Semitism, now owes its security to Jewish battalions."

JEWS OF MID-EUROPE FOR BRITISH TRUSTEESHIP OF PALESTINE.

National Congress of Czechoslovakian Jews Adopts Resolution Asking Peace Congress to Recognize Jewish Commonwealth, with Great Britain as Trustee for League of Nations.

Three hundred and forty delegates at the National Congress of Czechoslovakian Jews, which opened its sessions in Prague on Jan. 4, have unanimously adopted a resolution favoring the establishment of a Jewish national homeland in Palestine, under the trusteeship of Great Britain, acting for a League of Nations, if such a league is formed.

The cabled report of this resolution states that the Congress was composed of delegates from Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia and Slavonia, and included members of all the Czech political parties. Stress was laid at this conference on the close relationship existing and sympathy between the Czech and Jewish proletariat.

EDUCATIONAL RESTRICTIONS IN ROUMANIA

During the last few months it has become extremely difficult for Jews to gain admission into a Roumanian State educational institution. Even the State Lyceum at Braila, which, owing to the occupation of its premises by the military authorities, enjoys the hospitality of the Committees of the Jewish Girls' School and the Home for Aged Jews, suspended the admission of Jewish students. Last year many co-religionists were accepted as students of the Lyceum in recognition of the offer by Jews of two buildings to carry on the work of the institution. The Committee of the Union of Roumanian Jews made representations to the Minister of Education concerning the restrictions. He replied that he could not do anything in the matter so long as the Jewish problem remained unsolved.

ADDRESS ON LAFAYETTE DAY.

By Simon Wolf.

The greater charter for world freedom had been signed by the fifty six immortals. Franklin's witticism of "We must hang together or hang separately" was to become a verity. The bell on the state house on Independence Square had rung out the gladsome tidings, and the clanging tones gave the requiem of death to kingcraft on this continent; the reverberating sounds are still heard, more now than ever before, proclaiming universal brotherhood and death to autocracy.

The good ship United States had been launched on the tempestuous ocean of doubt and danger, but at the wheel was George Washington, manned by the sturdy sons of New England and the Southland, inspired and fired by the enthusiasm of Patrick Henry's trumpet call, "Give me liberty or give me death." The colonies had no quarrel with the people of England, for some of its best men and greatest leaders were friends of the struggling colonies. Their fight was, as our fight now is, with the German king, and as they won out, so will we.

It was in this hour when the Continental Congress was in session, devising and planning, that a stranger was accorded an interview, a mere lad not nineteen years of age, incapable of speaking English, but conversant with the world language of heart and soul; it was not a soldier of fortune, not a Dugald Dalgetty or swashbuckler, but a gentleman of the best blood of France, so splendidly portrayed by Alexander Dumas in his "Three Musketeers" in the character of Comte De la Fere. It was Marquis De la Fayette, bringing not only his life and fortune in aid of liberty, but representing in his devotion the loyal friendship of his government and people. No doubt our greatest statesman and diplomat, philosopher and reasoner, tactful logician, Benjamin Franklin, had worked so intelligently that even the spies of the English minister were foiled. He it was who gave life and impetus to the movement for ships, arms, munitions, money and men to make the world free, just as we are now giving unstintingly to perpetuate the freedom which France so gloriously aided to establish.

And as France was our ally and friend in the crucial moment, so we must repay; the deed of gift has more than a hundred years of interest, and every American and every dollar must be offered up to save France, not that she is "bled white," as the German liars have claimed, for France in 1914 had 1,500,000 men at the front and 12,000 shells a day; now she has 2,700,000 men battling the Huns to a finish and 300,000 shells a day.

Lafayette showed marked skill as a soldier and enjoyed the good-will and confidence of Washington and his entourage. He was at Valley Forge, where he left his imprint on the frozen snow, full of courage and daring; he was at Monmouth, and finally at Yorktown, where he and his gallant Frenchmen, headed by Rochambeau and De Grasse, conjured victory by defeating Cornwallis. So pre-eminent were his services that Washington not only complimented him but wrote a letter of deep appreciation. During the days preceding the end, Lafayette had returned to France, urging the government to send more aid, and succeeded in all his pleas. He left the young republic full of hope and joy, returning in 1784 to revisit the scenes of battle. He was met at Richmond, Va., by Washington, who escorted him to Mt. Vernon, where in quiet seclusion they conversed of the past, little dreaming of the great republic of today. Yorktown and Williamsburg were revisited and every point of the battle front was fraught with sacred memories. Speaking of Mt. Vernon reminds me that when Lord Coleridge, chief justice of England, visited this sacred spot, Secretary of State Wm. M. Evarts accompanied him. Gazing on the shores of Virginia, hearing the rippling murmur of the Potomac, Coleridge said: "Mr. Secretary, is it true that Washington could throw a cent across the Potomac?" And our witty American promptly replied: "Why not, he threw a sovereign across the ocean." And so will our brave Yankee boys help to throw an emperor and all of his looters across the Rhine.

Lafayette after a tour of four months returned to France, and passed through all the stages of the French Revolution, which was the offspring of our own, the wars of Napoleon and the Restoration. In 1824, Congress by resolution invited him to be the nation's guest, which was conveyed by a personal letter of President Monroe. He came, bringing his son, George Washington De la Fayette. For one year he was feted, honored and acclaimed; children strewed his path with flowers, women embrace[illegible] one of the nation's architect[illegible] towns, counties and streets were [illegible] after him; Lafayette Square in Washington, and the statue to him and Rochambeau, give evidence of the deep appreciation of the American people

He returned in 1825, and finally, to France, and on the 20th of May, 1834, he crossed the bar, leaving a name and fame untarnished, a record for unselfish work unchallenged. Physically dead, his soul, like John Brown's, is marching on, and on every battlefield his spirit is inspiring our brave men to renewed determination to end the rule of tyrants, and advance the banner of democracy.

Gallant soldier, patriotic gentleman, noble son of world freedom, we salute you. And, thus were passed away one of the most unique figures in the history of the world.

Let me close in the language of Thomas Moore, paraphrased, "Let fate do her worst, there are relics of joy, bright dreams of the past, which she cannot destroy, which come in the night-time of sorrow and care, and bring back the features that Lafayette used to wear; long be our hearts with such tender memories filled, like a vase in which roses have once been distilled; you may break, you may shatter, the vase, if you will, but the scent of the roses, like the glorious memory of Lafayette, will hang round it still."

CALLS ON CHRISTIANS TO SUPPORT ZIONISM.

Head of Greek Church, Archbishop of Mt. Sinai, in Name of Christians in Palestine, Endorses Jewish Aspirations.

Porphyrios II, Archbishop of Mt. Sinai, from his seat in Jerusalem, has issued an appeal to all the members of the Greek Orthodox Church in Syria, Palestine and the world over to support with all their heart the aspirations of the Jews, and to work harmoniously with the Zionists in the realization of the Zionist aim. The following letter has been written by him in his official capacity as head of the Greek Church and community in Palestine, to Dr. Chaim Wiezmann, president of the Zionist Commission to Palestine

"We, who belong to the Hellenic stock, sympathize with the aspirations of the Jewish people in regard to the settlement of Palestine. We think that no claim could be more justified than this. The Jews, as the bearers of modern civilization, and as one of the most enlightened peoples of the world, will not only bring all their innate capacities to bear upon the development of this country which has been desolated by Turkish misrule, but will instill in the poverty-stricken inhabitants a spirit of progress and emulation and in the course of time Palestine will again become a land flowing with milk and honey, and will realize the biblical prophecies and promises. Hence, as a Greek, a Christian and as Archbishop of Mount Sinai, the mountain of the Ten Commandments, I support with all my heart the aspirations of the Jews. who, when all is said, have a right to settle in the land of their fathers, which I pray may henceforth become the land of their birth, thanks to the initiative and chivalrous protection of the great and liberal British Empire. We Christians owe much to Judaism, for its Bible is our Bible, and we ought to forget the mutual grievances which have their root in the perversity of human nature. On this holy city Christianity, Islam and Judaism should hold out the hand to one another in perfect harmony. This is the service of the God whom we all worship. We are all brethren in the spirit of the verse which says, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself,' and of the saying, 'Thy Kinsman is he who does loving kindness.' "

SWEDISH PROTESTS AGAINST POLISH POGROMS.

Uncle of King Presides Over Massmeeting Which Denounces Massacres of Jews.

Prince Bernadotte, uncle of the king of Sweden, presided over a massmeeting, held in Stockholm recently and attended by many government officials, and which was called for the purpose of protesting against the massacres of Jews in Poland. At the meeting a large representation of the Swedish clergy was present, and resolutions were adopted denouncing the Poles as murderers too cowardly to accept the responsibility for their acts. The fact that this meting was held under what amounts to official auspices is proof that Sweden being in such close proximity to Poland, must be in possession of indubitable proof of the truth of the many reports of pogroms that have been published lately.

REPRESENTATIVE AND UNREPRESENTATIVE.

The highest praise we are wont to bestow upon a gathering is to say that it was representative, and conversely we signify our disapproval of the character of an assembly when we pronounce it unrepresentative. Now what we mean by representation is not merely that because a million or so of people cannot possibly be convoked after the fashion of an old town meeting their business has to be done by a small number chosen at random. The electorate will seek to be represented by persons of more than average intelligence or experience. Accordingly by representative we mean embodying the highest possible type in the range of intellect and character. And if an assembly falls short in its make-up of that high order we feel that it is unrepresentative. Democracy is misunderstood when it is made tantamount to a dead level of capacity. Pure democracy has been found to be an impossibility. One need not be a "stand-patter" of the old guard to emphasize the distinction between absolute democracy and representative government. To what follies and crimes the proletarian democracy of the type of Bolshevism may lead we know by this time only too well. It means exchanging one form of autocracy for another, one dictatorship for another. It means a silencing of even a majority by the force snatched temporarily by a minority. After all the autocrats of old could boast of lineage, of ancient titles, with which went a particular training all tending in the direction of statecraft. We are not pleading here for an effete institution. We are simply reminding the reader that there are pitfalls in democracy when it is of the "pure" sort. The only stable democracy is of the representative kind, which suffers for the moment its own power for legislating and executing laws to be vested in a few hands, which has a remedy in its elective power to shift power periodically, but which should not interfere with its chosen representatives while they are engaged in their rightful business. There is a sort of illusion practiced. The voter believes that he is powerful and sovereign because he affixes his cross to a name that has been chosen by others who are better fitted to choose. The strongest statesman is he who succeeds in persuading multitudes that he is doing their bidding, whereas in reality all the initiative is his. And rightly so. Representation means that sovereignty is for the time being concentrated instead of being diffused. The true representative must fall back upon his own individual judgment and must render account to his own conscience. He should not consider sectional interests unless they are just; certainly not on the principle of dividing the spoils. Constituencies have a right to be heard but they must not expect that the man of their choice must in all respects voice their sentiments. Their representative meets other representatives; and while the constituencies may be committed to a policy because it sometimes forms an obsession, the representative rubs elbows with his colleagues, comes face to face with other points of view, must be free to admit the force in a counter-argument. And for that reason a representative must be a man of the highest type of reasoning power and conscientiousness. As things stand in the world, it is not the best man that is elected. Mediocrity abounds, and to the extent of the numerical prevalence of the mediocre the character of an assembly becomes unrepresentative of the sum of intelligence and moral power found in a community. Still we are satisfied if in an assembly there are found a few men of the highest type. It is they who determine the character of a gathering. A people or a group will always be judged not by the average, but by the best that is in them. And no people or group are so mediocre as not to produce some individuals who tower above the dead level of mediocrity. Our reputation in the long run does not rest on the mob, be it a million strong or be it measured by the hundreds. The mode of choosing representatives might be capable of improvement. But even as things go on now, the representative assembly is itself an educative force. Dead material is in course of time thrown aside. We need not be super-optimists to believe that at the bottom men are sane. The better types must assert themselves and as they predominate they impart of their character to that of the assembly in which they are nominally on a par with the hundreds, but in reality the dominating, truly representative figures. The men who stand forth as leaders are recognized as such by popular acclaim, which is more than any scheme of election into which questionable electioneering methods and slogans may be injected.

SMOOTH SAILING.

If there was any doubt in the minds of the American people as to the wisdom of President Wilson's going abroad, it ought to be dispelled by this time. The President, it is true, has been received at three capitals with a singular warmth and genuine acclaim. Everywhere the head of the American nation with characteristic graciousness let it be understood that the demonstrations were not meant for him, the great statesman, the warm-hearted friend of humanity, but rather for the people whom for the time being he represented and the services it rendered in bringing the war to a victorious issue for the Allied cause. And perhaps it was more than graciousness that prompted the President to drive home this thought and to see that it impressed itself upon his hearers. For already there are heard sinister whisperings concerning the measure of gratitude or appreciation that is due America. They seem to think over there that the length of service counts for most. Now, no one for a moment would forget the sacrifices and losses endured by Belgium, France, England and Italy. But they ought to know that even at the time of our neutrality, when our resources were naturally placed at the disposal of both belligerents, our future allies were freest to come to us for what they needed. Moreover, the question of length of service is irrelevant. Paris was being threatened for the second time and the French nation seemed bled white and the English in a state of exhaustion when the United States stepped in and immediately released for active service the reserves, whose place was taken by the American troops. And as one day followed the other and one contingent after the other of that vast expeditionary force became available for field duty, it became possible for the generalissimo to plan and execute that splendid repulsion of the enemy farther and farther away from their objective. But the most important point was the psychological moment, the knowledge that those reserves of man power would be forthcoming and that France and England had the United States to fall back upon. So the part which America is to play in the peace conference must in no wise be curtailed. The very desire to curtail it proceeds from statesmen who see their pet schemes threatened by the vigorous stand of the American President. We can fully understand the point of view of those men whose political thinking was formulated a generation ago and who cannot see a safer road for their state to travel on than the one which in their estimation had been tried and found working. But was it really found working? Clemenceau answers that had the Entente been joined then by Italy and the United States the world catastrophe would have been avoided. In other words, the balance of power idea is the correct one, only the scale in which you place your fortunes must be sufficiently weighted. President Wilson is said, while crossing the channel on his return from England, to have remarked: "Let us hope we shall have smooth sailing of the kind we have had thus far". We shall hope, likewise, that he will have smooth sailing in order to convince the statesmen of Europe that a league of some nations which will leave out others must of necessity re-introduce all the conditions which brought on the present war, when a land power thought it could crush a maritime power. No, there must be one league only for all nations, if there shall be a stable peace. And the foundations for a stable peace must be reared upon the rock of mutual helpfulness rather than jealousies, of inclusion rather than of exclusion, of justice towards all and of might founded in right.

HONOR TO WHOM HONOR IS DUE

On Thanksgiving Day the B'nai B'rith wrote another significant page in its history for on that day some of the distinguished members of the Order went to the White House and there presented to President Wilson in behalf of their organization a gold medal in token of what he had wrought for humanity. In honoring the President, the Order of the B'nai B'rith has honored itself. But not only that, it has again demonstrated that it stands for humanitarian ideals and is ever ready to confer distinction upon those who have at heart the best interests of mankind. In making the presentation, Adolf Kraus spoke as follows: "You, Mr. President, have occupied the position as champion on the side of permanent peace, a leader in the fight against militarism, cruelty and misery. The people of this country are fortunate in having, at this time, as their leader a man whose words carry weight, not only with the allies, but even with the defeated nations."

Every member of the B'nai B'rith, every American Jew, yes, every American, no matter what his religious affiliation may be, heartily echoes the sentiments expressed by Mr. Kraus and hopes that through the President's words of wisdom there may come to the world that peace for which we have all so fervently prayed.—Columbus Jewish Chronicle.

A NEW JEWISH INSTITUTE IN RUSSIA

Dr. Czernowitz, the former Crown Rabbi of Odessa, who had resided in Switzerland since the outbreak of the war, has received an invitation from Russia to accept the post of principal of a new higher educational institution which will shortly be opened for the purpose of promoting Jewish knowledge. Dr. Czernowitz has accepted the invitation.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND JUSTICE TO THE JEWS.

One Phase of the International Question the Congress of Versailles Should Settle.

An Editorial by William Howard Taft in the Philadelphia Public Ledger.

The earnest effort of the Jews of the United States to induce our executive to remedy the intolerable condition of their co-religionists in the backward countries of Europe has often been met and defeated by the argument that our government cannot interfere with the domestic affairs of another nation. This argument has little if any application to the present situation. There is much evidence accumulating to show that the pogroms and abuses of the Jews continue in the countries where they have heretofore existed, and that the chaotic and lawless condition in these countries has offered an opportunity for the cruel gratification of race and religious prejudice. On the whole, it is not too much to say that the people of the Jewish race have suffered more in this war, as non-combatants, than any other people, unless it be the Serbians and the Armenians.

In Poland and in Galicia the true story of their agonies and losses is heartrending. Now we five nations who are to draft the treaty at Versailles are setting up governments in Poland, in the Ukraine and in the Baltic provinces. In all of these the Jewish population is a substantial percentage of the whole. In their sad story we find the Jews in the Middle Ages seeking refuge from the oppression and cruelty of western Europe and rushing to the great empire of Poland, then stretching from the Baltic to the Black Sea, to take advantage of a charter of religious tolerance and opportunity granted by one of the liberal Polish kings. The irony of fate, however, ended the Polish kingdom and a large part of it was turned over to Russia, which ground the Jews under its tyrannous heel. This is why half of the thirteen millions of Jews living in the world were at the beginning of this war to be found in the Russian pale in which Jews were permitted to live, to which they were limited, and which was practically coterminous with the territory which Russia had taken from old Poland.

One of the great projects of this congress of Powers at Versailles is to set up independent governments in these territories of the Russian Jewish pale. We shall be derelict in our duty if we do not require, as part of the fundamental law of these new republics, that the Jews shall have as great religious freedom as they have in the United States. But we must do more. We must have a league of nations to see to it that such fundamental law existed by the treaty shall be enforced. We find full precedent for such a provision in the law in the treaty made by the congress at Berlin in which Bulgaria and Roumania were established as independent countries. Roumania, which had long been a heinous sinner against the Jews, was forced by the Berlin congress to accept as part of its constitution a declaration that there should be complete religious freedom and that no citizen should be discriminated against on account of his religion in any respect. The Roumanian government had the audacity, after incorporating the guaranty in its fundamental law, to declare and hold that Jews who had lived in Roumania for two or three hundred years, father and son, were not citizens, but were aliens. In this way the protection of the Jews provided for in the treaty of Berlin was flouted, and this was after Roumania had secured recognition as a government on an additional promise of fair treatment of the Jews.

Let us have no farcical result in working out this treaty of Versailles. Could we find a stronger argument for the continuance of our league of nations than this ignominious failure of that congress in 1879, under the presidency of Bismarck,to carry out its declared purpose? If there be any people who should be earnestly in favor of a league of nations as the outgrowth and the condition of this treaty now being framed at Versailles the Jews are that people.

JEWISH MEMBERS OF GERMAN GOVERNMENT

Among the members of the new German government, Herr Emanuel Wurm is mentioned as state secretary of the war food department, Dr. David as under secretary at the foreign office. Herr Eduard Bernstein as assistant to the state secretary of the treasury, and Dr. Oskar Cohn as assistant to the state secretary of justice. In an earlier list. Herr Landsberg was named as minister for publicity, art and literature.

HQ. 27TH DIVISION, A. E. F.

Montfort, Dept. Sarthe, France
Dec. 16, 1918

Editor B'nai Brith News:

I was very much pleased to receive a copy of the B'nai B'rith News the other day, the anniversary number. But I missed a report of the Jewish work being done in the A. E. F., although your splendid honor roll showed the nearness of that question to our members. Perhaps I can give you a few facts of the front, although written now from the rear.

At present we have twelve Jewish chaplains here, of whom nine are assigned to divisions and three to cities in training areas. The other day five of us met in Le Mans, together with Dr. Enelow, who represents the Jewish Welfare Board at that city. I had the pleasure of taking part in the dedication of their new club there, the finest soldiers' club I have seen in France—as it is both home-like and club-like. The men living in the city or coming there from nearby points, like our area here, will be more than delighted with it. A fine thing is that the club was begun in the first place by a few of the men themselves, that they were helped by the military authorities, and that finally the J. W. B. stepped in, taking full responsibility for the work, financial and otherwise. I even stopped at the club while I was in the city, although the demand for beds by the workers and guests far exceeds the supply. But they do satisfy the men with shows, refreshments, services, facilities for reading and writing, and a thoroughly congenial place to loaf and meet their friends. The copy of the B'nai B'rith News is on their tables now, another most welcome message from home. I wish I could get it regularly for myself and for the boys.

As you know, the work of a Jewish champlain is a double one. All chaplains are alike in the army, except for religious services. Any man comes to any chaplain for any aid or favor, without regard to his religion. And any chaplain is the friend of every enlisted man and of most officers, again without regard to creed. But religious services are recognized officially as Catholic, Protestant and Jewish, and every effort is made to arrange for all three. Several times I have had chaplains of various faiths come to me, asking when I can come to their unit, and offering tô arrange my services and notify my men. Of course, with an entire division to look after, I can never cover it as fast as I or the boys would like. That is especially complicated by the frequent movements from one section of France to another and the great distances between the units when they are billeted, as at present, in villages of a back area, covering many miles. The army authorities give the chaplains of all faiths full encouragement in their work, but little practical aid in the form of transportation or other facilities. And the men are very glad to see the chaplain, bring him their problems, practical and personal, but they seldom walk ten miles to do it. So the chaplain at division headquarters has a good many obstacles to overcome. All that is, of course, for back areas, where the problems are very similar to those of the training camps in the States, with the one difference that we are here quite without the wonderful backing of the Jewish communities at home. I often wish that I could call upon the Chicago people for advice and assistance, as I did almost daily when I was at Great Lakes. Here we have only our own resources, and the growing, but still small facilities which the Jewish Welfare Board provides on this side. The difficulties of transportation proved an insuperable obstacle for the Board until the armistice was signed. From now on we can count on increasing aid from our co-religionists at home.

Of course, the forward areas (while such still existed) were entirely different. There no difference existed between one chaplain and another—the chaplain was the handy man who had no fixed post of duty, but could help in whatever need arose. As a rule, he was stationed at a first aid post and went from there wherever the need of the moment demanded. For example, during our last push up in the Somme sector (our division fought with the British, you know), I was sent up with one of the regiments in the place of a chaplain who had been wounded. I found the first aid post entirely over-crowded and took charge of the evacuation of wounded, with a group of German prisoners as stretcher bearers to carry patients in and out and to load the ambulances. As soon as I tired out one group, I sent them on to the cage and picked up a dozen or twenty more from the next crowd that came in. As we were located at a cross road and were being constantly shelled, we found our prisoners rather unwilling to stay, although they worked hard enough under orders. A rather striking exception was furnished by two captured physicians, who worked all day as hard and as efficiently as our own surgeons on wounded prisoners and Americans alike. One of them was a Jew from Stuttgart, with whom I had a most pleasant conversation and whom I should like to meet again in happier times.

And so the work went. One day I heard of a group of wounded out on the field and went out with some stretcher bearers to bring them in. Another, I heard of some civilians who were to be evacuated and hunted about for a truck to take them out of danger. A third day I got some comforts from the Red Cross and took them up to the boys in the front line trenches. The chaplain is the handy man, who can go anywhere and can do anything except carry a gun. That is almost the only thing forbidden us. For a week I had no supplies except a mess kit and a shaving kit, slept on a crowded cellar floor on a borrowed blanket, and worked at anything there was to do.

Then the division came out of the lines—never to go back, as it happened; the armistice intervened—and five of us chaplains, all of different religions, remained behind to work with the burial detail. We found our dead out on the battlefield, brought them in, buried them in a special American plot near the civilian cemetery of the village, and kept records of their identification and their personal effects. We buried as many Germans as we could also in the time at our command. And before going back to join the division we held a triple burial service—Jewish, Protestant and Catholic, with the bugle to sound "taps." The fine American flag in the center of the cemetery, the group of British "Tommies" who stopped their work at their plot nearby to listen to our services, the British plane hovering overhead, and the German shells bursting just beyond the knoll, made the scene unforgettable to all of us. It was a war-time funeral, expressing the unity in death as in life of these boys who have done such magnificent work, fighting and dying for America. The papers gave enough attention at the time to the work of the New York National Guard division, with which I am serving, and there is no need for me to add that I have seen plenty of cases of heroism among our Jewish boys, who have stood with the finest men of the division in every way.

But, happily, all that is over now. I shall always consider it the greatest privilege of my life that I was able to serve these boys of ours, Jewish and Gentiles, too, in their extremity. The heroism of the average American under the spur of danger is beyond belief—happy is the man who is able to serve and suffer with such as these!

With best personal regards to you and your co-workers in Chicago, I am,

Very sincerely yours,
LEE J. LEVINGER.

DISTRICT GRAND LODGE NO. 5, I. O. B. B.

Richmond, Va., Dec. 26, 1918.

To the Lodges of the District, Officers and Members of the General Committee, District Grand Lodge No. 5, I. O. B. B.:

Brethren: As we journey through this life we are interrupted from time to time by the Angel that calls from this to the higher and greater life beyond, and on occasions we find that his shafts of death have stricken one who through genial personality and devoted service has endeared himself to all his associates.

Such an occasion now faces us as I advise you with extreme regret of the death of our good friend and brother, Herman Sternberger, treasurer of District Grand Lodge No. 5, who passed away on last Sunday the 22nd of December, 1918.

Our Order has lost a faithful member and worker—each member has lost a friend. We give honor to his memory and extend every sympathy to his bereaved family.

It is directed that this letter be read at the next meeting of your lodge and included as a part of the minutes thereof.

Fraternally yours in B. B. L and H.,
(Signed) EDWIN L. LEVY.

ARE THEY MEN?

Written for the B'nai B'rith News by Maurice Kahn, Secretary of the Cleveland Lodge No. 16, Independent Order B'nai B'rith.

I met one of my lodge brothers on the street, and greeting him with the insigna of our lodge and Order, I asked him why he is not seen more often at our meetings. The question seemed to remind him of the fact that he was in arrears, and after a few vague excuses, requested that his name be taken off the membership roster. Being aware that he was a member of several fraternal orders, I was somewhat surprised at his request. I did not question him as to why he wants to take such a drastic step, but his request opened the flood gates of my eloquence, which my friends tell me is sublime when I utilize it in elucidating the duty of mankind to make the world happier and better by carrying out the ideals and principles upon which a fraternal order is built.

Great was my consternation when at the finale of my eloquent harangue my friend complimented me on the beauty of my expression, and how he regretted that the world was not richer in men of my type, "but," whispering in my ear, a whisper that sounded like the hiss of a snake, "but ideals, altruism, trying to make the world better will not, does not and never will pay the rent, the bills, etc. I do not belong to any lodge and society unless I can get some business out of them, and the moment there is nothing in it for me I quit."

The opinion expressed did not in any way surprise me, for he was only exhibiting that quality that we term "human nature," and which some of us believe will never be eradicated from human mortals. But why should he be any better than the other member of the lodge who sent in his resignation because the members do not buy hats from him? The fact that we do what he does, buy merchandise where he can get it at the lowest figure, does not enter into the consideration, he sees only one fact, his lodge brothers should patronize him, even if his merchandise is inferior in quality or higher in price.

Men of the type mentioned exist; they are not ficticious characters, they are found in every lodge and order, and they are adamant to the ideals and principles that the order stands for. SELFISHNESS is their ideal. How to get the most out of the Lodge is their principle, and when either one or the other cannot be satisfied, then they "quit."

The man who displays the emblem of his order in a manner to solicit business is not worthy of being a member of the order. The emblem should be to him what the epaulets are to the military officers, an honor, a sign of distinction, an insigna that shows to the world that he is not living a selfish, self-centered life, that he is helping to make life more pleasant and human beings happier. When he uses that emblem for mercenary gain it should be torn from the lapel of his coat, as the epaulets are torn from the officer who has brought disgrace upon the uniform he wears.

Men of the type described should not be tolerated in any order, they make up the quantity, but from far the quality. They do the order no good, and in many instances hinder the work and progress of the lodge. They are false. They violated their obligation. They obligated themselves to help carry out the principles of the order, but when "business" is not forthcoming, then the obligation and the moral of the lodge's ideals and principles are blown to the winds.

After all, this question comes to my mind: Are they, after all, men, men with the spirit of love for mankind, and desire to deal the cards of the game of life to others? No, they are selfish, believing in and playing the game of "solitaire."

GOLD MEDAL PRESENTED TO WARBURG

In recognition of the services of Felix M. Warburg in the recent campaign to raise $5,000,000 for the Jewish War Relief Fund, a gold metal valued at $1,000 was presented to him. The presentation speech was made by Col. H. A. Guinzberg. Others who paid tribute to Mr. Warburg's zeal were Mrs. Alexander Kohut, Cyrus L. Sulzberger and I. Edwin Goldwasser. The medal was designed by Victor Brenner, known throughout the country for his Lincoln one-cent piece. On one side is the inscription, "Blessing on the head of the righteous," and around the edge is "Felix M. Warburg, from the grateful Jewry of New York, December 22, 1918." On the other side is "Sacrifice, Sympathy, Sincerity, Service, Smiles, Self-denial."

WHAT IS TO BE DONE WITH TURKEY?

Herbert Sidebotham, Distinguished Military Critic Proposes an Asiatic Balkans.

DEMAND CONDOMINIUM BE REJECTED.

Asks that Jewish State In Palestine Be Wholeheartedly Established, With Autonomous Armenia, Free Arabia, Revivified Persia.

From Herbert Sidebotham, the military critic of the London "Times," in an article concerning General Allenby's achievements in Palestine comes an insight as to what will be the attitude of Great Britain toward the disposition of the fruits of his victory.

Speaking of the English victory in Palestine, he says in the first place: "We desire to maintain our old policy of setting up a buffer state betwen possible enemies and the Indian Empire. This buffer state in the past was Turkey, but Turkey has proved her unfitness, after long and patient trial, to fulfill what was her true role in the East. She can never again be trusted as an imperial power although it is to be hoped that there may be future for her in the parts of Asia which are still mainly inhabited y the people of Turkish race.

"Secondly, in place of the old Turkish oligarchy we propose to set up an Asiatic Balkans, consisting of a new Jewish state in Palestine, a new Arabia, an autonomous Armenia, and a revivified Persia. What are the conditions of success in the new experiment we are making? They are these: first, there must be an end of Turkish rule under any form in the provinces of Arabia, of Palestine, or Armenia and Mesopotamia. If we are creating new states in which the experiment of freedom is to be tried, et us do it bodily and have done once for all with the old policy of relying on Turkey. Secondly, whatever political solution is reached, the idea of condominium must be definitely rejected. If we are setting up a new Jewish state in Palestine, let us do it whole-heartedly, in reference alike to the historical past of the Jews in Palestine and to the problem of the future defense of the country. On such questions as this, which are partly military and partly political, there is no one who can speak with such authority as General Allenby, and he should certainly be given a voice in their settlement."

And last of all, he effectively disposes of the attempt that has recently been made to create the inference that General Allenby is among those who are thinking of Palestine in terms of internationalism.

3.9 PER CENT OF AMERICAN WAR CASUALTIES JEWISH

It is estimated that there are from 150,000 to 200,000 Jews in the armed forces of the United States. Of these probably 130,000 are in the army, 20,000 in the navy and 1,400 in the marine corps. The records of 65,000 Jews have been classified and filed. Of these 4,910 are commissioned officers. Up to Nov. 1, 1918, there were 2,502 casualties among Jews out of a total of 64,157, or 3.9 per cent. Of the 2,502 casualties noted up to Nov. 1, and which comprises 3.9 per cent of the total casualties, 451 were killed in action; 142 died from wounds, 96 from disease and 73 from accident and other causes, making the total deaths 882 or 4.1 per cent of the total fatalities in the American Expeditionary Forces. The Jewish wounded number 1,397, or 3.8 per cent of the American forces.

JEWS AT INTERNATIONAL DIPLOMATIC MEETINGS

Measures Taken by Jews to Secure Their Civil, Political and Religious Rights at International Diplomatic Congresses and Conferences

BY ISRAEL GOLDBERG

(Written for the Jewish Exponent)

Backstairs diplomacy, which is now so generally and justly discredited, was, nevertheless, the only recourse of a weak people under circumstances when public opinion had no force. At a time when princes and rulers could gather around the green table and secretly dispose of the fates of provinces and peoples with impunity, the just claims of the weak could only be presented indirectly and furtively. Autocracy and secrecy are not obliged to reckon with the demands of justice for the reason that an autocratic regime is not amenable to public opinion. It is only with the rise of democracy and the effective public opinion on which it is founded that backstairs diplomacy becomes obsolete and indefensible.

A study of the various attempts on the part of Jews to secure their rights from national diplomatic meetings proves that the Jews were not committed to the backstairs or shtedlenuth method. They used the method which circumstances indicated would be likely to prove the most efficacious. A steady progression toward the method of dignity and publicity is traceable, becoming more and more open and democratic and keeping steady pace with the general diffusion of democracy. The manner in which Jews reacted to the occasions when the potentates of the earth met to dispose of international affairs is a true gauge of the extent of the democratic sentiment pervading the nations at the time of their readiness to recognize the claims of justice. And this much may be stated with assurance: That the readiness of the world to recognize the claims of justice is in direct proportion to the extent and power of the spirit of democracy. From the Congress at Rastatt in 1797, when the first Jewish attempts were made up to our own times, Jewish diplomacy, as it may be rightly termed, has become more and more dignified and open.

Congress of Rastatt (December, 1797).

The first Jewish diplomats, it seems, were not even Jews. At this international conference which was convened for the purpose of rearranging the map of Germany by providing compensation for these princes whose lands on the left bank of the Rhine had been seized by France, the Jews were represented by two Christians. One of them, Christopher Grund, championed the cause of the Jews with great ability, urging "the abolition of those distinctions under which they live and the granting of greater rights." In this connection, it seems he was working in harmony with the Dutch Jews, who even then endeavored to influence public opinion on behalf of the Jews who found themselves under the unbenign sway of the German princelings. The latter unfortunately remained quite unaffected by the eloquence and logic of Christopher Grund.

The Indemnification Congress (November, 1802).

Christopher Grund figures again as the champion of the Jews at this international congress, which was composed of the ambassadors of eight German princes, who, after the dismemberment of the Holy Roman Empire, assembled at Ratisben for the purpose of bringing their disunited members into some sort of order and of deciding upon the indemnity of the damage suffered. Grund presented a petition which probably originated from the Frankfort Jews, requesting civil rights for the Jews and citing the example of France and the Netherlands who had already emancipated their Jewish subjects. In spite of the support from the Ambassador of the electorate of Austria, the petition was "buried under a pile of state papers."

Congress of Vienna (1814-15).

At this epoch-making congress which was convened for the purpose of making disposition of all countries which the fall of Napoleon had freed from French Suzerainty, Jews appeared for the first time as representatives for their own people. In 1814 the Jews of Frankfort, who were threatened with the loss of their privileges, sent two of their community to Vienna, namely: Jacob Baruch, father of Ludwig Borne, and Oppenheim or Uffenheim. These two delegates delivered to the Prussian plenipotentiary, von Hardenburg, a memorial which was presented to the congress. This memorial invoked on behalf of the Jews the claim that they had purchased equal rights for a large sum and that they had patriotically participated in the liberation of Germany. At the same time, the Jews of three Hanseatic cities, against whom hostile sentiment had appeared, sent to Vienna a Christian lawyer by the name of Buchholz, who had made himself known through a pamphlet in favor of the emancipation of the Jews. During his stay in Vienna, Buchholz published several manifestos and also presented a memorial.

In spite of the fact, however, that both Metternich and von Hardenburg were favorably disposed to the claims of the Jews and that the Congress itself occupied itself with the question several times; in spite also of the fact that the constitution of Germany, drawn up by William von Humboldt, promised the Jews equality, the tide of Teutomania ran too strong, and in the final disposition of the question the matter was left for each German state to settle for itself. In consequence the Jews were deprived of the rights they had acquired from the French conquerors.

At the Congress of Vienna, also, a number of influential Jews worked "quietly and unobtrusively" among themselves of the Rothschild brothers.

Congress of Aix-La-Chapelle (October-November, 1818).

Two memorials on behalf of the Jews were presented in this Congress which met for the purpose of determining upon the conditions for the withdrawal of the army of occupation from France. The first was presented through the Emperor Alexander of Russia, by a Christian minister, Louis Way, an English mystic and religious enthusiast, who quoted prophecy and apocalypsy in support of his contention that the Jews should be emancipated. This memorial was disposed of with courtly, but evasive phrases.

The second memorial was in the shape of a special appeal issued by Michael Barr, son of Barr Isaac Barr, who was a member of Napoleon's assembly of Jewish notables and secretary of the Grand Sanhedrin. In this appeal Michael Barr demanded the reinstatement of the Jews in their civil and political rights. The Italian Jews also combined to send a petition to this Congress which, however, was never delivered.

Congress of Paris (1856) and the Conference of Paris (1858).

The first of these international diplomatic gatherings resulted in the Treaty of Paris on March 30, 1856, which put an end to the war of the Crimea. By the terms of this treaty Russia ceded part of Besarrabia which was united with Moldavia. Wallachia and Moldavia as well as Servia were confirmed in their rights and immunities and placed under the protection of the Powers. The second conference resulted in the Convention of Paris on Aug. 19, 1858, for the organization of the principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia and included the electoral stipulations.

Article No. 46 of this Paris Convention reads as follows:

"All Moldavians-Wallachians are equal before the law and are equally admissible to public functions. The Moldavians and Wallachians of all Christian sects shall enjoy political rights equally. The enjoyments of these rights can be extended to the other religions by legislative enactments."

It was this clause which left the settlement of the Jewish question to the discretion of the Roumanians and enabled them to deprive the Jews of their civil and political rights. It seems that in conjunction with these two diplomatic gatherings the Jews made no attempts to safeguard the rights of their fellow Jews in Roumania. On March 8, 1878, the Jewish Chronicle says:

"A memorial to either of these conferences, from the Board of Deputies, then the only Jewish organization in the world, sent to speak in the name of the Jewish people, through the instrumentality of the British government, would probably have sufficed to prevent the insertion in these treaties of the notorious clauses which enabled Roumania to set on foot the too well-known persecutions of her Jewish subjects."

Conference at Constantinople (December-January, 1877).

This conference was called for the purpose of solving the problems created by the aspirations of the Christians subjected to Ottoman rule and to prevent, if possible, war between Russia and Turkey. On Jan. 18, 1877, the Council of the Sultan rejected the propositions of this conference as to reform in Turkey and Russia declared war on Turkey on April 4, 1877. In connection with this conference, however, the most thorough-going attempt, as yet recorded, was made by the Jews of the world to secure and safeguard the civil and political rights of their fellow-Jews in the Balkan principalities. An international Jewish Congress, representing the principal Jewish organizations of the world, was convened in Paris and held sessions from Dec. 11 to 15, 1876.

The initiative was taken by the Anglo-Jewish Association which, on Nov. 16, 1876, passed the following resolutions:

"Momentous changes being imminent in the East, likely to affect large communities of Jews:

"Resolved, That it be proposed to the Alliance Israelite Universelle to convene as early as possible at a place to be named hereafter, in conjunction with this association, the Alliance in Vienna, and other similarly constituted bodies in Europe and America, a conference composed of delegates of such bodies, in order to deliberate upon and adopt such measures as may seem best calculated to secure to the Jews in the provinces affected by the war the same rights as may be obtained for the Christians.

"Resolved, That such conference shall, if it be deemed desirable, enter upon the consideration of the question of religious liberty generally and the means for promoting its unrestricted enjoyment in those countries in which it is at present, but imperfectly recognized."

Paris was finally designated as the proper place for the holding of this conference, which was convened for Dec. 11, 1876, and continued until Dec. 15, 1876.

This conference, which was perhaps as close in approximation of a Jewish gathering which the times permitted consisted of 65 delegates, of whom 22 were members of the Central Committee of the Alliance at Paris. The delegates representing America came from a Board of Delegates and were Messrs. J. M. Lawrence, Arthur Lewy and William Seligman, all of New York.

At the first session of this conference Adolph Cremieux, president of the Alliance Israelite Universelle, was elected president, and Baron Henry de Worms, president of the Anglo-Jewish Association, was elected vice-president. The other vice-presidents were: M. Astruo. Chief Rabbi of Belgium; Dr. S. Kristeller, Dr. Perlin and Mr. William Seligman, of New York.

At this first session also the question as to whether the conference should be open, that is to agree that all representatives of the press should be admitted to the session, was discussed. The English delegates favored this action as the most effectual means for preventing misconceptions, and at the sessions held the following day, representatives of the press were finally admitted.

Another interesting question came up at this session. This was the question as to the manner in which the memorial to be addressed to the Constantinople Conference should be submitted. M. Cremieux expressed himself of the opinion that the Constantinople Conference should be addressed directly in a joint memorial signed by the delegates present. Baron Henry de Worms, on the other hand, was apprehensive that diplomatic etiquette might prevent the plenipotentiaries in Constantinople from accepting officially the memorial. He suggested that application should be made by the various delegates to their several governments to the effect that the latter give suitable instructions to their plenipotentiaries relative to the purport of the memorial, as otherwise the object of the delegates might fail. On this issue the following resolutions were finally adopted.

1. The meeting of delegates shall address a memorial to the conference at Constantinople.

2. The delegates assembled shall address special applications to their respective governments, that these should favorably receive the memorial intended for the Constantinople conference.

3. That, moreover, all governments represented at the Constantinople conference should be requested to take into favorable consideration the memorial in accordance with resolution No. 2.

The memorial as finally adopted by the Congress may be summarized as follows:

The memorialists set forth that they are delegated by the Jews in various free countries to request the conference at Constantinople to secure to the Jews the same rights as may be granted to the general population of the disturbed provinces of the Turkish Empire. Sad experience had shown in the Danubian principalities the danger of the inequality of rights caused by the Treaty of 1856 and the Convention of 1858, the latter of which contains a clause which by the construction put upon it, enables the Roumanians to exclude Jews from rights enjoyed by their fellow countrymen. The greater part of the memorial consists of a statement of the grievances of the Jews in Roumania, and of the various exclusive laws and disabilities created by successive governments against them. The memorialists urged that Europe can no longer be silent on the subject, and asked whether at a moment when social and political equality is unanimously demanded for the Christians in the East, Europe can permit in Roumania a population of 250.000 souls to remain subjected to unexampled persecution. Protecting the Jews in Roumania, like the non-Mussulmans in Turkey, Europe should proclaim that it could sustain religious liberty everywhere.

The two following propositions are submitted:

1. Religious equality to all non-Mussulmans in the Province of Turkey whose condition is submitted to the deliberation of the conference and to Jews in the Principality of Servia.

2. To revise and complete the Convention of Paris in 1858 in as far as concerns the Jews of Roumania, in order to insure to them the complete enjoyment of civil and political rights.

It is interesting to note that in England three large public meetings were held where the delegates to these conferences reported: In Manchester, Liverpool and Birmingham. These facts afford another indication of the democratic tendency of this movement on behalf of the East European Jews.

The only Jewish organization of consequence which did not participate in this conference was the British Board of Deputies, which even went to the extent of writing to the Foreign Minister, Earl Derby, and informing him of the fact that it had declined to take part in it. This action on the part of the British Board of Deputies is strongly condemned by the London Jewish Chronicle. Stress was laid on the fact that, apart from other considerations the holding of the conference was of great value in the influence which it exerted on public opinion, compelling the European and metropolitan press to give attention to the problem of the Jews of eastern Europe. This conference was hailed as one of the most remarkable events in the Jewish annals of the century. It was regarded as a pledge of the unity of Israel.

It seems, moreover, that the standing of the British Jews with their own government was not only not impaired by their participation in this conference, but was even strengthened, as is evidenced by the response of Earl Derby to a deputation of the Anglo-Jewish Association which came to bespeak his good offices on behalf of the memorial. In his response the Foreign Minister made the following very significant statement:

"I cannot advise you better than to appeal constantly and on all fitting occasions, to that which you will find a stronger support than that which any government can give you, viz.: the support of general public opinion."

The memorial prepared by this International Jewish Conference was submitted to the diplomatic conference at Constantinople by Charles Better, who may be considered the most statesman-like mind of the Alliance Israelite Universelle.

As stated before, the Council of the Sultan rejected the findings of the Constantinople Conference and the Russo-Turkish War followed.

Congress of Berlin (June 13 to July 13, 1878).

As is well known, it was at this Congress that the Jews won what they then thought was a great diplomatic victory. In the final treaty a clause was inserted which seemed able to guarantee the rights of the Jews in Roumania. As it turned out, however, the Roumanian officials proved themselves able to circumvent and frustrate the apparent purpose of this clause.

We are interested here primarily with the measures which the Jews of the world took previous to the convening of the Congress of Berlin with a view to safeguarding Jewish rights.

It is interesting to note at the outset that unlike the action taken in regard to the Constantinople Conference of 1876, no international Jewish gathering ook place and no concerted action by international Jewry was taken.

It is true that at the meeting of the Anglo-Jewish Association held on March 4, 1878, the proposal for holding an international Jewish Conference was made and was very warmly indorsed by the Jewish Chronicle of March 15, 1878, which lays special stress on the value such a conference would have in arousing the public opinion of Europe in favor of the Jews. We find, however, that the British Board of Deputies this time joined in action with the Anglo-Jewish Association, and the guess may be hazarded that the reason no international conference was held may have been due to the attitude of the British Board of Deputies, which had declined to participate in the international Jewish Conference of Dec. 11-15, 1876.

Consequently, we find that independent action was taken by the various Jewries of the wold, each making separate representations to its own government and ambassadors plenipotentiaries thereof, with a view to securing their good will and influence in favor of the Jews in these countries affected by the deliberations of the Berlin Congress.

Under date of May 31, 1878, Baron Lionel de Rothschild addressed a letter to Lord Beaconsfield on behalf of the Jews of Servia and Roumania. As is known, Lord Beaconsfield together with Lord Salisbury were the British plenipotentiaries to the Congress of Berlin. In this letter Lord Rothschild refers to the disabilities under which the Jews of Roumania labored and bespeaks the good offices of Lord Beaconsfield on their behalf at the Congress of Berlin. This letter was read at the Berlin Congress.

In addition, on Wednesday, June 12, 1878, a joint memorial of the British Board of Deputies and the Anglo-Jewish Associations, bearing the signatures of their respective presidents, Mr. J. M. Montefiere and Baron Henry de Worms, was handed in at the Foreign Office. These two bodies decided to restrict their action to memorializing the British plenipotentiaries and not to send delegates of their own to the Congress.

In Germany the leading congregations presented a memorial to Prince Bismarck on behalf of the Jews in Roumania. In Hungary the congregations of Vienna, Prague and Budapest memorialized Count Andrasey. The Jewish community of Venice memorialized the Italian Premiere, requesting him to instruct the Italian plenipotentiary, Count Corti, to raise his voice at the Congress of Berlin on behalf of the Roumanian Jews.

This action on the part of the Italian Jews was part and parcel of the action of the Alliance Israelite Universelle, which prepared a special memorial for the Berlin Congress. It is interesting to know that this memorial was printed in full in the Paris "Temps" of June 19, 1878.

In addition, the Alliance appointed a special delegation to present its memorial to the Congress. This delegation consisted of Charles Netter, Saeki Kann and Emanuel Felix Veneziani. The Vienna Alliance sent as its delegate Moritz Gudemann. These delegates paid visits to nearly all the members of the Congress and everywhere met with a most favorable reception.

On June 16, 1878, these delegates were received by Lord Odo Russel and Herr von Bulow. It seems that the latter told them they must not demand concessions, but rights.

The activities of these Jewish delegates caused considerable alarm to the Roumanian Anti-Semitic press. The delegates, however, did not allow any of their attacks to remain unanswered. It is, undoubtedly, due to these exertions on the part of the Jews on the Continent, as well as in England, that the Treaty of Berlin contains the famous Articles 5, 20, 35, 44, which guarantee eqality to all religions in Bulgaria, Montenegro, Servia and Roumania, respectively.

It is of particular interest to know that even in connection with this Congress, the question of restoring Palestine to the Jews was brought up. In Hungary, Deputy Istooyz proposed in the Diet that in connection with the eastern question the Jewish kingdom in the Holy Land should be re-established and that the boundaries in Palestine should be enlarged for this purpose. That the discussion of this question must have proceeded even further is indicated by an editorial in the "Algemeine Zeitung des Judentums," in its issue of June 11, 1878, which, of course, declares the project of re-establishing the Jewish State as absurd.

The Madrid Congress (May, 1880).

The object of this congress was to regulate the status of the Powers in Morocco. The chief question was the foreign right of protectorate of Moorish subjects. In connection with this congress, also joint action was taken by the Board of Deputies and the Anglo-Jewish Association. On May 21, 1880, a deputy from these two bodies waited on Earl Granville, Secretary for Foreign Affairs, to ask the assistance of the English government in obtaining an amelioration of the social and legal position of the Jews in Morocco. The deputation was led by Mr. Serjeant Simon, M. P., and included twenty-eight others. Mr. Simon pointed out the immense benefits accruing to the 300,000 Jews in Morocco, from the fact that 103 among them received protection. The deputation also presented to Earl Granville a memorial on the subject. The reply of the earl, however, was not favorable.

As in the case of the Berlin congress also, the Alliance Israelite Universelle sent a delegation in order to support the cause of the Jews, this time in Morocco. This delegation consisted of Charles Netter and M. E. F. Veneziavi. These two delegates were also the bearers of a memorial of the Alliance to the congress. The two deputies had interviews with many of the members of the conference, among them Senor Canovas, president of the conference, and the British Ambassador. The "Algemeine Zeitung des Judentums," which in 1878 had declared the project of restoring Palestine to the Jews as absurd, in its issue of April 27, 1880, deplores the fact that public attention will again be directed to the Jews in connection with the Madrid congress on Morocco. It considers this especially unfortunate, in view of the fact that the question to be settled concerns merely the right of protection of 103 Jews. It expressed also the well-known belief that attempts on the part of outside Jews to influence Jewish conditions in any locality is likely to do more harm than good, in view of the retaliation to which the Jews may be subjected by the other population, angered at this outside interference.

Owing, however, to these vigilant efforts on the part of the Alliance Israelite Universelle, the congress of Madrid guaranteed official protection to a certain number of communities containing resident Jews. Moreover, the congress not only made a guarantee of protection, but also demanded of the Sultan of Morocco that full religious liberty be granted to Christians and Jews.

It appears from the record above set forth that, with a few exceptions, the Jews always looked upon an international diplomatic conference as an appropriate occasion for advancing their claims to justice and equal rights. In the methods they used to bring these claims before the conference they had proper regard for the spirit of the times, and on one occasion at least—that of the Constantinople conference of 1876, they approached very closely to what might be considered an international Jewish congress. In reading the record we come across frequently the fear on the part of some Jews that collaboration on behalf of their fellow Jews with those of another country might be construed as a reflection on their patriotism to their own country. A dwindling of this fear, as time goes on, however, may be noted, and while in our own times it has not yet entirely disappeared it plays a negligible part in Jewish psychology.

Hand in hand with the dwindling of this year goes a greater and greater recognition of the power of publicity to aid the Jewish claims. Publicity is essentially a weapon of democracy. The use of this weapon is bound to have its utmost effectiveness in our own day. A democratic Jewish congress in a world rededicated to democracy should obtain the justice which the Jewish people seeks for itself and which has so long been denied it.—The Jewish Exponent.

JEWISH NATIONAL MOVEMENT

The Zionist Proposals—A New Scheme in Preparation

We are informed that the Prime Minister invited Mr. Herbert Samuel and Dr. Weizmann to breakfast with him last week, and took the opportunity of discussing the proposals which the Zionists contemplate making to the government and the Peace Conference for the purpose of putting into effect the Government Declaration in reference to the setting up of a National Home for the Jewish people in Palestine. We learn that on the suggestion of Mr. Lloyd George the scheme which had been prepared, and which Dr. Weizmann alluded to in his speech at the Great Assembly Hall on the 7th inst., is to be recast and considerably strengthened, and that Mr. Herbert Samuel has undertaken the preparation of a fresh memorandum. The representations made by Major Lionel de Rothschild on behalf of the League of British Jews, and which were sent direct to the Prime Minister, also formed, we understand, a topic of conversation.—London Jewish Chronicle.

Israel and America—A Parallel

Ry Rev. William Milton Brundage

There is a wonderful passage in the Book of Deuteronomy, the fourth chapter and the seventh verse: "For what great nation is there, that hath God so nigh unto them, as the Lord our God is whenever we call upon him?" says Rev. Brundage in The Hebrew Standard.

The great monotheistic prophets of Israel actually believed this with all their heart and soul and mind and strength. This very Book of Deuteronomy was born out of this splendid faith. The book purports to be the work of an early age, a book of Moses; in reality, as we have come to see, it is an ideal picture of that early Mosaic age by an unknown prophet of the seventeenth century B. C. It is the prophet's interpretation of the unique history of His people, God's chosen people, chosen to be "a light to the Gentile", chosen to be a blessing to all the world.

The past history of Israel had been full of remarkable characters, such as Abraham, Moses, Joshua, Samuel, David, Solomon, Elijah, and of remarkable events such as the migration of the patriarchs from the Mesopotamian valley, the bondage in Egypt, the conquest of the land of Palestine, the building up of a strong kingdom. But what was more remarkable than anything in the past was the Israel that the great prophets were seeking to create in the eighth, seventh and sixth centures B. C.

It was an ideal Israel, loyal to the God of righteousness and mercy, who required from His people not mere sacrifices and burnt offerings, not a mere religion of form and ceremonial, not an elaborate ritual of prayer and holy days, but a religion of inward holiness and righteous living, of clean hands and a pure heart. The prophets' ideal interpretation of the past was conceived for the purpose of winning the Israel of their own times from its sensuality, its idolatry, its cruel and unrighteous acts. We know now that in the main this interpretation was the creation of their own minds and hearts as one, as they believed, with the righteous God, and yet it was the most profoundly true interpretation that could be attained. This ideal interpretation had never yet been realized, but it could be realized, it would be realized.

"What doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"

"For what great nation is there, that hath God so nigh unto them as the Lord our God is whenever we call upon Him," whenever we turn away from our idolatries and begin to do justly and to love mercy and to walk humbly with God?

It is thus that we in modern America interpret the history of our own nation. As we review that history of the past three hundred years, we, too, say with the prophet of the sixth century B. C.: "For what great nation is there, that hath God so nigh unto them, as the Lord our God is whenever we call upon him?" This is our interpretation of the unique history of America, another of God's chosen people, chosen to be "a light to those who sit in darkness", chosen to be a blessing to all the peoples of the earth.

The past history of our country, too, has been full of remarkable characters, such as William Brewster, John Winthrop, George Washington, William Lloyd Garrison, Abraham Lincoln, and of remarkable events such as the great migration to these shores, the conquest of a continent, the emancipation of the slaves, the building of a great commonwealth. But vastly greater and more remarkable than what has been actually achieved up to the present hour is the American ideal that has taken possession of the minds and hearts of the prophets of the present generation, in the light of which they confidently interpret the history of the past.

It is of the potential America, the America at last reconciled to the God of righteousness and love, the America at last emancipated from the bondage of vainglory and commercial greed, the America of free men and brethren of which the prophets solemnly, reverentially declare, "For what great nation is there, that hath God so nigh unto them, as the Lord our God is whenever we call upon Him?" And this, too, is a profoundly true interpretation of what from the beginning has been hoped for, aye, intended and planned for, never yet fully realized, but to be realized, yes, to be realized.

To us modern men and women, in the light that shines about us, it is becoming more and more clearly understood what the great prophets of Israel meant when they claimed that theirs was a chosen people, a "peculiar treasure", for we are only just beginning to appreciate how notably the people of Israel actually contributed to the progress of the civilization of the world. We are beginning to see that no other single nation of the ancient world, nor all the other nations combined, contributed as much. While it is true that the Eternal God has never been at a distance, afar off, from any people, to no other people has He been "so nigh", so manifestly nigh, as unto the people of Israel, so profoundly understood, as by the people of Israel.

In a similar manner, slowly but steadily, we moderns are coming to understand what our American prophets mean when they call the people of America a "chosen people"; our history, a sacred history; our mission, a peculiar, divine mission: what Walt Whitman means in those lines from "The Song Universal":

"And, thou, America,
For the scheme's culmination, its thought and its reality,
For these not for thyself thou hast arrived,
Thou, too, surroundest all,
Embracing, carrying, welcoming all, thou, too, by pathways broad and new,
To the ideal tendest.
The measured faiths of other lands, the grandeurs of the past
Are not for thee, but grandeurs of thine own,
Deific faiths and amplitudes, absorbing, comprehending all,
All eligible for all."

It is in this ideal America, this America tending to the ideal, that America which "hath God so nigh unto it," that more and more of our people believe (and to which they are dedicating themselves), increasing numbers of our people, foreign born and native born. Mary Antin calls it "The Promised Land," and gratefully describes in what sense it was and is aware of the sins and short-comings to her to so many of her race indeed a promised land. It distresses her, and her compatriots, to gradually become of her adopted country, just as it distressed the prophets of Israel to recognize the sins and short-comings of their country, but her faith does not falter any more than did theirs.

These short-comings may be made good; these sins may be forgiven; and the glorious promise be fulfilled. To the prophet's vision the case is never quite so desperate as to the man or woman without imagination and without faith. No loyal American patriot, acquainted with his nation's peculiar history, awake to his nation's boundless opportunity, can fail to believe that the promise will be fulfilled.

Though like his Hebrew predecessor, the modern prophet may often be constrained to utter his "Woe! Woe!" against all false-speaking, and harsh-dealing, and unjust-living, against all too numerous forms of selfishness and greed and hypocritical pretension, it is never in anger, never in despair; it is never to consign the guilty to destruction. It is only that they may heed his warning, of their own accord renounce their wretched self-seeking, and devoting themselves to the public good, begin to realize the ideals for which their country stands.

The modern prophet is no superficial, feather-brained optimist, forever prophesying smooth, pleasant, agreeable things; neither, on the other hand, is he nor can he be a gloomy pessimist who has lost all faith in God and man. Even when the outlook seems darkest, even when by reason of frivolous negligence, or gross iniquity, the enemy, even as in the past, appears to be at the very gates of the city, he trusts in the future redemption of the city. "For what great nation is there, that hath God so nigh unto them, as the Lord our God is whenever we call upon Him?"

Do we actually believe this? Do we share our prophets' vision, their faith, their aspirations, of gratitude arise within us? Do our hearts break forth into paeans of praise and thanksgiving, not because we will but because we must? Is the future of our beloved country, in spite of all that threatens and even appeals, secure, assured? Do we solemnly resolve that its exalted mission among the nations of the earth shall be fulfilled, gloriously fulfilled, that there shall be transmitted to future generations a purer and freer democracy, political and industrial, than the world has thus far attained—a democracy based not upon the elaborate land defenses as upon simple truth and justice and good will?

Indeed unless we share the faith of our prophets, the faith that "Righteousness exalteth a nation", such a faith as that of Abraham Lincoln in the darkest hour of our country's history, the faith that God is indeed nigh unto us when we call upon Him, when we work together with Him, all our personal efforts must prove of little or no avail. "All things are possible to him that believeth." We must believe. No more than did the prophets of Israel, must we tie our faith to one man or one group of men, to one sect or party.

We must not be perplexed nor grieved because the end we have in view does not seem to be possible of attainment through the means we have so vigorously advocated. Because the particular party of our choice has failed us, and the men in whom we have hitherto placd our trust have proved insufficient for the task, we must not lose our faith in the presence and power of the good God. We must simply resort to other means, work with other parties along other lines, adopt new methods, enlist under other leaders.

The attainment of the desired end, the realization of the exalted ideal, is all that is supremely important. The end must and will be attained; the ideal must and will be realized. For in the birth, and history, and destiny of America, God is. "For what great nation is there that hath God so nigh unto them, as the Lord our God is whenever we call upon Him?"

Surely at this time there is no reason for serious misgiving among us; there is rather reason for great encouragement. There is ground for great encouragement even to the least optimistic in the fact that our country has a president who actually believes in the prophets' interpretation of our country's history and destiny, a man not only conspicuously qualified for his high office, from an intellectual point of view, but as well, morally qualified. President Wilson actually believes that "Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people."

THE JANUARY JEWISH FORUM

With the January issue, the Jewish Forum begins its second volume. The reception accorded the Jewish Forum by the Jewish and general press, as well as by the public, has been widely gratifying. The first bound volume will shortly be ready for use of libraries.

Among the contributors in this issue are:

Dr. Harry Friedenwald, vice-president of the Zionist organization and a leading Baltimore physician, who contributes an article entitled "Zahalon of Rome, Medieval Rabbi, Physician, Author and Moralist."

Dr. David de Sola Pool, rabbi of the Spanish and Portuguese congregation, who has written extensively on Jewish questions, writes an article entitled "Progressive Judaism."

Peter Wiernik, editor of the Jewish Morning Journal, continues his series on the cultural history of the Jews in Russia in his fifth article entitled "The Rabbinical Conference of 1843."

Rabbi B. H. Rosengard contributes an article on "Historical Judaism and Its Connotations."

Hannah Berman, an English authoress, translates the famous story of Peretz, "The Helmer Melamed."

"Mr. Greenberg and Family," a serial story of New York Jewry, by Minnie Scheff, is continued.

In the next number Rabbi Dr. Bernard Revel, head of the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary, will write on the cultural phase of reconstructing war-stricken Jewry. Jacob S. Raisin, author of the "Haskalah Movement in Russia," will write on the "Jewish Contribution to the Progress of Russia." Max J. Kohler, lawyer and historian, will write on "Educational Reforms in Europe and Their Relation to Jewish Emancipation." Rabbi Meyer Berlin, head of the Mizrahi Movement, writes on "The Duty of the Intellectuals to the Jewish People."

THE MASSACRE OF LEMBERG

The pogrom at Lemberg, which lasted three days, left twenty to thirty thousand Jews in a state of absolute poverty. Huge sums of money were extorted from well-to-do Jews by armed hooligans. The pogroms assumed the character of a regular battle in which bombs, grenades, and bayonets were employed against the Jews. The large number of houses that were burnt and the casualties which mounted to thousands, and which included women and children, testify to the fierceness of the forces of destruction.

WELFARE WORK FOR JEWISH SILDIERS

Scores of families, made destitute by a disastrous fire that swept Wrightstown, N. J., recently, were cared for by the Jewish Welfare Board of Camp Dix. The welfare workers distributed hot coffee, sandwiches and pie among the firemen and military police guarding the city and aided in securing temporary shelter for the families that were made homeless and in transporting them to the city of Trenton, nearby.

Twelve Huts Dedicated

Twelve Jewish Welfare Board huts were dedicated during the last month at demobilization camps throughout the country, it was announced today by Colonel Harry Cutler, charman of the board. Huts were erected at the following cantonments: Camp Bowie, Tex.; Chickamauga National Park, Tenn.; Camp Custer, Mich.; Camp Fremont, Cal.; Camp Funston, Kan.; Camp Grant, Ill.; Camp Johnston, Fla.; Camp Lewis, Wash; Camp Merritt, N. J.; Pelham Naval Training Station, N. Y.; Camp Pike, Ark., and Camp Travis, Tex.

Praises Jewish Soldiers

Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood, commander of the 10th Division, spoke at the dedication of the Jewish Welfare Board building at Camp Funston, Kan., recently. He spoke of the splendid service rendered by Jewish men with the naval and military forces of the United States, and said:

"When the call came for men to fight the battle for democracy, the Jews were among the first to answer the call, their service being given cheerfully and freely. Their work has been done well and they have made good soldiers. The home of the Jewish Welfare Board fills a long-felt need at Camp Funston and adds greatly to the facilities for welfare work on a wider and greater scale."

Singers and Actors Touring Camps

Two units of singers and actors are touring the demobilization camps in the East for the Jewish Welfare Board. The companies, composed of talented professional entertainers and prominent Yiddish theatrical and musical stars, will entertain men waiting to be mustered out of the army and navy, and will perform for wounded and other soldiers returning from European battlefields. This is part of a comprehensive program of recreation undertaken by the Jewish Welfare Board for men in the camps, to provide them with wholesome entertainment during the considerable leisure time at their disposal.

A group consisting of Rashel Rosenfeld, a star of the Tomashefsky Theater; Harry Rosenfeld, comedian; Leon Rosenstein, singer of Yiddish folk songs; Alexander Tannenholz, reader, and member of the cast of the Irving Place Theater; Abraham Raizin, poet; B. Kovner, humorist; Jean Paurel, pianist, and Anna Miltzer, soprano soloist, are already on tour. They will visit Camps Upton, Dix, Devens, Meade, Humphreys, Wadsworth and Spartansburg and Newport News Naval Training Station and the posts around Baltimore.

The second unit will tour Camps Jackson, Wadsworth, Sevier, Gordon, Hancock, McClellan, Sheridan and Beauregard, Chickamauga National Park. The members of the company are Miss Zelda Santley, vaudeville singer; Rose Erlich, concertinist; Gertrude Wolf, interpretive and folk dancer; Sadie Cheifitz, pianist, and Rose Dreeben, soprano soloist. All of the performers have successfully appeared at cantonments around New York City.

DEBATE ON JEWS IN THE MUNICIPALITY OF POSEN

Owing to a strong attack on Jews by Councillor Levandowsky, delivered in the Municipality of Posen, a debate took place on the Jewish problem. The Councillor complained that the Jews had the administration of Posen in their hands, together with all contracts. The Jewish profiteers, he remarked, became rich, and they were anxious to escape to Jerusalem or Berlin. The Jewish representative, Councillor Jaffe, protested against the libels, and the mayor censured Councillor Levandowsky for introducing hatred towards a certain section of citizens at a time of a great crisis. The mayor added that he could point to many services rendered by the Jews to Posen in developing the resources of the province, but he saw nothing harmful in their activities.

WILL PROTECT JEWS

The Wiener Morgenzeitung prints a telegram from Premyzyl according to which a Jewish People's Council, national guard and Jewish soldiers' council have been formed there. The three organizations work together and will actively oppose any attempt of outbreak against the Jews.

RESOLUTION BY CLEVELAND LODGE NO. 16, I. O. B. B.

IN MEMORIAM.

Emile L. Strauss.

"Who shall ascend the hill of the Lord and who shall stand in his holy place?

"He that hath clean hands and a pure heart, who hath not inclined his soul unto falsehood nor sworn deceitfully; he shall receive the blessing of the Lord and favor from the God of his salvation."

Thus spoke the prophet of old, and the soul of Emile L. Strauss has answered the challenge and stands in the holy place of the Lord.

Exalted in service, pure in heart, noble in purpose, he made for himself "fairy places of pleasant thoughts, proof against all adversity, bright fancies, satisfied memories, treasure-houses built without hands."

"Ideals are like stars; you will not succeed in touching them with your hands, but like the sea-fearing man on the desert of waters, you choose them as your guides and, following them, you reach your destiny."

And so to him came destiny, a virile Jewish consciousness, a militant faith, intolerant of bigotry, scattering along life's highways the broken images of superstition and unrighteousness.

And dying "where manhood's morning touches dawn, while the shadows were still falling toward the west," of him it may be said:

"For Justice, all place, a temple, all season, summer."

Patient, gentle, true, he has set the mark of his immortal spirit upon the community which reveres him as an exemplar of devotion, of love sublime, of faith, of sacrifice.

"He's true to God who's true to man.
Wherever wrong is done—
To the Humblest and the Lowest 'neath the all-beholding sun—
That wrong is also done to us and they are slaves most base
Whose love of right is for themselves
And not for all their race."

Carry on, noble spirit, carry on—may the inspiration of your life and your being quicken the human impulse to a just appreciation of the tasks you left unfinished as our noble heritage, and may the sweet memory of your gentle, loving soul radiate the mellow influence of your character unto the "dawn of the perfect day."

"How living are the dead
Enshrined but not apart.
How safe within the heart we hold them still,
Our dead, whatever else be fled.
The midnight moments keep a place for them.
Though we wake to weep, they are beside us.
In joy, in pain, in every crucial hour,
They come again, angelic from above,
Bearing the gifts of blessing and of love,
Until the path they lonely trod,
Becomes for us a bridge,
Which upward leads to God."

Be it resolved, that this memorial shall be entered upon the records of Cleveland Lodge No. 16, Independent Order B'nai B'rith, and that a copy, duly engraved, shall be transmitted to the family of our brother, Emile L. Strauss.

The meeting was well attended and was addressed by the president of the District, Bro. Maurice P. Davidson, Bro. Dr. Nathan Krass, Bro. Congressman Isaac Siegel, Bro. Dr. Nathan Stern and Ensign M. TOLEDO LODGE, TOLEDO, OHIO.

By M. Elgutter.

On Sunday evening, Jan. 5, Toledo Lodge, No. 183, B'nai B'rith, had what is generally admitted to be the most successful annual dinner, class initiation and installation of officers in the history of the local Lodge.

The affair was held in the auditorium of the LaSalle & Koch building. Two hundred and fifty men were present, including a delegation from Pisgah Lodge, Detroit, Mich., visiting officers from the District Grand Lodge, and a number of other guests from sister Lodges.

The degree team of Toledo Lodge installed a class of twenty-two new members in a most impressive manner, after which the new officers for the ensuing year were officially installed by Joseph Seligman, president of District Grand Lodge No. 2.

A letter was read from I. M. Rosenthal, the first president of Toledo Lodge, expressing his regret at being unable to be present, due to illness in his family, and extending beautifully expressed wishes for the coming year.

Following the ceremonies, members, initiates and guests proceeded to the dining room, where a splendid dinner was served.

At the speaking which followed, L. M. Frank of Toledo Lodge, acted as Toastmaster.

The first speaker called upon was the newly installed President of Toledo Lodge, Morris Newman, who spoke with pride of the splendid growth made by the Lodge during the past year, and called upon the members and the newly installed officers for their enthusiastic support in making 1919 an even greater year.

The next speaker was Rabbi Samuel Meyerberg of Detroit who, in the course of his remarks, declared the B'nai B'rith Order second only to the synagogue in importance in Jewish life.

In a talk replete with a rapid fire of humor, scholarly quotations from the Hebrew and a fervid appeal to members to stand for the high precepts of the Order, Sydney G. Kusworm of Dayton, Ohio, Vice-President of District Grand Lodge No. 2, spoke on Propaganda Work.

Replacing Adolph Freund, of Detroit, who was to speak for District Grand Lodge No. 6, but who was unable to attend because of illness, Milton Alexander, also of Pisgah Lodge, Detroit, spoke briefly on the renewed enthusiasm he would carry home with him, as a result of the meeting. He also proposed a toast in honor of his reverend brother member whom he replaced.

The concluding speaker was the President of the district, Jos. Seligman, of Louisville, Ky., who emphasized especially the part the B'nai B'rith has played in the great war just concluded, and the Order's work, yet to be done, in helping the Jew achieve his rightful place in all nations.

M. G. Bloch, one of the newly initiated members, spoke for the class of 1919. He declared that the precepts set before him in the initiatory work, had become deeply engraved in his mind. He also paid a high tribute to Dr. Julius Jacobson, whose death a few weeks ago robbed Toledo Lodge of one of its most brilliant members, and one who had achieved wide fame as toastmaster at the annual dinners.

Singing of patriotic and popular songs during the dinner and interspersing the speeches was a feature of the program.

B., on January 8, 1919, at the B'nai B'rith building. Mr. Philmore J. Haber, president of the lodge, presided. Rabbi A. H. Silver of The Temple and Dr. Daniel Huebsch made eulogistic and eloquent addresses. The Kaddish was recited by Rabbi Silver. Charles J. Haase, Past President of District Grand Lodge No. 7, made a most pleasing address touching upon many subjects of vital importance.

Minnesota Lodge, No. 157, of St. Paul, Minn., held its annual B'nai B'rith Day "Get Together" banquet on Tuesday evening, Dec. 10, 1918, at Athletic Club.

The affair was one of the most successful ever held by the lodge, the spirit of Victory and Peace, with a thankful feeling for same, which predominated throughout the crowd of over one hundred fifty members, wives and friends, seeming to be the principal motive for the splendid success. The leaders of the Orpheum Concert Orchestra furnished music during the meal which was followed by a program of speakers, interspersed by vocal selections by eleven year old Lillian Litman, and piano selections by Miss Nettie Greenberg, both of whom have already attained much success as artistic musical entertainers, Rabbi Eugene Mannheimer of Des Moines, vice-president of District Grand Lodge No. 6, delivered a splendid address on B'nai B'rith, Peace and Victory Day, enunciating the necessity of standing steadfast behind President Wilson, and the need for further intensifying ourselves for the reconstruction work which of necessity will take years to complete, before it can actually be said that the war is over. Upon his arrival, President Frankel spent the forenoon in discussing the work of the Lodge and the Order with a number of prominent members of the Lodge, and in the afternoon attended a very fine meeting. The attendance was not as large as the president expected, and this was for the reason that more than one-half of its members are serving the United States Government in various capacities. President Frankel found the Lodge active and fully alive to the problems of the Order, which he discussed with them with a clear insight into Jewish conditions, and the meeting as a whole was most interesting and profitable to all those who attended. A class of six candidates was initiated.

In the evening President Frankel addressed a public meeting which was well attended and enthusiastic, and after the installation of officers and the address delivered by him, dancing was indulged in by over one hundred couples.

NEWPORT NEWS LODGE, NEWPORT NEWS, VA.

By M. Speier.

A very enthusiastic meeting of Newport News Lodge No. 783 was held on Dec. 29. The meeting was fairly well attended, and a good deal of business transacted. Morewitz and Sam Mirmelstein, was appointed to represent our local Lodge in the J. W. B. Since our city is one of the most important ports of debarkation, it is expected that the members of Newport News Lodge No. 783 will be kept quite busy entertaining our returning brave boys in uniform, and bringing cheer to the wounded ones among them.

Bro. H. A. Morewitz volunteered to assist Bro. Secretary Rabbi M. Speier in some of his work so that Bro. Speier will be able to devote ample time to visiting the various camps and hospitals. Bro. The purpose of the affair was to raise funds for the social service committee of the Lodge, which has been actively engaged in providing recreation for blind children and in developing the commercial field for the adult blind. Copies of the annual report of the committee showing in detail the splendid work done for the blind kiddies and the important experiments conducted among the adult blind, as a result of which the wages of individual blind workers had been raised from an average of $4 to an average of $8.50 per week, were distributed among the members and their friends and resulted in the immediate receipt by Herbert T. Rosenfeld, Chairman of the social service committee, of several substantial voluntary contributions to the social service fund.

The occasion marked the close of the term of office of President Clarence G. Bachrach, who has held the presidency of the society for two years. The arrangements were in charge of Eugene H. Levy, Jr., the newly elected President, at present Chairman of the Entertainment Committee.

BARNETT LODGE, FORREST CITY, ARK.

Under the auspices of Barnett Lodge No. 754 of Forrest City, Ark., a mass-meeting was held recently in the Methodist Church for the benefit of the Jewish War Sufferers. The affair proved a success in every particular.

The addresses of W. H. Brough, governor of Arkansas, and Rabbi William H. Finescriber of Memphis, Tenn., were masterpieces of logic and eloquence, and held the undivided attention of a large audience. Non-Jews contributed generously to the cause. L. Barnett, secretary to the Lodge, presided, and in the appeal made for funds in behalf of the Jewish War Sufferers, nearly $1,100 was raised. This is a splendid showing for a town the size of Forrest City, and the Jewish people feel grateful to their generous response to the appeal made.

NEWPORT NEWS LODGE.

By M. Speier.

Newport News, Va.

Due to the general conditions of the times, and, in particular, due to the fact that Newport News, Va., is one of the most important ports of embarkation of the United States, Jew and non-Jew alike were unusually occupied during the outgoing year. It was, therefore, natural that the monthly meetings of our local B'nai B'rith Lodge were, more or less, neglected. Nevertheless, our Lodge has not failed to take active interest in all affairs whenever an opportunity presented itself. Special interest was manifested in the N. N. Branch of the Jewish Welfare Board: whenever boys in uniform entered a brother's home, they were welcomed in the real B'nai B'rith spirit. In this manner, and in several other ways, the Lodge has contributed its share toward the cause of Democracy.

Several members of our Lodge are in the active service of the U. S. Army. Bro. Stanley Garner, whose father, Bro. Wm. Garner, is also a most devoted Ben B'rith, has been in France practically since the very beginning of the war, and has been serving our country with a devotion and zeal that reflects naught about his life in order to serve brother nor his dear ones at home felt distressed about it. Bro. Garner cared naught about his life in order to serve our glorious country to the very best of his ability. Thank God, our brother is cured, and returned at once "to the front" again.

Bro. Harry Reyner, P. P., a Captain in the R. M. C., is said to be indispensable, since his knowledge and experience along business lines are unique. Newport News Lodge is proud of their brother, Captain Reyner. He, as well as his parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. Reyner, deserve congratulations, and so do we ourselves, for having furnished such able and conscientious men to aid our sacred cause.

Bro. and Mrs. Sol Peyser have done their full share, too; they have succeeded in raising two sons of whom every Jew may be proud. The excellent intellectual and moral qualities of his boy, Theo. Peyser, were soon appreciated by the U. S. Army. He is a first lieutenant "somewhere in France," and a well-liked company commander. Philip Peyser, at present in an officers' training school, also justifies the highest expectations.

These are but a few examples of Newport News Lodge No. 783 that illustrate its fine sense of patriotism, and the excellent influence exercised by B'nai B'rith parents on their children.

DJEMAL PASHA'S REGIME

That the reports emanating from Pro-Ally sources of Djemal Pasha's hostility to the Jews are not exaggerated is proved by the following passage from the Deutscher Livantz Zeitung:

"It cannot be denied that many measures of the Djemal Pasha regime have created an intense bitterness among the Syrians and also among the Jews of Palestine, and have thus given rise to many incidents which might have been avoided by a milder and more considerate attitude".

LETTER FROM CORP. I. H. HUROWITZ,

Member of Horeb Lodge No. 25, of New Haven, Conn., Who Is with the American Expeditionary Forces in France, to President of District No. 1, I. O. B. B., Maurice P. Davidson.

My Dear Brother Davidson:

Each time I receive a leter from you I, too, feel highly elated. Although Jerry was sending his shells all around me last night, I gave them little thought, for I was too much interested in your most welcome epistle.

Jerry has got us on the run, and we're running like old Harry, but we're chasing Fritz, you see, on toward the Rhine. We have been very busy lately, and no doubt you've read of the splendid successes which we are meeting with.

The weather here is very bad now—rain, rain, rain all the time, and the mud is thick and glue-like. If Sherman were alive now he'd surely find a far more impressive word as a simile for war. Even now it is raining in torrents, and the day is dreary and miserable. Did you hear that song. "Somewhere in France There's a Lily"? Well, in my opinion, the words ought to go something like this: "Somewhere in France it is chilly, and it is cold and wet; when we hike o'er its lands, oh, so hilly, it gets our goat, you bet", etc. But the boys are withstanding the ordeal most nobly, and I hope that it will soon be over, with the flags of the Allied Powers flying over the Kaiser's palace.

It pleases me to note that you enjoy my letters, and I can assure you that they'd be far more interesting if the censor would permit it. Now that the new draft age has been ratified and passed, I believe that most of our lodges will be depleted of membership. But not for long, I hope.

It delighted me to know that you are well and that all my brethren feel nicely, too.

May the New Year be full of prosperity and happiness for all of you.

Here are a few verses which were prompted by certain circumstances, etc.

MY PAL.

I.

Good-by, old pal, for you this gruesome war,
Isidore, for you, dear chum, at last 'tis o'er;
You've fought with might and main, you gave your life
That Kaiserism might be quelled, you've stormed the strife
With smile upon your face, with ne'er a growl,
You put your shoulder to the wheel and gave your all.

II.

Remember how we used to sit, 'midst flickering lights
Of candles, muse away the weary nights
With dreams and thoughts of those across the sea,
Who pray and wait for us so anxiously;
And how we yearned to be with them once more,
To live, enjoy—like in the days of yore?

III.

Remember how, 'midst drizzling rain, in mud
Knee deep, we stood and dodged the roaring thud
Of Jerry's shells, and how we used to josh
Each time we ducked in time, and fooled the "Boche",
And how we read each other's mail—compared
Our sweetheart's notes, our loved ones "over there"?

IV.

Remember how we hiked o'er hill and dale,
And though our feet were swelled, still ne'er a wail,
And though we've slept in open field and wood,
We laughed it off, and said fresh air was good?
Remember when we often made our homes
In barns, on dirt—our pillows oft were stones?

V.

And now you've left me, my belovevd pard;
My heart is filled with grief, to part is hard.
You've joined the angels up above—tonight on high
A bright new star will gleam up in the sky.
Farewell, I leave thy lonely grave till then,
When in the great beyond we'll meet again.

I sincerely trust and hope that you'll always keep well, and I beg that you convey my best wishes to all.

WHAT IS A JEW?

What is a Jew? This question is not at all so odd as it seems. Let us see what kind of peculiar creature the Jew is, which all the rulers and all nations have together and separately abused and molested, oppressed and persecuted, burned and hanged—and in spite of all this is yet alive! What is a Jew, who has never allowed himself to be led astray by all the earthly possessions which his oppressors and persecutors constantly offered him in order that he should change his faith and forsake his own Jewish religion?

"The Jew is that sacred being who has brought down from heaven the everlasting fire, and has illumined with it the entire world. He is the religious source, spring, and fountain out of which all the rest of the peoples have drawn their beliefs and their religions.

"The Jew is the pioneer of liberty. Even in those olden days, when the people were divided into but two distinct classes, slaves and masters—even so long ago had the law of Moses prohibited the practice of keeping a person in bondage for more than six years.

"The Jew is the pioneer of civilization. Ignorance was condemned in olden Palestine more even than it is today in civilized Europe. Moreover, in those wild and barbarous days, when neither life nor the death of anyone counted for anything at all, Rabbi Akiba did not refrain from expressing himself openly against capital punishment, a practice which is recognized today as a highly civilized way of punishment.

"The Jew is the emblem of civil and religious toleration. 'Love the stranger and the sojourner,' Moses commands, 'because you have been strangers in the land of Egypt.' And this was said in those remote and savage times when the principal ambition of the races and nations consisted in crushing and enslaving one another. As concerns a religious toleration, the Jewish faith is not only far from the missionary spirit of converting people of other denominations, but, on the contrary, the Talmud commands the rabbis to inform. and explain to every one who willingly comes to accept the Jewish religion all the difficulties involved in its acceptance, and to point out to the would-be proselyte that the righteous of all nations have a share in immortality. Of such a lofty and ideal religious toleration not even the moralists of our present day can boast.

"The Jew is the emblem of eternity. He whom neither slaughter nor torture of thousands of years could destroy, he whom neither fire nor sword nor inquisition was able to wipe off from the face of the earth, he who was the first to produce the oracles of God, he who has been for so long the guardian of prophecy, and who transmitted it to the rest of the world—such a nation cannot be destroyed. He is everlasting as is eternity itself."

JEWS IN LITHUANIAN GOVERNMENT.

Jewish participation in the Lithuanian government has been arranged announcing that the government accepted all of the conditions formulated by the Lithuanian Jewish parties and the Zionist Conference. The following Jews have entered the government: Advocate Rosenbaum as Under State Secretary of Foreign Affairs; Dr. Rachmilliewicz as Under State Secretary of Trade and Industry, and Dr. Wygonski as State Minister for the Department of Jewish Affairs.

A banquet tendered in honor of the new Bishop of Lithuania is described as being an impressive demonstration for equal rights for all nationalities in Lithuania.

WARSAW JEWS CLAIM REPRESENTATION IN THE MINISTRY

Responsible Jewish circles in Warsaw have resolved to demand that the government should appoint a Jewish assistant minister of education to take charge of Jewish religious and educational affairs, and to attend cabinet meetings in the Jewish interests.

GOD'S TREE.

Written by Sidney G. Kusworm of Dayton, Ohio, First Vice-President District No. 2, I. O. B. B., in honor of the Diamond Jubilee of the Order:

Threescore and fifteen years ago
God sent His angel to earth below,
And bid him travel far and wide,
In city, hamlet and country side.

His object was to have him see
Why brethren dwelt not in harmony;
Why benevolence and brotherly love
Existed not, as in Heaven above.

So he came quietly and unannounced;
First, upon God's Jews he pounced,
And found there the sick and lame,
Widows and orphans weak of frame.

These people knew not where to turn,
To ease their plight all did yearn;
They knew not which way they should go,
Earth's sad waves rocked them to and fro.
God heard His angel's sad report,
And to him He made this retort:
"I'll plant a seed and help it grow,
So from it great philanthropies glow."

The seed was sown in fertile soil,
Hearts with thoughts of love did boil;
There grew an oak of sturdy form—
'Twas thus the B'NAI B'RITH was born.
God watched his tree and gave it power;
Over great obstacles it did tower;
Its branches spread o'er earth's domain,
Its leaves with tenderness did burn.

Caught to its branches were hearts of gold—
They yearned to live within its fold—
They helped their fellowmen to right;
From it there shown God's brightest light.
The B'NAI B'RITH is Heaven's tree;
BENEVOLENCE, BROTHERLY LOVE and HARMONY
Are waters that are poured all 'round
To lessen sorrow's wail and sound.

The sick, the weak, the frail are fed,
The orphan finds soft, downy bed;
And those who fall along the way
Are carefully uplifted day by day.

Oh, may this tree, Divinely grown,
From which true love has brightly shown,
Continue in its growth and life,
To lessen sorrow, tears and strife.

SCHOOLS AND INDUSTRIES.

Seventeen cities and eight states were represented at a conference of superintendents, principals and interested agencies called by Dr. P. P. Claxton at the offices of the Bureau of Education of the Department of the Interior, in New York, 29 West 39th Street, to discuss the problem offered by the labor shortage and the demand for children of school age to solve it; and as to how the schools and industry can best co-operate in conserving the educational interests of the boys and girls. Since many of these are foreign-born or of foreign-stock, the implications in the propositions discussed at the conference were of particular interest to Americanization and racial workers.

The conference was unanimous in favoring modifications of the part time plan for children 14 to 18 years of age mentally and physically qualified to work and study. These modifications embrace half-day attendance, the duplicate school plan; classes in industrial plants; the continuation school plan, and all-year schools, work-days and school-days, or work-weeks and school-weeks alternating. A motion was also adopted by the conference calling upon legislators everywhere throughout the nation to pass compulsory pastime attendance laws for children of the prescribed ages.

Mr. M. E. Siegel, assistant superintendent in charge of evening schools and continuation classes of New York City, said that the experiment of work-and-study, study-and-work, is being tried here on 600 boys and girls, evenly divided. The discussion developed the fact that it is also being tried in many other localities. Supt. D. B. Corson, Newark, N. J., said that the all-year school plan, in his opinion, was especially valuable in foreign neighborhoods, but did not think it would work out as well in purely American localities. This plan, as it works in Newark, gives pupils and teachers a two weeks' rest in August, but aside from this consumes the rest of the year, on a half-time basis. Many foreign-born or foreign-stock pupils are enabled by it to complete their high-school education where otherwise they could not. He added that the schools were better attended in the summer than in the winter.

CENTRAL CONFERENCE OF AMERICAN RABBIS.

The twenty-eighth volume of the year books of the Central Conference of American Rabbis has just appeared and is being distributed. It contains the account of the business transacted at the Chicago convention and the papers there presented. The closing year of the war was one of increased activity for the Conference. Not only did it co-operate actively with the Welfare Board in looking after the religious needs of the men in service, but all its activities were carried on with even greater earnestness. The report of the Committee on Relief should have the attention of every friend of the Conference. Through the kindness of a few friends and of an increasing number of congregations, the Conference has been enabled to meet the increasing task of caring for deserving colleagues who through old age or illness are no longer able to care for themselves. Last year five colleagues or their widows and orphans were on the list. Two more have since been added, making the outlay greater than the income. It is to be hoped that there will be a goodly reply to help the conference in this emergency. But this will only be a temporary relief. The hope is that the Synagogue Pension Fund, fathered by the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, will now become a fact, taking from the Conference the burden of caring for the members who are no longer able to serve and support themselves. A beginning has been made through the generosity of that benefactor in Israel, Mr. Jacob Schiff, who by his gift of $100,000 started this fund with the hope that it will grow to be of sufficient size to take care of the aged rabbis in Israel.

The Publications Committee report notes the appearance of the revised Volume I of the Union Prayer Book, which has been anxiously awaited by the congregations.

Perhaps the most interesting report is that of the Committee on Model Constitution for Congregations, in which a constitution containing all the newer ideas for congregational management is included.

A most interesting report of the Committee on Responsa answers from the rabbinical and traditional standpoint such questions as, "Must the Jewish soldier eat Kosher food while in active service?" "Is it wrong for the Orthodox Jew to remove his hat while the national anthem is being sung?" "Shall a rabbi officiate at the funeral of a Christian Scientist?"

The Appendix contains in addition to the President's message and the Conference Sermon and Lecture two unusually interesting papers—one on Isaac Leeser, by Rabbi Henry Englander, and the other on the Hamburg Prayer Book, by Rabbi Joseph Rauch. The volume was edited by Rabbi Isaac E. Marcuson.

LONDON TIMES ON POLISH POGROMS.

The London Times, commenting upon the massacres of Jews in various parts of Poland, states that it is established beyond doubt that these atrocious outrages have been committed. After pointing out that nothing is more likely to prejudice the Polish cause in the eyes of the civilized world than any attempt at systematic violence against the Jews, the London Times proceeds to discuss the question of the Jewish problem in general, and that of the Polish Jews in particular, which it states "will remain to tax the wisdom of Allied statesmen. But," the Times adds, "there must be justice for the Jews—impartial justice based on knowledge of their needs."

the revolution. We understand it in the light of present movements. Reaction was successful because it was backed by popular sentiment. In the city of Krems, from which Jews had been excluded for four centuries, a few Jews had taken up residence. The infuriated citizens mobbed them when they held Yom Kippur services, and they had to spend the chilly night of Oct. 6 in the open air. In December, 1848, Isaac M. Wise, a native of Austria, published his call for a union of American Israel.

Dr. Max Nordau has been elected corresponding member of the Academy of Medicine at Madrid. Professor Richard Gottheil, of New York, and Senor Ignace Bauer, of Madrid, an earnest Jew who has made valuable researches into the Jewish antiquities, have been elected corresponding members of the Academy of History, also at Madrid.

THE NATIONAL FARM SCHOOL.

Free Farming Course Opens in March.

The National Farm School, located in Bucks County, Pa., and established in 1886, is now preparing for the enrollment of its twenty-third class of students for the term beginning March, 1919.

The National Farm School gives a three-years' course of instruction in the practice and science of agriculture to such young men who desire to make farming their life's work, a calling which presents a splendid field of opportunity to ambitious young men, and in which they can render a great patriotic service to their country by fitting themselves to become leaders in what is today considered America's greatest and necessary industry—the raising of food to feed the nation.

Tuition, books, board, lodging and other necessities are furnished free of charge to all students, irrespective of creed.

Applicants for admission must be between the age of 16 and 21 years; must be graduates of grammar schools; and must be of good physical, mental and moral health.

As there are always many more applicants than the school can accommodate, and as all applications are considered in the order in which they are received such as desire to avail themselves of the opportunity offered by The National Farm School and wish to enroll the new term should lose no time in applying, either in person or in writing, for admission blanks , to the office of the National Farm School, 407 Mutual Life Bldg., Philadelphia, Pa.

DEMANDS CESSATION OF MASSACRES

Congressman H. I. Emerson of Cleveland has introduced a resolution in Congress expressing the sentiment of Congress that our peace commissioners see that the peace treaty provides for the safety of Jews in all countries. The resolution follows:

"Be it resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

1st—That our peace commissioners insist as a part of the peace treaty that the lives and property of Jews be made secure in all countries of the world. 2d—That said peace commissioners insist that the outrages against Jews in all countries be discontinued."

ITALIAN JEWS' GIFT TO WILSON.

Illuminated Address on Parchment Tablets Presented by Zionists of Rome to President.

When President Wilson visited Rome recently he received an unique gift from a deputation of Italian Zionists. The gift, which the Zionists of Italy hope will be deemed worthy of a place of honor in the Blue Room of the White House, was an address, designed in most artistic fashion, and inscribed on illuminated parchment, modeled after the tablets of the Ten Commandments, one column in English, the other in Hebrew. The text of the address was forwarded to Justice Brandeis by the late David Lubin, director of the International Agricultural Institute, shortly before he died, and which he helped to draft.

ISRAEL AND THE NATIONS

"The Jew has made a marvelous fight in this world, in all the ages; and has done it with his hands tied behind him. The Egyptian, the Babylonian, and the Persian rose filled the planet with sound and spendor, then faded to dream-stuff and passed away; the Greek and the Roman followed, and made a vast noise, and they are gone; other peoples have sprung up and held their torch high for a time, but it burned out, and they sit in twilight now, or have vanished. The Jew saw them all, beat them all, and is now what he always was, exhibiting no decadence, no infirmities of age, no weakening of his parts, no slowing of his energies, no dulling of his alert and aggressive mind."—Mark Twain, 1898.

JAPAN ENDORSES JEWISH HOMELAND.

The Jewish Daily News of New York has a special cable from its London correspondent that the government of Japan has authorized its English ambassador to announce its approval of the project for the establishment in Palestine of a Jewish national homeland in accord with the principles enunciated in the Balfour Declaration of Nov. 2, 1917.

The Jewish Morning Journal has a special cablegram from its Paris correspondent stating that at the presentation to Dr. Wise of the Legion of Honor the French government promised to exercise all of its power in support of the Jewish aspirations in Palestine, and also of the demand made by the American Jewish Congress for equal rights for all lands.

THE DIASPORA

Monthly Review of Events in the Jewish World

By Gotthard Deutsch

THE STORM CENTER

In the middle of the seventeenth century the Polish kingdom was shaken by the first internal strife which a century and a quarter afterwards led to its dismemberment. The two main factions, Poles and Ukrainians, divided by both racial and religious differences, grappled in a death struggle. The historic instincts of the Jewish people, then lulled by the predominent forces of legalism and mysticism, were undeveloped. Yet a few writers in crude style left to posterity some records of the horrors suffered by the innocent victims of this civil war, and some congregations recorded the names of the martyrs in their "Memor-books" to be recited on the holydays during the memorial services. May we hope that with our well-trained sense of history, with better facilities for the gathering of the material and with the larger means at our disposal in countries enjoying peace and prosperity, the memories of the tragedies consequent upon the World's War will be accurately and systematically preserved as a duty of the Jewish people to its martyrs and as a lesson to posterity.

The reports of pogroms which reach us almost daily have to be authenticated. We find in them well-known names like Przemysl, Berdychev, Chrzanow, Tarnow, etc., and many others, mutilated in transmission, like Lussi (Lutcza), Remeluct (Remenow or Rymanow ?), but always the same story of murder, loot, desecration of synagogs, extortion and other outrages. In Chrzanow the military commander, implored by the Jews to render them protection, demanded 100,000 crowns and 100 suits of clothes. In Ustrzvki the commander demanded outright 300,000 crowns under the threat of blowing up all Jewish houses with dynamite, and in Wisnicz the commanding officer seized the opportunity, when asked to intercede in an internal Jewish affair, to order the flogging of 130 people, among whom were boys of 12 and old men of 72, after previously amusing himself by frightening the community with the order to shoot every tenth person. In Jaworzno the nine Jewish members of the city council were forced to resign, in Tarnow people were beaten for talking Yiddish, in Lemberg the Jewish periodical Nowodziennik was suspended, and in Lublin Jewish schools and libraries were closed.

KRAPULINSKI AND WASCHLAPSKI.

Who does not remember Heine's splendid satire of "Krapulinski and Waschlapski, Polen aus der Polackei" who would not allow that the other fellow should pay for him, and therefore, to make it sure, neither of them would pay his bill. The various factions of the resuscitated Polish nation are still acting on the same principle in the Jewish question. The Catholic episcopate issued an appeal, urging the people to preserve the Polish national character by the proclamation of Roman Catholicism as the state's religion, and warning against separation of state and church as a program of socialists, radicals and Jews. Moraczewski, the Polish minister, declares he is first Pole and then socialist. Therefore he must oppose group rights for the Jews. Pilsudski, the commander in chief, declares that he is for absolute equality of the Jews. A London cable, dated Jan. 12, which reports this announcement, adds that Pilsudski, and not Paderewski, will be recognized as the legitimate representative of the Polish nations by the Paris Congress. Meantime we have received official proof to the contrary. Paderewski and Dmowski, the latter well known as antisemitic member of the Russian Duma and in pre-war times a henchman of the czar's government, were appointed delegates to the Peace Congress, and an Associated Press dispatch, dated Jan. 29, gave us a message of the American secretary of state, Mr. Lansing, in which Paderewski was congratulated on the achievement of Poland's liberation with the expression of sympathy for the Polish aspirations. His recognition is therefore well assured. The message did not contain any allusion to the situation of the Jews which has been so often and so impressively brought to the attention of the department of state and which, involving the future of 3 to 4 millions, representing about 16 per cent of the population of the prospective state, ought to be a matter of some concern to the Allies, who must wish to see peace established between the various sections of the population in the newly formed independent countries. The most important testimony on the gravity of the Jewish situation in Poland is furnished by the socialist paper, Robotnik (Laborer), of Warsaw, which published a letter from the conservative Bobrianski, who, being an eyewitness to the atrocities perpetrated in Lemberg, estimates the number of victims as 3,000, of whom 60 were burned in a synagog, 260 in their homes, the pogrom lasting from Friday, Nov. 22, to the following Monday. Bobreianski sent his letter first to other papers, but none except the socialist organ would publish it.

POLONAIS SANS PATRIE.

When, at the time of the rivalry between Russia and France during the Crimean war and for two decades afterwards, public sentiment in France was overflowing with sympathy for the Polish victims of Russian despotism, the Poles were the pets of French society. This condition, dormant while France saw in Russia her ally in a war for "Revanche," and wildly acclaimed Nicholas with wife and baby on his visit to Paris, is very strong again. It manifested itself clearly at the expense of the Jews in a reply given by M. Pichon, minister of foreign affairs, to an interpellation by M. Ernest Lafont who brought proofs that the Polish Legion, formed of volunteers and commanded by two French generals, refused to accept Jews among whom were some who had come from South America to render service to their native country. M. Lafont even stated that general Archinard, who had organized the two divisions formed from these volunteers, had protested against such discrimination in an army fighting under the French tricolore, but the above named Pan Dmowski replied: "en Pologne cela se passe ainsi." The reply of M. Pichon was actually comical. He said these refusals were not due to the fact that the volunteers were Jews, but to their being pro-German. The only answer to such perversion of facts was that given by M. Cachin, a member of the chamber of deputies, in the words: "c'est grotesque." The attitude of M. Pichon has an exact counterpart in the article of M. Stephane Lauzanne, given wide publicity in the Jewish press of this country, which maintains that the Dreyfus affair had nothing to do with antisemitism. This again is on the same level with the reply given by the German minister, von Heeringen, in the Reichstag on March 17, 1910, when he declared that there was no obstacle in the way of a Jew who desires to become an officer in the army, and that it was merely accidental when for 27 years not a single Jew had obtained a commission even in the reserve corps. It is really astonishing how some people count on a poor memory of their readers. There are some of M. Lauzanne's readers who do remember the series of articles, signed "de Lamazae," which, beginning May 23, 1892, in "La Libre Parole" attacked the Jewish officers in the French army as a menace to France's safety, and remember how the Jewish captain, Armand Mayer, was killed in a duel with Marquis de Mores, June 24, 1892, and how after two years of antisemitic agitation a "real" traitor had to be apprehended in Captain Dreyfus when all indications pointed to his innocence and to the guilt of Eszterhazy, and how the Paris mobs howled "mort aux juifs" when Zola raised his voice to vindicate the innocent man. M. Lauzanne is a worthy nephew of M. Adolphe de Blowitz, misnamed for "Bluffitz," who had the effrontery to write in his memoirs that he was born in the chateau (read: ghetto) of Blowitz as the son of the chevalier Kasper de Blowitz and baptized on the day following his birth, and that his father was hunting (read: peddling in the country) on the day of his birth, and other romances of the same character, published while any number of people were still living who had gone to school with him and a sister was living as a Jewess in Vienna. There are daily experiences which are very discouraging to a teacher of history.

VOICES IN THE POLISH WILDERNESS AND THEIR ECHOS.

At a Polish Day celebration held in New York, Jan. 26, resolutions were passed, demanding a reconstitution of Poland as it existed in the seventeenth century with Silesia, the seaport of Gdansk (Danzig), the Ukraine, and, of course, Posnania (Posen). No word was said about the Jews and religious liberty, but vice-president Marshall and Mr. McCormick, senator elect of Illinois, complimented the liberty loving Poles and wished them success. On a more private occasion Father Urbin of Perth Amboy, N. J., developed his plans for an effective boycott of the Jews who had brought unfounded charges of pogroms against the liberty loving people. He was seconded by Rev. Charles E. Eaton, at one time Rockefeller's pastor, who denounced in his sermon on the same day the Russian Jews as America's greatest peril compared with which Prussianism is a Sunday school picnic. An obscure monthly, "The Anti-Bolshevist," published in Brooklyn, is exclusively devoted to antisemitic propaganda, declaring that all Jews are Bolsheviks. The nature of the sheet is sufficiently characterized by its inclusion of Jacob H. Schiff among the Bolsheviki. This charge is the most convenient weapon in the hands of the Polish military authorities, who explain the pogroms as measures of protection against the Bolshevist agitation. The members of the Polish Legion recruited in the United States did not find it necessary to look for a pretext justifying pogroms, when they departed for Europe, for they declared to all bystanders that they were going to settle their accounts with the Zydi. Only among the neutral nations of Europe—and this is rather discouraging — protests were voiced gainst the barbarity of a nation fighting for self-determination and complaining of oppression. The senate of Holland passed a resolution condemning pogroms, and the government of Sweden addressed a circular note to the allied powers in the same sense. The French socialist paper, "L'Humanite," had the courage to do the same, and George Brandes, the famous Danish essayist, complains bitterly that the Poles, whose cause he always championed, should have been so ungrateful. He had expressed the same sentiment with regard to the Finns, whose part he formerly took to such an extent as to justify their hostility to the Jews as an unassimilative element. Experience has brought the aged literateur back into the Jewish camp. The most important political factors are surprisingly cool in their attitude. Mr. Balfour, the British minister of foreign affairs, said in his reply to a committee of the Board of Delegates that "it was the earnest desire of His Majesty's government to see that equal rights should be granted to the Jews in all countries." The "Times," while admitting the fact of the atrocities, indirectly justifies them by the charge that the Jews were not in sympathy with the Polish struggle for independence. The position of the Jews is extremely critical. In territories disputed by the Poles and Ukrainians the Jews were charged by both sides with hostility even if they remain neutral. In Cracow, which has enjoyed immunity from pogroms, the great mass of refugees has created a serious economic condition. The Jews of Lemberg, in spite of these difficulties, manifested their self-respect by refusing to accept a gift of $100,000 from the Warsaw government, but the Jews of Posen, yielding to pressure, signed a statement declaring that the riots in their city had no antisemitic character. In strange contradiction with all these reports is the news that the Jewish writer, William Feldman, was appointed Polish ambassador to Germany.

ROUMANIA AND OTHER INCORRIGIBLES.

A meeting of the American Union of Roumanian Jews, held in New York, Jan. 26, clearly voiced the conviction that the present Roumanian government can no more be depended on as to honesty of purpose than the one which hoodwinked Europe at the congress of Berlin. Mr. Louis Marshall stated correctly that a guarantee of emancipation will have to be demanded from the Allied powers. The emancipation bill passed Dec. 28 is a fact confirmed in a Washington dispatch of Jan. 18, but its wording is again so as to allow its evasion. The Jews are still treated as aliens who have to prove their nationality by documents which are practically unobtainable. They have to prove that they never claimed any other nationality. The antisemitic member of the parliament, Cusa, professor of law in the university of Jassy, had at least the decency to declare that the Jews will not benefit by any law giving them political equality. He is consistent. In his campaign speeches in 1907 he stated frankly that the Jews can only be taxpayers, and the proper policy in dealing with the Jewish question was blood and trickery. In an article, published in "Neamul" in 1908, he stated bluntly that a judge hearing a case between a Jew and a Christian must always decide in favor of the Christian even when the Jew is right, and as late as 1915, when the ex-minister Fleva attacked the renewed anti-Jewish policy of the government, Cusa said in reply: the last speaker referred to Roumanian Jews. There are no Roumanian Jews. The situation is illuminated by the report of Secretary Lobin of the Union of Native Jews of Roumania, who says that the new bill is worse than the one passed under the pressure of Germany. The Jews of Besarabia, meantime annexed to Roumania, are denied the rights which they possessed under the Russian republic, and pogroms on which no definite information is allowed to be given have occurred in Bucharest and Braila. One may imagine what is in store for the numerous Jews of Bukowina, if the annexation, desired by Roumania, shall be granted. The Jews of Bukowina, forming 16 per cent in the province and one-third in Czernowitz, the capital, enjoyed under Austrian dominion not only full equality, but twice elected a Jew mayor of the capital and had several university professors, some of whom served as deans (rector magnificus). Just for the present Roumania was compelled to yield to the wishes of the Peace Conference and to withdraw her troops from Bukowina. But there are serious internal problems of an agrarian character cropping up which in 1907 led to an open revolt against the large landowners and incidentally ruined thousands of Jewish families. There is a sinister indication that such revolts will be charged against the Jews, for we learn that Dr. Berman, a Russian Jew, was hanged for Bolshevist propaganda.

No student of history could expect that the henchmen of the czarist despotism would go out of existence with the new order of things introduced by Nicholas' abdication. At present Admiral Kolchak seems to represent the traditions of autocracy. He claims the assassination of the late czar, which as yet has not been officially confirmed, and is even denied by his mother, was due to the Jews who furnished eleven members of the band of seventeen who killed the ex-czar and his family. General Rasnoff re-introduced the prohibition of residence in Rostov regardless of the protest of the municipal authorities. Rostov and Taganrog were by an order of May 17, 1887, added to th district of the Don Cossacks from which the Jews were excluded. The Cossack, for centuries the chief support of czarism, was to be kept free from the Jewish contagion to such an extent that a Jew whose father and grandfather had served the prescribed lifetime service in a Cossack regiment was expelled from the territory in which the law gave him a share. A strange story is reported from the new Caucasus republic. It is claimed that the government in this most complex mixture of races, religions and nationalities offered to the Jews a proportionate representation in the parliament, but that the latter declined, declaring themselves as Grusini professing the Mosaic religion. It would require strong evidence before we would be willing to give up our belief that some humorist played a joke on the newspaperman who told this story to Abraham Cahan, the editor of the "Vorwaerts," at present in Paris. The 50,000 Jews of the Caucasus to whom 15,000 Jewish proselytes of Great Russian nationality must be added, are very devout and strong nationalists. A deputation of these people appeared at one of the Zionist congresses in Basel, and escorted Theodore Herzl to the Torah in their picturesque costumes with daggers and cartridge belts. A number of them are living in Palestine and others make annual pilgrimages to the Holy Land. It seems absurd that in a country divided between Tartars, Slavs, Greeks, Lithuanians, Rumanians and what not, should develop among the Jews an opposition to the national idea. On the other hand the various factions make life exceedingly difficult for the Jews of Russia who, according to stories told by refugees who have reached this country via Japan, are accused by Bolshevists and anti-Bolshevists alike with supporting the other side.

THE DARK CONTINENT.

The caption may be misleading, and therefore it shall be stated at the outset that we are referring to Germany and Austria whence news reach us only indirectly. We do not know how many Jews were elected to the constituent assembly which is to meet in Weimar, the old Athens of Germany. Neither the city of Goethe, Schiller, Herder and Wieland, nor the duchy of Saxe-Weimar, have ever played a prominent part in Jewish life. Weimar itself has less than 100 Jews, but its famous theater had various Jewish celebrities [illegible] congregation of any consequence in Stadt-Lengsfeld, the birthplace of the genial Rabbi Liebman Adler, has in one respect become a typical factor in modern Jewish history. The duke was busy "civilizing" the Jews to such an extent that he prescribed the form of worship in the synagog which was to be largely German and permitted intermarriage with Christians much to the dismay of his excellency, Herr von Goethe, who saw in it the undermining of Christian morals on which he was an undisputable authority. Leaving ancient history alone, it appears in spite of the interruption of communication that antisemitism has grown in the fatherland. Handbills and posters spread broadcast over Berlin charge the Jews with responsibility for the war, with responsibility for its prolongation when the outlook had become hopeless and with being slackers. The liberal party distributed handbills refuting these charges, evidently originating with the Junker class whose activity was only recently recalled in this country upon the death of Theodore Roosevelt, who, as police commissioner of New York, forestalled the effect of Ahlwardt's agitation by sending a squad of Jewish policemen to the hall where he lectured. Hermann Ahlwardt was not, as Roosevelt said, speaking of this incident, a minister, but a discharged school principal who served as a tool in the hands of the military Junker class when he published his pamphlet "Judenflinten," in which he charged the Jews with a design on Germany intended to bring about its defeat in war. From the little we know it seems that the military group is down and out, for a Jew, Levinson, was elected head of the soldiers' council of the fourth army, and another Jew, Sobernheim, is reported as having been appointed to the enigmatic post of councillor on Jewish affairs in the foreign office. There are a number of other names reported as holders of prominent positions, most of which are unknown to us who have not heard directly from Germany for three years. Among the known names are those of Hugo Haase and Hugo Preuss. The former said to be minister of the republic of Baden, which is somewhat unlikely as he represented a district of East Prussia in the Reichstag the latter German secretary of the interior. Hugo Preuss was some twenty years ago quite effectively advertised by the kaiserin who in a letter addressed to the president of the city council expressed her indignation at the Jew—of course not named as such—who had quoted Paul Gerhardt's verse: "Vertraue deine Wege und was dein Herze kraenkt" in a humorous application to an arbitrary ruling of the minister. Her majesty forgot that this beautiful hymn of the famous poet was merely a poetical rendering of Psalm 37, and that Dr. Preuss, if he intended to ridicule religion, would have turned against his own. Another Jewish celebrity, raised to a position in the cabinet as undersecretary of state is the well-known Zionist worker and sociologist, Dr. Franz Oppenheimer, the son of a minister of the radical reform congregation of Berlin, who was once on a lecture tour in this country in the interest of the co-operative colonies which he established in Palestine.

Conditions in the old dual empire are highly critical, and the future is fraught with portentous possibilities. Except for the Italian section which has only one community of considerable size, that of Trieste, no one can foretell how the Jewish inhabitants are going to be treated in the new states arising from the ruins of the old Hapsburg curio shop. Only the Poles have given us a specimen of their statesmanship, and this is far from inspiring confidence. Czecho-Slovackia collided already with Poland on the east and with the Magyars in the south. The city of Teschen was a bone of contention between Poles and Czechs, and in Balassa Cyarmath a battle was fought between Magyars and Slovacs. All these places have considerable Jewish populations who may be sure that whatever they do will displease some party. No matter whether they will join the Czechs, the Poles, the Germans or the Magyars or whether they will remain neutral, they will be somebody's enemies. The numerous Galician refugees in German Austria and in Bohemia were ordered to leave their places of refuge and to return to their former homes, which in many, perhaps in most, cases was nothing less than an order to plunge into a pogrom area. The orders were according to the latest advices revoked. An order of the military authorities in German Austria, dated Nov. 18, excluded all soldiers who are not of German nationality from commissions. Upon protest on the part of the Jews it was declared that this order would not affect Jews who register as [illegible] language in other countries. Masaryk, the president of the Czech republic, indorsed these demands, proclaiming separation of state and church.

THE HOME LAND.

Among the many conflicting and obscure reports, one deserves the first place. An Associated Press dispatch, dated Jan. 31, informed us that the Peace Conference had agreed on placing Palestine under the protection of the Allies, who shall designate one power as exercising this protectorate in their name. This sounds very much like the compromise in the question of Crete. Nominally the protectorate will be exercised by the allied council, but practically England will administrate the affairs of Palestine as she did those of Egypt for nearly thirty years until the time was ripe to make it a British colony. This solution was forecast in a report from Paris, dated Jan. 15, according to which President Wilson informed Dr. Weizman that the U. S. will support the Zionist scheme and watch over the rights of the Jews in lands where they are oppressed. It smacks, however, of secret diplomacy, in opposition to which the Jewish Congress movement arose, when we are told that Dr. Wise advised the Congress delegates to await the return of President Wilson before starting for Europe. The convention of the Order Sons of Zion, held in Hartford, Conn., Jan. 19, indorsed England as the power which shall protect Palestine, and Abraham Cahan telegraphed from Paris the sensational news that Israel Zangwill was proposed as governor of the Jewish homeland. With Masaryk, the philosopher, and Paderewski, the musician, Zangwill, the poet, will form a trio to prove that Schiller's "Theilung der Erde," at which the poet arrives too late. needs revision. The error of the antisemites who spread the fable of a powerful international Jewish body directed by a united will cannot better be refuted than by the fact that the Jewish Labor Congress, held in New York, and meeting simultaneously with the Sons of Zion, voted, on Jan. 19, against the Jewish homeland. The Poale Zion fraction indignantly left the hall, but returned soon again, declaring that they are socialists first and Zionists afterwards.

Indorsements of the Zionist scheme by various states and politicians show a remarkable political constellation. The most surprising of these manifestations was a mass meeting held in Rome, Dec. 9. It was attended by U. S. Ambassador Page, by members of the British and other embassies, by ex-Premier Luzzatti and numerous Italian statesmen. It indorsed the Jewish homeland in Palestine (lo stabilimento in Palestina . . . di una sede nazionale del popolo ebraico) and Jewish autonomy in lands where the Jews form large groups and desire it. In view of certain fears that the Jews by indorsing these principles will undermine their position in countries where they enjoy full equality, it is certainly significant that Luigi Luzzatti, the only Jew who was prime minister in any country, saw nothing compromising in his attendance at a meeting which indorsed "una sede nazionale del popolo ebraico in Palestina" instead of "di un popolo," as some Americans might demand. Luzzatti, now a man of 78, was the first Jew of Italy to be a member of the cabinet, and in former years a strong assimilationist who had once in reply to antisemitic attacks declared that he had abandoned "the narrow circle of his ancestral religion," but who was brought back to the Jewish people by the treachery of Roumania and similar occurrences. He is, however, at least socially within the Jewish fold, for his two daughters are married to the two sons of the late Rabbi Ezra Pomtremoli, at one time editor of "Educatore Israelita." They were married in a synagog, and Luzzatti himself is an occasional Yom Kippur Jew.

The indorsement of the Jewish homeland by the Jugo Slavs and by the Greek premier Venizelos is hardly of any weight, and the same position taken by the senate of the republic of Cuba has a touch of the comic opera, but on the other hand the absence of the diplomatic corps of France from the mass meeting in Rome coupled with the eloquent silence on the subject of Palestine in the opening address of the Peace Conferenc by President Poincare seem to indicate that the raising of the white and blue flag over the ancient citadel of David is not to become a fact without some protest. Emir Feisul, the son of the king of Hedjas, who is in Europe making propaganda for a new kingdom of Arabia, displayed before the American journalists in Paris a map showing the new kingdom which is to include Palestine and Syria, though he declared to [illegible] ntative of the [illegible] that the Arabs [illegible] their nearest [illegible] uscitating the [illegible]. The appeal seems sincere, for London "Spectator" finds it necessary to warn the Arabs against the "clannish and intolerant Jew who will compel both Christians and Mohammedans to emigrate and who ought to be cuffed as the Huns would have done to them." The International Zionist Conference to be held in London will give us an opportunity to see how far the antisemitic press of England is the echo of genuine public opinion. Headquarters for all Jewish committees represented will be opened in Paris, and a project of a permanent international tribunal for dealing with Jewish questions is being seriously discussed. Hopeful signs of an agreement between various Jewish factions are seen in different quarters. Mr. Jacob H. Schiff's appeal on behalf of the Palestine Restoration Fund, and an agreement between the orthodox Mizrachi fraction and the American Federation of Zionists on the apportionment of the funds collected point the way to the much desired goal of indorsing agreements above differences.

CLOUDS PASSING THE SUN.

If a proof were needed for the fact that a calculation may be flawless in theory and yet fail in its practical application, this proof was furnished by the latest events in South America. A Buenos Aires dispatch, dated Jan. 24, informed us of antisemitic riots in Buenos Aires which were caused by a strike in which it is reported the Jews took a prominent part. Similar reports came from Montevideo and from Chile. A warship deported 1,400 Bolsheviki, most of whom Russian Jews, and a Jewish committee waited on President Irigoyen of Argentina to ask him for protection. The Jewish settlement in Argentina is only thirty years old. Its originator was the German botanist, Wilhelm Loewenthal (1850-1894), who was called to Argentina by the government as expert on agricultural problems in 1889. At that time Baron Maurice de Hirsch had announced that he wished to do something substantial towards solving the Russian Jewish problem which grew more and more serious. Loewenthal suggested to him Argentina as an emigration area on the ground that it had room to spare for all the Jews of the world, and that its climate and agricultural possibilities would make colonization profitable and immigration welcome. The baron accepted the plan and outlined his intentions in an article which was published in the North American Review, July, 1891. The first immigrants landed on Argentinian soil, Dec. 16, 1891. The result never came up to the expectation of the great philanthropist, but the calculation that a thinly populated country would not furnish opportunities for antisemitic movements proved optimistic. The total Jewish population of Argentina will hardly surpass 30,000, that of Chile is estimated at 500, of whom 300 live in San Jago and that of Uruguay at 1,700, most of whom are living in Montevideo. Yet it seems that there are already too many.

We have to become reconciled to the sad lesson that we are still the servant of the Lord "crushed for the world's iniquities." We are either too influential or too weak. The "Courier Citizen" of Lowell, Mass., grew unnecessarily alarmed at the report that Justice Brandeis was selected as one of the delegates to the Peace Conference, and that the President once more displayed his "passion to be surrounded by Hebraic assistants." A New York Yiddish paper reports that discharged Jewish soldiers were refused positions by a U. S. Employment Agency with the point blank information that neither Jews nor Germans would be considered. The anti-immigration bill is certainly not without anti-Jewish motives and not entirely free from the ideas voiced by the London "Evening Standard" (Dec. 11), pleading for stricter anti-immigration laws, because: "they take a lot of trouble with the dogs to prevent rabies. Why should they not do it with the Polish Jews?" It is not only the Prussian junker of the Count Pueckler type who places signs over the entrance to his castle warning dogs and Jews to keep out. Not offensive in form, but offensive in spirit was the proclamation of the English minister of food, warning Jews who obtain larger amounts of meat and butter than the law permits. Free Switzerland is not free from the contagion either. The "Basler Nachrichten" published an article deploring the domination of the world by the Jews in the press, in finance, in theater, in socialism and in all political parties. Nevertheless an attempt is being made by the Jews of Switzerland to have the prohibition of Shehitah repealed when the revision of the constitution, decided by the Great Council on Nov. 14, 1918, begins. This article 25, prohibiting Shehitah, was adopted by a referendum vote, Aug. 26, 1893, and was suspended by a war emergency law. March 23, 1918. While passed originally as prevention of cruelty to animals, at least ostensibly, it was not free from antisemitic motives. The strike of the Jewish street vendors in New York to whom licenses are refused shows clearly that the homeland in Palestine cannot solve all economic problems of the Jewish people, and opens sad aspects for countries with ill-feelings against the Jews which can find easy methods to harrass the Jews without violating the letter of a constitution, no matter how carefully drafted and how solemnly sworn.

BREAD AND TORAH.

A relief ship sent to Europe to bring food to Poland will carry relief to the Jews, suffering both from famine and from the ill will of their neighbors. The Joint Distribution Committee took a wise step by insisting that Dr. Bogen shall personally superintend the distribution so as to give assurance that the Jews are not discriminated against. It is sad that the ethics of the Talmud requiring that the poor of the non-Jews shall be supported together with the poor of the Jews (Gittin, 61a) does not work both ways. With the heavy responsibilities resting on the Jews of the small neutral countries it is refreshing to read that the Jews of Switzerland are making the first preparations towards the establishment of a tuberculosis sanitarium in Davos. In Eastern Galicia, right in the midst of the district where Poles and Ruthenians are struggling for their different interpretation of self-determination, Mr. Lifshitz of Drohobycz gave one million crowns for the education of Galician war orphans in Palestine. Strictly cultural affairs arouse little enthusiam, and this was probably so in ancient times, for the rabbis found it necessary to teach: the true bread is the Torah. The Anglo-Jewish Association, whose object is mainly educational, complains in its last report that its income was reduced in 1918 by about $800, and its total income is less than $10,000, so that the Bene Israel community in East India receives not more than 1,000 dollars a year. The Jew of Eastern Europe will have to be depended on in maintaining the spiritual life of Judaism. The nascent republic of Ukraina announces the establishment of a chair of Jewish history and literature at the university of Kamenetz Podolsk. The place is well chosen. It was the home of the enthusiastic worker for progress, the Russian Mendelssohn,

Sketches of Modern Jewish History

By Gotthard Deutsch

XV.

From the July Revolution to the February Revolution (1830-1848).

While on the continent of Europe the fight for the emancipation of the Jews was part of the general program of liberalism and was finally won when the democratic principles prevailed in the state, the condition in England was entirely different. Here the battle for Jewish rights was an independent movement and to some extent supported by conservatives. A brief survey of the history of the Jews in Great Britain is necessary for the full comprehension of the situation.

The Jews who had come to England with William the Conqueror (1066) as financiers, aiding the conquest, were expelled by Edward I in 1290. From that time on we find no Jews on the British Isles for nearly four centuries, although there may have been some individuals living there incognito, especially fugitives from the Spanish Inquisition in the sixteenth century. Instances of this kind, some of which are fairly well established, while others are doubtful, though probable, hardly enter into historic consideration, for legally the Jews did not have an existence in England, although James Howell wrote in 1653 to a friend in Amsterdam: "Touching Judaism some of the corners of our city smell as rank of it as yours doth there." The mission of Rabbi Manasseh Ben Israel to Cromwell in 1655 is well known. It has been presented in historic monographs, in fiction and in art. It did not lead to any tangible result, and like elsewhere the Jews were not admitted to England by an official legal enactment but as a matter of fact. They represent the mole in the Irish bull when Pat upon Mike's question, how the mole could get into his hill without leaving a hole behind, answers: He came in from the other side. The first official document, recognizing the existence of a Jewish community in London, is a charter granted by Charles II in 1664, but the old cemetery in Mile End shows that five persons were buried before 1660.

From that time on the Jewish settlement developed rapidly, first through Sefardic Jews, principally from Amsterdam, but occasionally also directly from Spain and her colonies, and soon afterwards Ashkenazim followed. Their condition was that of toleration, not much different from that of their brethren on the continent, although they were not restricted to a ghetto, to the wearing of a distinctive badge, and, although an attempt in this direction was once made, not to special Jew taxes. On the other hand they were not only excluded from all political rights, but also inasmuch, as some occupations, e.g. the right of keeping an open shop in the City of London, required that the owner be a freeman of the city, also from some civic rights. In many other respects they enjoyed certain civic rights merely through toleration and through humane application of the laws by the public officials. As aliens e.g. they could neither make a legal will nor own real estate in His Majesty's dominions, except in some of the colonies overseas, but as a rule the courts overlooked these disabilities, and wills of Jews were probated, and real estate acquired by them was recorded under silent toleration. Finally in 1753 an attempt was made to legalize this practice, and a bill of emancipation was passed. This fact created such an excitement all over the country, posters were printed, showing Samson Gideon Abudiente on the throne of England, pamphlets were distributed denouncing the Jews as enemies of Christendom and exploiters of their neighbors, so that the bill had to be repealed in the same year. One cannot forego the temptation to expose the idiocy of antisemitic charges. Samson Gideon—he dropped the Abudiente in later life—had one son who turned a Christian in order to be able to buy a manorial estate, and became a Lord Eardley. The latter's grandson, the Rev. Eardley Childers was a rector of the Church of England and had a son, Hugh Culling Eardley Childers, who was member of Gladstone's cabinet. The latter's son, by the same name, died as member of the House of Commons in 1912 at the age of fifty. So if the dynasty of Samson Gideon Abudiente should ever occupy the throne in England, Judaism would not be the gainer by it, and the "Hashkabah," recited in memory of Samson Gideon in the Portuguese synagog of London on Yom Kippur, is the only relic left of the great eighteenth century financier in the Jewish community.

We hear very little afterwards of the political affairs of the Jews in England except an occasional reference, e.g. that they were permitted to vote by proxy in municipal elections, when the elections were held on a holy day. So without any legal measure they were given the right to vote. It was different with other political rights which were not won until after a hard struggle. The occasion came when the medieval privilege of the Established Church whose members had alone the right to political offices was abolished by the Test Act of 1829. Up to that time every official or member of parliament had to recognize the king's supremacy in religious matters and had to subscribe to the Thirty-nine Articles of the Anglican Church. The new law opened the doors of the Parliament to Roman Catholics and non-conformists, while it created a new disability for the Jews. The House of Lords, always the bulwark of rigid conservatism, had passed the bill with the amendment that for the oath on the principles of the Established Church the formula "upon the true faith of a Christian" was substituted. Under the former conditions the Jewish disability was exactly like that of all non-conformists, but now the Jews were, inasmuch as Mohammedans or pagans were not affected by British law, the only class of the population excluded from the franchise.

The fight began in the following year, when Robert Grant, a liberal member of the House of Commons, moved on April 5, 1830, to remove the disabilities of the Jews. The bill was promptly defeated, but received support by petitions from the most different sections of the population. The earl of Limmerick and the archbishop of Dublin were joined by the freethinker, Richard Carlile, who spent nearly ten of the 53 years of his life in prison for "blasphemy" in their indorsement of the demands of the Jews. It is highly significant and may be a valuable lesson for posterity to learn that Carlile's petition was laid on the table because the petitioner was an infidel.

In 1833 the House of Commons passed the bill, re-introduced by Robert Grant, but the House of Lords voted it down Aug. 10. From now on for fully twenty-five years the fight centered in the bulwark of Toryism. Meantime, however, a certain relaxation is seen in the application of the laws of disablement. Francis Goldsmid, member of a Dutch family of financiers who, in the eighteenth century, occupied the place of the Rothschilds, was in 1833 admitted to the bar. A strict interpretation of the law would have excluded him, but the Chamber of Barristers—as we would call the Association in order to avoid long explanations of the British term of office, a principle that shall be maintained throughout this essay—admitted him, alloting him to omit the objectionable words from the formula of the oath. Similarly was David Salomons admitted to the municipal office of sheriff of London and Middlesex by such a rule in 1835. David Salomons, who became the indefatigable protagonist of the political emancipation of the Jews of England, was succeeded in the same office by Moses Montefiore in 1837, the year of Queen Victoria's ascent to the throne, during whose government with the exception of the two cases mentioned the removal of the Jewish disabilities took place. It is also, as in the case of Samson Gideon, an illustration of the tragedy of modern Jewish history that most, if not all, the descendants of David Salomons are now members of the Established Church. Salomons was a year afterwards elected as first Jewish alderman of the City of London, but could not serve. It took nine years until a bill providing that Jews, elected to municipal office, had the righ to omit the words "upon the true faith of a Christian" from the oath of office passed the House of Lords. Other cities had allowed Jews to sit on their councils, and in other instances autonomous bodies had acted in like manner without awaiting remedial action by legislation. Thus the University of Dublin had in 1836 allowed a Jew to take a degree, while the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge retained their privileges, excluding Jews, until the passage of a law in 1871. It may be that the temperament of the British people, which is conservative, expressing itself in the retention of the silk wigs for judges, in the bear muffs for the soldiers, in the perpetuation of guilds representing trades that for centuries did not exist, like the guild of spectacle makers, and whose members practice neither this nor any other trade, was responsible for the slowness of the progress made in the emancipation movement. There was, however, also a distinctly hostile attitude to the Jews underlying the opposition. The newspapers of the period prove it, and newspapers are the truest mirror of popular sentiment. The Morning Post wrote in February, 1844: "The Jews have been from time immemorial incarnations of usury . . . in direct proportion to the growing influence of the Jews has been the abasement of the laboring classes. Wherever the Jews flourish, there will be found the arts of usury, of money jobbing and extortion."

Some of the measures of relief were actually no relief at all, but the legalization of a practice so well established that even learned jurists did not know of its illegality. So it was not until 1846 that the yellow badge and the prohibition of lending money on interest were abolished. The former never existed since the readmission of the Jews, and no one knew that the "Statutum de Judaismo," issued by Edward I, c. 1280, which ordered it was still the law of the land. It was on similar suppositions and encouraged by the success of David Salomons' fight for the right to hold the aldermanic seat that the fight for the right of holding a seat in the Parliament was continued. Instead of fighting for the principle, it was decided to establish a test case on which the Parliament was bound to act. Lionel de Rothschild presented himself as candidate for the House of Commons in the city of London in 1847 and was elected.

The Rothschild family had sent one branch to England in 1797, when the third of the five sons of Mayer Amschel Rothschild opened an export house for calicos in Manchester. This business belongs to Jewish history, notably to the economic part of it which is not yet sufficiently appreciated. The Jew, living mostly in villages, had almost a monopoly on the retail dry goods trade which he carried on, mostly peddling the goods through the country, carrying his pack of 100-150 pounds for twenty miles a day, besides attending fairs, and only exceptionally keeping a store in small towns. From the wholesale trade the foresight of legislators like those of Frankfort on the Main, who declared that "every state has the duty to so arrange the legal stauts of the Jews that the Christians can exist," had excluded him. So in Frankfort, which was a business center for the numerous Jews living in the Hessian territories, the wholesale dry goods business was in the hands of the city patricians, who grew rich on the poor Jewish peddlers who in the sweat of their brow barely eked out an existence and were in addition called exploiters and treated like dogs by the wealthy merchants whom they helped to enrich. Nathan Rothschild, the financial genius of the family, saw his opportunity and went to Manchester, whence he exported the English goods for the Frankfort market. Soon, however, he found a much better opportunity to lay the foundations for the fabulous wealth of the family. England, threatened with financial ruin by the Continental blockade declared by Napoleon, used all possible means to defeat him with an energy which led to America's war in 1812. It subsidized the various German princes for the sake of carrying on the war against France, which was terminated on the battlefield of Waterloo, where Bluecher and Wellington shook hands, as did Foch and Haig on the battlefield of the Marne, a little over a century later. The sending of these subsidies to Germany was a risky but naturally also a profitable business. This is history, which to the popular mind is not interesting enough, and so the legend arose of Mayer Amschel Rothschild sacrificing his money in order to protect that of the elector of Hesse and of Nathan Mayer risking his life crossing the channel in a rowboat and utilizing his knowledge of the battle of Waterloo on the London stock exchange. N. M. Rothschild became the leading power on the London exchange. The five brothers were raised to the Austrian baronetcy in 1824, and their descendants in France and England still claim this nobility, with the exception of the one member who is peer of England. Nathan married a daughter of Levy Barent (Loeb) Cohen, a very orthodox Dutch Jew, and the first son was, as is customary, named for the grandfather, Loebele, in English Lionel.

A little religious history belongs to this sketch to avoid the error of Karl Marx that history is only a fight for the daily bread. Levy Barent Cohen was, as has been stated, an observant and learned Jew. By the end of the eighteenth century liberal tendencies had crept into the London Jewish community. The rabbi (probably Tebele Schiff, a native of Frankfort and a member of the family to which Jacob H. Schiff belongs) may have believed in Milton's advice: "Observe the rule of not too much, by temperance taught." Some wicked fellow about that time had invented the umbrella, and people of little faith carried it even on Sabbath, forgetting that opening an umbrella is tantamount to the erection of a tent, and the latter to building a house, which is one of the 39 cardinal kinds of labor prohibited on the Sabbath. The rabbi offered a compromise. He would allow them to use an umbrella if they would keep it partly open on Friday so that the operation of opening it would be like the stretching of tent ropes, which is permitted. Levy Barent Cohen was not satisfied, appealed to R. Ezekiel Landau of Prague, who declared that opening an umbrella on Sabbath was a mortal sin, and such a circumvention as the rabbi of London proposed was a very dangerous policy in our days of religious laxity. Levy Barent had a great-grandson, Arthur Cohen, an authority on maritime law, who died in 1914 at the age of 85. His descendants will not recognize the chief rabbi of Prague in questions of conscience. If they need a spiritual adviser they will find him in the archbishop of Canterbury.

At any rate, Lionel de Rothschild was a native subject of His Majesty George III, and therefore entitled to a seat in the House of Commons. He was elected July 26, 1847, and when he appeared in the House he stated his objection to the oath. The honorable member was told to retire. The House took the matter up and declared his seat vacant. On Dec. 17 the resolution to admit the Jews to Parliament was repeated, and again voted down. Sion College of Cambridge petitioned the Parliament against granting the franchise to the Jews, "whose exertions would be directed to the overthrow of Christianity in the British empire." Blackwood's Magazine published in July, 1848, an essay entitled "American Thoughts of European Revolutions," which declared that the act of emancipation meant "a coalition with people loaded with the hereditary burden of Jesus' blood," but Gladstone, a staunch high church man, voted for the act, much to the discomfort of his teacher, Pusey, the leader of the high church movement named for him. The city of London stuck to the baron faithfully, and reelected him, with the result as before. Meantime David Salomons, once before a candidate for Parliament and defeated, was elected in 1851, took his seat and voted without having been sworn in. He was "ejected" by the usher and fined £500 for illegal voting. His seat was, of course, also declared vacant. He had the satisfaction of being elected in 1855 Lord Mayor of London, the first Jew to hold this office, which has since been occupied by five other co-religionists.

The resistance to the emancipation was finally overcome in the House of Commons, but the House of Lords stubbornly refused to concur in it, until on July 23 a compromise was agreed upon. Either House of Parliament should have the right to admit a member of the Jewish persuasion, allowing him to omit the words: "upon the true faith of a Christian." This "Act to Provide for the Relief of Her Majesty's Subjects Professing the Jewish Religion, Vic. 22," was signed July 23, 1858, and three days later Lionel de Rothschild took the oath with covered head, on the Hebrew Bible, without the true faith of a Christian. Four weeks previously, June 24, 1858, a troop of papal soldiers entered the house of Solomon Mortara, in Bologna, with a warrant for the arrest of his six-year-old son, Edgar, on the ground that a nurse girl had baptized him a few years before, and that he belonged to the church. In the papal states the canons of the Lateran Council of 1215 were still

THE ESSENCE OF JUDAISM

Address of Prof. Theodore Reinach Before the Judeeans, January 30, 1919.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:

I will first express my deep gratitude for the cordial greeting which I just received from you, and although your praise has made my modesty suffer very much, I accept it as going beyond and above my head to my own country, for which I know your well-deserved feelings, and your sincere sympathy.

When I was first asked, a few months ago by your distinguished secretary, Mr. Max Kohler, to deliver a lecture before your society, I declined the offer. The reason was that I am, I will not say a scholar, but a would-be scholar, and therefore, when I give a lecture, I want it to be treated in a scholarly manner and on a subject familiar to my studies. Well, I had not prepared and I had no means to prepare something interesting or original, connected either with the history, archaeology or literature of the past of Judaism, and I had too much respect for yourselves and for myself to substitute for a meditated and worked-out memoir, some hasty and insignificant gossip. Since then, the call having been modified to suit my possibilities, I am very glad to find myself to-night among you, and to be allowed to repay in some measure my debt of gratitude by a very short address, the subject of which, as your chairman has just told you, is simply my personal feeling about the essence of Judaism.

I remember that some twenty or twenty-five years ago, in writing the second edition of a small book on the history of the Jews, which has been perhaps more copied than quoted, I ventured to express the opinion that Judaism, which in old times had been an Asiatic fact, which in the Middle Ages and modern times had been a European fact, would, perhaps, in the course of time, become chiefly an American fact. What did I mean by this rather adventurous prophecy? I did not mean only that in point of number the Jewish population of America, which was then increasing in a particularly rapid manner, at the beginning of a great stream of immigration from the eastern countries of Europe. I did not mean only that in point of numbers the Jewish population of America would soon be larger than that of perhaps any other country in the world; I meant also that the legal and social conditions of the Jews in America, that their internal organization, that the forms of their worship and even the contents of tenets of their faith, would be likely to serve one day or other as pattern for Judaism in the remainder of the diaspora.

Events have occurred since my writing these lines which by no means oblige me to retract them. It is not that I am prepared to underrate or to ridicule the movement which has arisen under the name of Zionism. The longing of many persecuted and suffering Jews destitute of any fatherland, to find a home and a shelter in Palestine, is justified, even were it under the protection of one or of several of the civilized nations of Europe. Nor am I blind or unfair to the efforts that have been made and are being made by some generous minds in that direction. But it is my intimate and my ripely weighed conviction, that even under the best administration, even under the best economic organization and management, Palestine is hardly able to provide food for the twentieth part of the Jewish population of the world. It is also my intimate conviction that every action tending to retransform Judaism from a religious and spiritual fact to a national and material fact, is an endeavor not only to stop, but to reverse, the natural flow and stream of its history, an attempt of reaction doomed to bankruptcy, and the only practical result of which would be to foster, by new arguments and by new weapons, the most dangerous and loathsome form of anti-Semitism. I mean that anti-Semitism which affects to consider and represent the Jew as a foreign and unassimilable element, thrust in the core of modern communities, harmful as every strange body of the kind, and which had better be thrown out or destroyed altogether. Therefore, the solution of what is sometimes called the Jewish problem, taking it as a whole, is not, in my opinion, the "return to Jerusalem." We have to accept present conditions, historical facts, stern realities, and do our best to adjust ourselves to them. Now in no country in the world, as it seems to me, is this process of adjustment more easily to be carried out than in the United States. For you American Jews, it is a simple question to know how you can manage or rather how you can continue to be true Americans without denying your Judaism, or, if you prefer to put it in other words, how to remain true and good Jews without betraying in any way your duties, your feelings, your interests, as true Americans.

If, instead of America, I had to speak of the Russia of yesterday, or perhaps of the Turkey of today, I might perhaps use another language, but I am speaking to Americans and of America. Now I know not whether there have been at any time in this country people of high or low standing inclined to deny or to conceal their quality of Jews in order to better their social position, in other words, people ashamed of confessing their origin and their faith. I hope not, but if ever this has been the case, I strongly feel that in the present time, such an attitude, independently of its baseness, would carry in itself the stamp of absurdity. For at no epoch in the history of America has the natural bent of civilization, and I may say the program of the best part of mankind, agreed more closely than nowadays with the permanent aims and principles of Judaism, and with those moral discoveries of Jewish thought in which reside its originality and its titles of nobility. In this present dawn of the twentieth century a Jew by birth, objecting to be known as such and trying to sneak out of Judaism, reminds me of a man who, chancing to be called Fulton or Morse, would try to change his name, for fear of being thought related to those great benefactors of humanity.

This opinion may seem at first view rather a paradox. I will justify it in a few words. You know that the final result of the critical and painstaking labor bestowed on the Bible by several generations of scholars in the past century has been to demonstrate beyond any contest the overwhelming importance of prophetic thought in the making of Judaism, and consequently in the genesis of all those religions which have sprung from Judaism as from a common source. In the words of my great and lamented friend, James Darmsteter, the prophets who, according to the old traditional conception, appeared as men, who, in times of defection, came to recall to Israel forgotten truths, were in reality the creators or, if you prefer, the discoverers of these truths, and prophecy, instead of being the flower of Judaism, was in reality its root.

Now, which are the leading ethical principles of prophetism as they have been handed down to us in hundreds of striking passages, in lines of burning passion, of wrath, of sorrow, of joy, of scorn, as well as of high and profound wisdom, which make up the books of the prophets? These teachings may differ somewhat in expression according as you look for them in the earlier works of an Amos or Hosea, or in the glowing oratory of Isaiah and Jeremiah, or in the lofty poetry of the great Anonymous of the Exile. But the nucleus, the spirit, is always the same; always and everywhere you hear the prophets proclaim, cry out, shriek out, I may say, two sublime truths: First, that, inside of a nation, justice must reign among men, not only justice in the vulgar sense that judges have to decide honestly and candidly according to the law, but in that higher sense, that the law itself has to be shaped so as to protect the weaker, the poorer from oppression, from overtoil, from iniquity and from cruelty, so as to put also a restraint to the excessive accumulation of power and wealth in the hands of a few monopolists. This is the first principle, and the second is that among nations themselves, the barbarous process of war, of conquest, of pillage and destruction, as it has gone on for centuries after centuries, must come at last to an end; that nations have to learn to adjust their differences without bloodshed; that they have to establish a common rule and an everlasting peace; that they have to gather together in a holy brotherhood under the auspices, under the hand, of their acknowledged Father, the God of Israel, become, by a wonderful process of widening and purifying, the only God of mankind. Social justice on the one hand, organized peace on the other—such are the prevailing principles, I may say, the sole articles of the moral faith of our prophets, and I may add of Israel itself, for the "essence of Judaism" which I am trying to define, it is precisely in the speeches of the prophets, and only there, that we have to seek it. Even the Torah—I mean the chief and finest code of the Torah, the so-called Deuteronomy, is, as you well know, nothing else than a systematic co-ordination of the principles of prophetism by one of the prophets. Everything else in Judaism is, to use the words of Shakespeare, "nothing but the trappings and outward show," things historically and sometimes emotionally very interesting to us, but of no deeper, no wider, signification for the salvation of Israel and for the happiness of the whole world.

That such is really the moral import of prophetism, I ought to be dispensed with proving, after the evidence accumulated in the past century by such scholars as Rouse, Wellhausen, Renan and many more. Besides, anyone of you has only to turn over the pages of the Bible to find there the passages alluded to and which are among the greatest words which have eyer been uttered before mankind So, you will hear Amos proclaim that Israel must expiate her sins because she sold justice for silver and the poor for a pair of shoes. You will hear Hosea putting in the mouth of the Almighty the words, "I desire mercy and not sacrifice." You will hear Isaiah uttering: "Woe to those that join houses to houses, field to field, till there is no place left and they may be there alone," and gasping for the stream of righteousness and the flow of justice. You will hear Jeremiah summing up in these words the commands of God: "Fulfill justice and charity; deliver the despoiled from the hand of the oppressor; do not ill-treat the stranger nor shed innocent blood." You will hear Habakkuk asking how long we will see them—that is the kings, the emperors, and other conquerors—always emptying their nets to begin again to slay the nations without pity. You will hear the great Anonymous, the so-called Deutero-Isaiah, announcing in that wonderful vision, "You believe Israel stricken of God, whereas it is to reclaim them from their sins that she was afflicted. It was for their salvation that she was chastised and she neither grows weary nor discouraged, that justice may be established upon the earth, for the far off islands (including, I suppose, America), await her instructions, for the house of Israel shall be called the house of prayer for all people."

And last, but not least, the prophet Micah will unfold to you the features of regenerated humanity. "God shall be judge between the nations and shall decide for many peoples, and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning hooks. Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

Such was the hope of the Prophets; such was their teaching, and a great novelty it was in the history of human thought, for you must go down several centuries before hearing similar ideas, much more timidly expressed, under the pens of the Greek and Roman philosophers.

And now, let us revert to the actual needs, cares and aspirations of modern humanity, and chiefly of those who have the best right to speak in its name. What has been for a century, the great subject of inquiry, the great care of modern economists and moralists, the great effort of modern internal legislation? It has been to protect the poor and the weak against overwork and against insufficient wages, to insure against illness and old age; to raise their standard of life by better housing, better clothing, better food and better education; to put some limitation to the possibility of monopolizing public wealth and necessary commodities in the hands of a few powerful tyrants, in other words, an endeavor to effect social justice. Even now, in the conference of Paris, or of Versailles, a special committee has been appointed to try and establish certain rules of social justice applicable to all civilized nations. So here you have one of the two ideals of the prophets that the world is trying to carry out, and Isaiah would be quite in his place if he had a seat in that committee of the quai d'Orsay.

And what is the other object on which, since about forty years, so much ink has been spent in time of peace and, alas, during these last four years of war, so much blood spilt? It is to try to put an end to that intolerable state of so-called "armed peace" which fatally always leads to "armed war," which has strewn the world with hatred, with havoc, with misery, with millions of widows and of orphans, with cities reduced to ashes, fields turned to stony deserts, whole populations dragged from their homes into exile, and forced labor, as in the times of Tiglath Pileser, Sennacherib, and Nebuchadnezzar. It is also to organize somehow and somewhere a tribunal of nations, a league or society of peoples, a lasting and real, not a sham and precarious, peace, enforced by some supreme council and some effective police force, so as to enable the poor remainders of mankind to breathe, to readjust, to rebuild, their shattered homes, and to mend their scathed garments, to live, to work, to thrive and to love. That is the aim for which twenty civilized nations are at present uniting their efforts; that is the great message that the President of the United States has proclaimed to the world, and that is also the second article of faith, the second moral principle of the old prophets of Israel, and here again the prophets Micah and Deutero-Isaiah would be entitled to have a seat of honor at the table of the Paris Conference.

Ladies and gentlemen, I have said enough to prove that not only can there be no contradiction, no friction, whatever between the ideals of civilization and the moral principles as they are accepted by modern Europe, and by modern America, and the essence of Judaism. but that, on the contrary, those very principles which today guide humanity. those principles which dominate and inspire the thought and action of the loftiest minds in mankind, are precisely those which have been proclaimed more than two thousand five hundred years ago by your spiritual and bodily ancestors, by the founders of the religion which you have preserved in its integrity since those days. Not that I deny that a great part of the teaching of the prophets has been incorporated in other creeds, especially in those that have originated in our own; but, without entering into any detail nor in any controversy, I should like to point out that the gospel, for instance, having developed in a period of general despondency, of infinite woe and almost of despair, has, since that time, kept up, consciously or not throughout the centuries, an underneath spirit of resignation, a spirit of renunciation concerning this lower world, a spirit of exclusive interest for "the undiscovered country" beyond the grave, and of exclusive hope in sanctions of another life. This tendency is very far from what I would call (allow me to coin the term) the realistic idealism of our prophets; it is also very far from the actual tendencies of civilized humanity. Our old prophets, as well as the leading minds, the leading thinkers. of modern Europe since the times of the French Revolution, have not been content with picturing a realm of God in after life; their firm hope, their earnest, firm will is to realize that realm of God in this life; to establish not only mercy, but justice, as far as men can realize justice among men, and also peace, peace material and moral, among the nations in this world.

A witty critic some years ago wrote a book about the "romanticism of the Classics," in order to make them thus more actual, to enliven the interest of the public for these old writers. Well. in some sense, we may confidently speak today of the actuality of prophetism. We may speak of Judaism, notwithstanding its venerable age, as of the most up-to-date of all religions, as of the most modern, because it is the most closely in touch and harmony by its ethical tendencies, with the beliefs, the aspirations and the wants of the present age.

To realize those ideals, of which I have given so short an outline, can certainly not be the work of a few years. Generations will have to strive, to struggle, to suffer, in order to work out and to carry out entirely those principles. That is not an easy task, but it is a great task, a noble task, and I may say almost a holy task, well worthy of our efforts and of our pains, and to which the best among us, and especially the youngest, will have to devote their brains. their hearts, and maybe their lives.

American Jews have, I am convinced, a great part to play in that new crusade for justice and peace, and you have the satisfaction to be able to play it in full community of thought and of feeling with the great nation to which you now belong; in undertaking the task I have defined, you will remain faithful to yourselves and faithful to the past. It is your rare privilege to be able to be proud, alike of being the grandsons of those who first of all in the world have spoken those great words and sowed those glorious seeds, and of being the countrymen of those who have just given to the world the noble example of rushing into a gigantic war for the sake of those same principles of justice, peace and humanity.

A new organization has been formed in Baden under the name of "Christian People's Party." The principal aim of the party is to procure the enactment of measures "safeguarding Germany from Jewish despotism, and to prevent Jews, who only seek financial interests, from controlling the country."

NEWS FROM LONDON

By Our Correspondent Dr. M. Epstein

London, Jan. 14, 1919.

The three months of comparative peace which have now passed over the world have not brought many changes in Anglo-Jewry. In common with the rest of their fellowcitizens, Jews heaved a sigh of relief that the long-drawn-out holocaust came to an end, and now the call is for reconstruction. Precisely what form of reconstruction is desired it is as yet impossible to foresee. But so much stands out already—that all sections of the community wish to co-operate in trying to do something. This communal co-operation is a welcome sign of the times. Hitherto the various groups kept to themselves. The three wings of the community, the United Synagogue, the Sephardi Section and the Reform Congregation, each plowed its own furrow, and Anglo-Jewry was the poorer for not having that strength which comes of union. Today the desire for union is uppermost in every direction. It manifested itself first in a determined policy in the matter of looking after ex-soldiers. There were several bodies in existence for various aspects of the problem. From the first they determined to coalesce, and now the community has a single society for the purpose of this necessary work.

The same tendency is showing itself in wider spheres. There is a feeling that East End work in Whitechapel will become of paramount importance, and that this should not be left to private enterprise, as it were. There are a number of Jewish clubs for working boys and girls; the Jewish elementary schools need assistance from prospective managers, visitors and members of what are termed "after care" committees, and there is no little religious constructive work to be done. Volunteers for all manner of social activities are thus required, and an attempt is being made to furnish a supply on a communal basis. There has been propounded a rather novel scheme—novel for London—with which it is believed the name of the Reverend A. A. Green is connected, whereby the whole of East London is divided up into areas, and workers from every synagogue in the metropolis are to be assigned to each. The scheme will be twice blessed: it will bless those who give and those who take. If on the one hand the Jewish residents of Whitechapel, and especially the young people, profit by this arrangement, the synagogues in the West End will profit no less. At present members of synagogues hardly know each other, unless it be by accident. The new proposals will bring them together for a common purpose wherein they will be occupied both as citizens and Jews. The synagogues will thus tend to become, what at present they are not, centers of communal life and work. Perhaps as symptomatic of this tendency must be placed the appearance of the Rev. Morris Joseph, the respected minister of the Reform Congregation, in the pulpit of the East London Synagogue, one of the constituent bodies of the United Synagogue. True, it was at a children's Chanucah Service. But it is something to have this religious co-operation, which is full of promise for the future.

An interesting adjunct to the Synagogue scheme described above is the proposal for the establishment of a Jewish settlement in East London. Toynbee Hall, which early in the war moved from its old habitation further east, has now returned to its old home, and has restarted its former activities. Toynbee Hall is right in the heart of the Jewish quarter in Whitechapel, and needless to add, a large proportion of its clientele is made up of Jews. But there would be room also for a specifically Jewish settlement, and it is pleasing to chronicle that the Berkeley Street Synagogue is greatly interested in this movement. It remains to be seen how far the paper scheme will be carried out. But at any rate the desire for all these innovations promises well for the future. It is only on the same level with the suggestion for a League of Religions, as an organization parallel with the League of Nations. Possibly, too, the life and movement in the East End may lead to life and movement in the West End. The West no less than the East requires intellectual and religious edification. Not necessarily in synagogues. There is much to be done outside the synagogue. Perhaps this is the opportunity.

The great event of the last month in this country has been the Parliamentary elections. A number of Jews were among the candidates, and the new House of Commons has a goodly portion of members who are Jews, including Maj. J. B. Cohen, a son-in-law of Sir Stuart Samuel, who has lost both his legs in the war. Another pathetic incident in the election was connected with the name of Colonel Lucas. The colonel was a candidate for one of the London boroughs, but died just before the election. His wife was requested to take his place, but though she made a brave fight, she was unsuccessful. One of the features of the election is that the principal Liberal leaders were not returned this time. The list includes Mr. Asquith himself, and also Mr. Herbert Samuel. Mr. Samuel has held high cabinet rank and is destined to do so again, unless indeed he is thinking of Palestine, as is suggested in some quarters.

The Palestine movement in this country has grown in strength. The general public is becoming more and more interested; books on Palestine and on a Jewish settlement there are being issued from the press, and Jews are taking a greater and greater interest in possibilities there. The League of British Jews, which is here generally regarded as the organized opposition to Zionism, has published the first number of a review of its own under the style of "Jewish Opinion." A cynic might say that this increased activity on the part of the League only shows the increasing strength of Zionism. It is a pity that the general tendency to union manifested at present in the community in other directions should be lacking in the matter of Palestine. The differences of opinion, deeply felt no doubt, turn largely on terms and their definition. Are the Jews a nation? Are they a religious community? These questions have received ample treatment in the past, and agreement upon them as academic problems is difficult. But what does the answer matter while at Paris the Peace Conference is settling the destinies of many lands on the face of the globe, including Palestine? What does the answer matter while Colonel Patterson is able to write as follows:

"Since my last letter to you great things have happened, and fortunately the Jewish battalions contributed their share towards the grand ending. Soon after I wrote to you in July we were ordered to proceed to the Jordan Valley, and our march took us through Jerusalem, and proved most interesting. The 38th Battalion went down to Jericho and then ten miles north of that ancient city to the banks of the famous Jordan. Here, on a wadi called 'Mallahah,' we encamped against the Turks, who surrounded us on three sides. We held this extreme right flank of the British Army—the post of honor on the whole front—for over five weeks. All through this trying time we were more or less 'on our own,' as nearly all the mounted men and guns were moved out of the valley to make a dash along the coast. We put up a great 'bluff,' made the Turks imagine that we were always on the point of attacking them by putting out 'snipers' and fighting patrols, got the upper hand, and held the Turk to his own lines. We made a number of prisoners, inflicted many casualties and generally 'put the wind up' the enemy. We suffered little ourselves in those five strenuous weeks, which in the circumstances was little short of a miracle. One way we did indeed suffer. The 'Mallahah' was terribly unhealthy, and men went down with malaria and other fevers like flies. Then eventually came the great day of the advance, Sept. 18-19. Our orders were to hold the enemy to his trenches, and to prevent any reinforcements from crossing the east side of the Jordan. This we did by constantly hammering away at the Turks opposed to us, and finally we assaulted their trenches on the night 21-22, and got possession of the ford that they were holding over the Jordan. . . . Finally we entered Jerusalem in triumph, bringing with us about 4,000 prisoners. The 38th and 39th are now encamped some nine miles from Jaffa, resting after our arduous fights and marches. How arduous these were will be gathered from the fact that I have, at this moment, 27 officers and over 300 men of the 38th Battalion in hospital, mostly fever cases from the Jordan Valley. I am very glad to see that we have been mentioned in the official dispatch, as the men indeed deserve great credit for the part they have taken in the crowning victory. Is it not a strange thing that the whole movement which led to the freeing of Palestine was actually pivoted on Israel (i. e., on Jewish battalions) holding the enemy on the Jordan?"

The whole of the Palestine question seems simple enough, and if there are difficulties they are rather of a practical than of a theoretical character. Whether the Jews are a nation, a race, a religious community, or all three combined, is of small moment. What is of real consequence is that those Jews who wish to settle in Palestine should be enabled to do so by the establishment of sound economic conditions and by the provision of proper government. With regard to the latter there is little doubt that Jewish opinion is united in wishing to see British rule in Palestine, whatever the precise form of that rule may be. The tradition of England as the protector of the oppressed and the champion of liberty is very strong, and the great Pax Britannica is an ideal understood by the masses. The final settlement of this question rests with the Versailles Conference; the preparation, however, for the material wellbeing of the country is being made already. The National Fund is collecting wherever it can, and it has to its credit a promise from the Right Honorable Alfred Mond, Bart., M. P., a member of the last and of the present British cabinet, of a sum of £25,000 (say, $125,000) for the purchase of land in Palestine.

Meanwhile the spiritual consolidation of the Zionist Movement proceeds apace. It says something for the hold of the movement on the masses that even the extreme orthodox wing—the Mizrachi—is joining forces with the main body, on whom it has bestowed its blessing. The Chief Rabbi is being invited to take the lead in the fusion, and it is significant that he is lending his moral support in this process. Another piece of constructive work is the sending out to Palestine of workers from Euorpe. These may form the nucleus of a civil service in the country. Captain Stein is already on the spot; the latest messenger of peace to go out is Mr. Benjamin Grad, a brother of the London Lodge, who has always been an enthusiast in every forward intellectual movement in Anglo-Jewry.

While the news from Palestine is good, reports from lands nearer home are very disquieting. From Galicia comes the intelligence of organized pogroms. Naturally, contradictory reports are in circulation in these times of uncertain news. The Polish authorities, warned by the British government, are obviously anxious to excuse themselves. But before any right judgment can be formed what is necessary is precise information. Mr. Israel Cohen has been sent out on behalf of the Zionist organization in London in order to report at first hand. He has already reached Lemberg, and now another emissary—that of the Board of Deputies—in the person of Mr. Joseph Prag, is also being sent thither. It is pretty evident that this is a bad business; how bad we shall learn when the reports by Mr. Cohen and Mr. Prag are available.

The Lodge hopes to take up its normal activity in the coming year. During the four years of war it has been handicapped by unavoidable difficulties. Members were occupied in various branches of national work, or were serving in the army. Among the latter we have to deplore some who laid down their lives for their country. Yet limited as was the scope, the Lodge carried on, and it has something to its credit. Much praise is due to those who became officeholders in a trying time, and the thanks of the Lodge and of the Order should be recorded to Bro. F. S. Spiers, the retiring President. His year of office was perhaps the most difficult of all the war years, but with his usual persistence and cheeriness he carried the Lodge safely over into the period of peace. His successor will in all probability be Bro. Paul Goodman, the Vice-President of 1918, and the Honorary General Secretary of 1917, who has already done yeoman service to the London Lodge. The other officeholders will be duly announced in the next issue.

One of the most fruitful activities of the London Lodge has been to act as a clearing-house of ideas for questions of communal interest. The next meeting arranged for the purpose, which will be held towards the end of the present month, will be reported in the next London letter. Meantime we may say that the meeting promises to be a great success, the list of speakers including the Chief Rabbi, Miss Nettie Adler, Bro. S. Rowson and Dr. A. Eichholz. The occasion will form an excellent beginning for the year's activities, and with an accretion of membership, which might seem to be possible, the Lodge may look confidently to the future. It will also be a source of strength and encouragement to get into touch regularly with Grand Lodge and with sister lodges. In its limited way the Order will thus contribute its quota to bring about that for which the great mass of mankind is longing—the Parliament of Man, the Federation of the World.

ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE.

A new report has been issued by the Anti-Defamation League under date of September 1st, 1918. The pamphlet contains fifty-four pages, consisting almost entirely of correspondence between the officers of the A. D. L. Committee and the various newspapers, resorts, motion picture houses, publishers, etc. The report again stresses the need of referring all cases to the office of the A. D. L. Committee.

As a result of the past years' activities, there has been continued assurance on the part of motion picture producers and vaudeville circuit managers that there will be an end soon to the caricature of the Jew on both the screen and the stage.

Jokes still continue to appear from time to time, but in each case a letter was addressed to the editor of the publication in which the "joke" appeared, and invariably there has been an apology with the promise of more caution in the future.

Several songs of an offensive nature have been removed from circulation.

"Life" still continues it's vicious policy. but we are told that the editors of this publication have been warned by the postoffice authorities to be more careful of their writings.

Grimms Fairy Tales will no longer contain the fable "A Jew Among Thorns."

The "Book of Knowledge" will not continue the picture showing Shylock being jeered by the inhabitants of Venice.

Nelson's Loose Leaf Encyclopedia will omit the drawing of a "Jewish" nose.

The Goodrich Transit Co. will no longer carry advertisments of resorts who discriminate against "Hebrews."

New Hampshire and Illinois are taking steps to pass anti-discrimination acts.

A number of insurance agents have been warned by the insurance companies not to discriminate against "Jews."

Newspapers have promised to be more careful with their "Ads."

The Columbia Grafaphone Co. will no longer use the cut advertising the "Levinsky" records.

The Fosdick Commission promised not to use any Jewish comedians on the stage of any of the Liberty theaters.

The War Department will not again issue a manual to its Medical Advisory Boards, advising them to be particularly careful to be on the lookout for Jews who "more than others are apt to malinger."

The good work goes on every day. The Administrative Committee meets each week to consider all cases. While the task seems to be endless, it is gratifying to know that certain types of discrimination have ceased to exist. That time may yet come when the work of the A. D. L. will no longer be required. For the present the work must go on just as energetically as ever.

SKETCHES OF MODERN JEWISH HISTORY.

the law of the land. England had in the same year emancipated itself from the claims of Roman theocracy, by the Magna Charta, and a historic coincidence in 1858 showed the wide chasm between the medieval and the modern conception of the state in two simultaneous events in both countries.

The House of Lords had saved its face by a compromise, and in 1885, when Baron Lionel's son, Baron Nathaniel, entered the House of Lords as the first Jew, no objection was raised and no remedial legislation was needed. The last House of Commons had seventeen members of "the people loaded with hereditary burden of Jesus' blood," but Christianity has as yet not been overthrown in the British empire, nor is it likely to be done through the present House, which probably has an equal number of Jews, not counting two Jews in His Majesty's cabinet.

CITIZEN RIGHTS FOR JEWS IN ROUMANIA.

The Roumanian Minister in Paris announced that in the near future a measure would be introduced in Parliament granting rights as citizens to all Jews born in Roumania.

THE ELECTION OF ISRAEL

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

Written for the B'nai B'rith News

"The notion of the election (of Israel) always maintained in Jewish consciousness the character of at least an unformulated dogma." So wrote Schechter in 1909. Kohler pronounces it a fundamental doctrine and gives credit to the reformers for placing it "at the very center of their system." A little further back, in 1905, in a printed article, the present writer said: "The Roman Catholic Church answered the hostile movements of the nineteenth century with the dogma of the infallibility of her head. Israel, with equal firmness, must meet the Anti-Semitism of the day with the unequivocal reaffirmation of her divine election." Combining my own remark with Schechter's I would say now: The election of Israel is unformulated dogma which must be formulated in our own day. Formulated by whom? If we are true to history, taking things as they were, not as they might be, the answer can be only: By the tacit assent of the Jewish people. The formulation may and must be made by an individual or individuals, but the acceptance need not take place in convocation. Exactly as was the case with Maimonides and his creed. An individual formulated it; the people accepted it. Nor is it necessary to reiterate here the ancient quarrel as to whether Judaism has dogmas and again as to what constitutes a dogma. Any and every faith, made articulate, has its articles, its fundamental doctrines. But the analogy of the Catholic Church which is invoked in the citation from my own previous paper brings home the following important thoughts. The formulation of a dogma becomes inperative at a certain juncture. At other times it may be there, but it is not stressed. When conditions arise that call it into question it becomes necessary to stress it. Every faith is on the defensive. It possesses a body of doctrine necessary to its eixstence, it posits certain truths. So soon as one of the positions is attacked, it calls for fortification. To illustrate: With other positive religions Judaism is theistic. Now theism and particularly the belief in a personal God to whom you can pray and with whom you can commune is opposed by modern science and modern philosophy. It follows that the positive religions must stress and defend theism. Judaism is monotheistic. That point was stressed against pagan polytheism; in the middle ages against Christian trinitarianism; today it must be reasserted against modern polytheism or pluralism. And so it is with the doctrine of the election. It was not stressed by Maimonides, because in a measure Christianity concedes it. Only that Christianity grants it the historic claim; that is to say, in the period of the education of the human race (to borrow Lessing's term)through the Jewish people it was a fact, but so soon as the time was ripe for the Jewish truth to become the common possession of mankind it passed away from the Jew and became vested in the Christian church, the heir to the fruition of Judaism in the founder. All that was necessary for Maimonides was therefore to reassert the Messianic doctrine: the Messiah is still to come. The Jewish truth, for which, as Maimonides held, Jesus and Mohammed paved the way, will be unfolded in its fulness through the Messiah for whom we are waiting. Judaism did not therefore abdicate in the times of Jesus. But today the conditions are different. I spoke of the assault of Anti-Semitism. The sum and substance of the literary Anti-Semitism, of which the practical variety in the form of Judenhetzen and pogroms and boycotts is an offshoot, is that the world was inveigled into taking the Jew at his own valuation. By a stupendous array of learning it is sought to demonstrate that none of the things which have been credited to the genius of the Jewish people is original with it; that Israel was even of old the great middlemen who carried Oriental, Babylonian, Sumerian wisdom beyond the Mediterranean. In other words, even the historical claim is denied. It goes without saying that it is dinned into our ears that for the last two thousand years we have been sterile; that Judaism is an anachronism; that the Jew who forsakes his religion is leaving something inferior for something superior. But we have also our Anti-Semites within. They have been with us at all times. I do not mean the vulgar Jew Anti-Semite who hates his people, who calumniates his race. There is another species. Their honesty, and in many a case their nobility of character and courage of conviction, shall not be gainsaid. But in casting about for a reason for their abandoning their ancestral faith they consciously or unconsciously strike at the root of the doctrine of the election. Thereby they show that it is a vital matter to Judaism. Hence the attack from within as well as that from without should force the Jewish people to recommit itself to the dogma of the election. It is interesting to see that those teachers, like Christianity of old, acquiesce in the historical claim. They would, had they lived in the days of the Deuteronomist, have approved of its formulation. The formulation then, I am convinced, proves by the way that there were Jews in those days who were opposed to it. What these modern teachers deny is our right in the present to hold to that doctrine. That, of course, is the Christian position pure and simple. Who shall say that our spiritual task, our mission, is done and executed in the world? But, they say, the prophetic ideals of justice, social justice, are not adequate for modern conditions. We answer: the method may not be adequate, but the principle remains. The world today is thirsting for social justice. The prophetic ideal therefore remains to be carried out. The prophets were not political economists nor even theorists. But the gospel of justice remains theirs. Then again it is maintained that an elect people must be perfect as a pattern in all its individuals. How can we impress the world when we have the rapacious and the greedy and the impure among ourselves? That is to mistake the difference between the corporate body and the individual. The Christian whom I meet on the street may not be a perfect specimen of Christianity. Nevertheless I recognize a Christian ideal and a type of Christian piety and sainthood. There may be Jews who are horse thieves; yet the Jewish people is the elect of God. Furthermore, it is said that, assuming (the hypothetical tone reminds us of Spinoza's If) that the Zionist dream might become a reality, the new state could not serve as a pattern for far-away nations whose conditions are totally different. We in America lay claim to a new type of democracy; we consider that as the mission of the American people, we have taken it with us for the time being to Paris and there our President is injecting the American spirit of democracy into the very peace convention. Does he expect that all nations old and new shall copy our constitution? By no means. But our constitution remains the pattern. The arguments are thus shown to be specious. The severnace from Judaism is honestly and conscientiously conceived. We honor such men for their convictions. But what interests us is that in divorcing themselves from communion with Israel they single out for attack the doctrine of the election. It follows as a corollary that the bulk of us who remain to fight the battles of Israel tacitly accept the doctrine of the election. and a doctrine universally accepted is a dogma. And it makes no difference whether we be orthodox or reformers, internationalists or nationalists. In view of the attack from within and without make bold proclamation: Israel is the elect of God.

President District Grand Lodge No. 1, I. O. B. B.

The Sixty-Seventh Annual Convention

OF DISTRICT No. 1, I. O. B. B.

The sixty-seventh annual convention of the District No. 1, I. O. B. B., was held in the city of Bridgeport, Conn.

The convention began with a speical B'nai B'rith service at the Park Temple, Friday evening, Jan. 31. Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan, Secretary of the District, was the speaker on the occasion. Dr. Kaplan spoke on "Jewish and Amerian Ideals as Fostered by the Independent Order B'nai B'rith." The service was read by the Rabbi of the temple, Bro. Dr. S. Abrams. There was a speical musical service arranged for the occasion.

Saturday evening, Feb. 1, an informal reception was given to the delegates and their guests at Hotel Stratfield.

The convention proper opened Monday morning, at which over a hundred delegates were present. President of the District, Bro. Maurice P. Davidson, read an inspiring message reviewing the events of the year. He dwelled with special pride on the patriotic work of the Order and the District in the great world conflict. He expressed appreciation of a number of lodges of the District which sold thousands of dollars' worth of Liberty Bonds. In the third Liberty Loan Campaign active brothers of the District sold bonds amounting to $1,369,800. He called special attention to the fact that in the city of Springfield, Mass., the Second Vice-President of the District, Hon. Henry Lasker, had practically complete charge of the sale of bonds in that community, and that his most ardent workers were members of the Springfield Lodge. He also referred to the fine patriotic services rendered by the Pine Tree Lodge No. 817 of Bangor, Me., one of the youngest lodges of the District, which received special thanks from the Chamber of Commerce in that city, citing the activities of that lodge as "model patriotic activities for other citizens to follow."

Brother Davidson pointed out with much satisfaction the meritorious services rendered by Bro. Judge A. K. Cohen of Boston, Past President of the District, who was designated by the Federal government as chairman of the State District Boards in connection with the Administration of the Selective Service. Bro. Col. Isaac M. Ullman was chairman of the state of New Haven. Bro. Charles H. Shapiro, First Vice-President of the District, rendered special service to the government in connection with Food Conservation. Bro. Col. Harry Cutler served as chairman of the Jewish Welfare Board. Bro. Albert Moritz, Past President of Brooklyn Lodge, was in charge of Ship Construction at Camden Yards, not to speak of many brothers who served in the ranks.

President Davidson paid a high tribute to the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Home, which as Unit No. 112 of the American Red Cross prepared thousands of garments for the Red Cross Society, receiving special honorable mention from that organization.

President Davidson appealed to the brothers not to abate their zeal, but continue their activities in the work of reconstruction.

President Davidson called special attention to the Anti-Defamation League work of the Order, which is doing so much to safeguard and protect the good name of the Jew.

The message was couched in beautiful and eloquent language and made a deep impression upon the delegates present.

President Davidson was followed by Bro. Myron Sulzberger, who read a very interesting report, outlining the work of the Home for the Aged in Yonkers.

A feature of the morning session was the reading of an interesting report by the President of the Ladies' Auxiliary Society showing the work of the benevolent and patriotic activities worthy of true mothers in Israel.

In the afternoon of Sunday, Feb. 2, a large number of candidates were initiated, the ritual being exemplified in a most expressive manner.

The following brothers were nominated and elected for the ensuing year.

Bro. Charles H. Shapiro, Bridgeport, President of District.

Bro. Henry Lasker, Springfield, First Vice-President.

Bro. Myron Sulzberger, New York, Second Vice-President.

Bro. Herman Asher, New York, Treasurer.

The newly elected officers were installed by Bro. A. B. Seelenfreund, Executive Secretary of the Order.

A very elaborate banquet at the Hotel Stratfield followed the afternoon session.

The following is the program of the speakers at the banquet:

Address of Welcome—Abraham Schnee, President Harmony Lodge No. 711, I. O. B. B.

Toastmaster, Rabbi Samuel J. Abrams.

A. B. Seelenfreund, Secretary Executive Committee, I. O. B. B.

Col. Harry Cutler, Past President District Grand Lodge No. 1, I. O. B. B.

The convention continued the following day, on which important business was transacted. Among the resolutions adopted was one on the death of the late Theodore Roosevelt, ex-President of the United States. A resolution on the death of the late Bro. Jacob Furth, the late venerable Treasurer of the Order, was also adopted.

The convention adjourned with a determination on the part of many brothers present to continue their B'nai B'rith activities with renewed zeal in the coming year.

A Memorandum on the Modality of Settling the Jewish Question in Roumania

By Our Special Correspondent

Roumania's Obligations.

The Jewish question in Roumania has a pronounced international character. Article 44 of the Treaty of Berlin makes it incumbent upon Roumania to grant full citizen rights to all Jews who have never been subjects of any foreign power. After accepting this treaty Roumania refused to carry out the terms of the aforesaid article. However, under the pressure of the representations made by the Great Powers, who demanded the fulfillment of Article 44 as a condition of their recognition of Roumania's independence, she saw the advisability of making up her mind to certain concessions. She was compelled to make formal declarations (see the Notes of Aug. 19-31, 1879, and Dec. 21-23, 1879,) that she "would cease treating the Roumanian Jews as aliens" and would adopt a benevolent policy towards them in the future. She also promised to enter upon a policy which would lead to a speedy emancipation of the Jews. In other words, Roumania promised that even if she did not carry out Article 44 immediately, as provided for in the Treaty of Berlin, she would do so in as short a time as possible.

Moreover, Roumania's independence was only acknowledged on the condition that she fulfilled the aforesaid promises.

But Roumania did not keep her promises. On the contrary, she continued regarding her native-born Jews, i. e., Jews that were not subjects of any foreign power, as foreigners and treating them as such. In place of the benevolent policy which Roumania had solemnly promised to adopt towards the Jews, an attitude of hatred and intolerance manifested itself. No attempts were made to naturalize the Jews even by a gradual process.

We will refrain from depicting the inexpressable moral and material sufferings which the Jews of Roumania underwent during the last 50 or 60 years; we will also leave unmentioned the sad events caused by the hundreds of laws and regulations specially promulgated and passed to exclude the Jews from all the benefits of the country. We will not harrow our readers' feelings by a description of the tragedies caused by the emigration of almost 100,000 Jews. We will enter upon no plea to prove that our sorrowful fate was quite unmerited and that we have always been the victims of outrageous injustice. We want to forget the past. We will only make mention of these events to the extent that it appears inevitably necessary for us to do, if we are to justify the means which we propose in this Memorandum as being necessary to guarantee us a future.

The Solution Proposed by the Roumanian Political Leaders.

Being Roumanian Jews, we know the conditions which the Roumanian government wishes to impose on us before permitting us to become naturalized. Roumanian politicians have even today no intention of settling the Jewish question in the way such settlements have always taken place in other parts of the world, i. e., by a simultaneous naturalization en bloc of the entire Jewish population of the country; on the contrary, they wish to grant naturalization to separate individuals only. They purpose to entrust the courts or specially nominated tribunals with the task of examining the applications of Jews, which must be sent in singly by single individuals. They also think that applicants ought to produce documents to furnish proof that they are able to comply with certain conditions imposed upon them by the Naturalization Act. These conditions relate generally to the birthplace, nationality, etc., of the applicants.

However, the Roumanian Jews declare that they must most decidedly oppose a solution of their questions upon such a basis. They give the following reasons against it.

(1) The documents likely to be demanded by the Roumanian government are very hard to obtain in Roumania. Civil registers (birth and death certificates, etc.) were not introduced into the country till the year 1866, and some time elapsed before the regulations concerning such regulations were carried out with any strictness. Until the last twenty or thirty years the state of Roumanian administration was such that it would be no easy matter to obtain documents of older date; indeed it would be absolutely impossible in many cases.

(2) If a solution by means of documentary evidence and the decisions of tribunals were to be accepted, there would still be no guarantee that the officials whose duty it would be to apply the law would not put every possible and impossible obstacle in the way of applicants for naturalization. The hostile attitude adopted by the Roumanian bureaucracy towards the Jews is sufficiently well known. The Emancipation Act, which was voted by the last Roumanian government and which has been happily repealed, is an example which should be decisive enough. An attempt was made with this law to settle the enfranchisement of the Jews in the way I have already described, i. e., by means of documentary evidence, tribunals, etc. In cases where documentary evidence was unprocurable the testimony of sworn witnesses was permitted. However, this system broke down completely during the few weeks that the law was in force. The reason of this was that all officials who were called upon to take any part in the administration of the act, whose duty it was to issue certificates, swear in witnesses, etc., commenced a series of obstructive actions to lay obstacles in the way of applicants and prevent decisions being given under various pretexts. We have in our possession documentary evidence which proves these accusations up to the hilt.

(3) The great mass of Roumanian Jews consists of an exceedingly poor working and trading proletariat. These people would be unable to make efforts to obtain papers of naturalization, which would only be granted after the fulfilment of numerous formalities and after applicants had been put to considerable trouble and expense.

Let us assume a solution on the lines proposed by Roumanian politicians; the consequence would be that more than 100,000 Jews, men and women (all males who were of age, widows, guardians of orphans, etc.) would be hunting for papers or seeking out witnesses. They would then have to appear singly before the courts or tribunals which would have to pronounce a separate decision upon each individual case. The ill-will toward Jews, for which Roumanian officials are notorious, would be a certain guarantee that the greater part of the Jewish proletariat would prefer to renounce all their chances rather than make efforts to obtain papers of naturalization in this fashion. Anyone who knows the state of things prevailing in Roumania will have no doubt that in the event of a settlement of the Jewish question under the conditions set forth above at the very best many tens of thousands of Jewish men and women would remain excluded from the benefits of naturalization.

We have given a short summary of an essentially complicated question. We refrain from going into details, as we do not wish this Memorandum to be too long drawn out. Meanwhile we are ready to give any necessary explanations and to prove by means of documentary evidence the strict accuracy of our assertions.

The Form of Settlement Which We Propose.

The Roumanian Jews are ready to propose their own modality of settling this question. It is the only one which will effect complete and final enfranchisement without requiring the entire administrative machinery of the country, without calling upon an entire population to fulfil impossible conditions and without causing throughout the whole country a violent and tenacious agitation which could easily lead to persecutions and even to massacres. This settlement is based upon consideration of justice and historical facts. The native Jews, i. e., Jews not under the protection of a foreign state, have formed a special category in Roumania for hundreds of years, a class which at one time enjoyed certain privileges. The Note, drawn up in February, 1880, by M. de Freycinet, the then French Minister of Foreign Affairs, and relating to the recognition of Roumania's independence, confirms in unmistakable fashion the fact that in Article 44 of the Treaty of Berlin the Great Powers demanded from the Roumanian government the enfranchisement en bloc of all Jews who were not subjects of any foreign state. On the other hand, Roumania officially recognized the existence of a category of native-born Jews in the Notes to the Great Powers mentioned above, wherein she promised to cease from treating Roumanian Jews as aliens and to gradually naturalize them. We base our proposed settlement upon these facts and demand for our emancipation the only criterion which could be allowed to be right and just—the criterion of no allegiance to any foreign state. We therefore demand citizen rights for all Jews resident in Roumania who have never been subjects of any foreign state. The Roumanian government has accurate knowledge as to who is and is not a foreign subject. The strict application of the Control of Aliens Act of March 20, 1915, which ordained the entry of the names of all foreign subjects in a special register, and the equally strict classification of all foreigners according to nationality, which took place when Roumania entered the war, makes it very easy for the authorities to distinguish between the native-born Jews and those who are subjects of foreign states. Let it not be forgotten that what we are demanding today, i. e., the naturalization of all Jews who owe no allegiance to any foreign power, was guaranteed by Article 44 of the Treaty of Berlin, but has hitherto been withheld from us.

We demand that all Jews who answer this description should be placed on a completely equal footing with the Christian Roumanians as regards the acquirement and exercising of citizen rights. Just as these latter enjoy all political rights without having to bring proof that they are Roumanians by birth, so ought Jewish Roumanians also to be admitted to citizen rights without having first to prove that they are not foreign subjects.

In order to allay the fears of Roumanian nationalism—which will be characterized as groundless by any one acquainted with the real situation in Roumania—that Jews who are foreign subjects will take advantage of the solution proposed by us, i. e., that they will pretend that they have never enjoyed the protection of any foreign state, and so become Roumanian citizens, a right of appeal can be allowed. That would mean that any applicant's rights to acquire citizenship could be contested, if facts could be brought to prove that he was a foreign subject. For such cases the regulations of the Election Act framed for use on occasions when the qualifications of a Christian Roumanian are contested could be brought into application. These regulations permit anyone, whether official or private person, who has taken the initiative in contesting a man's electoral rights, to bring proof that the person whose claim to citizenship is contested is not a Roumanian by birth; in our case they would have to prove that the person in question is a subject of some foreign state. However, we have already demonstrated that the Roumanian authorities possess the means to ascertain who is or is not a subject of some foreign state. Moreover we wish our question to be settled by the Peace Conference by the adoption into the treaty which will be concluded with Roumania of certain special articles. We take the liberty of appending below a definite scheme for their drawing up. Naturalization granted by the Peace Conference will also place us under the protection of the signatory Powers, and we need such protection. We are afraid that the system of government prevailing in Roumania before the war will unfortunately continue to exist after the conclusion of peace. We have no hopes of this system undergoing any speedy change. If we were able to cherish any such hopes we would not demand a settlement of our question by the Peace Conference. We have shown up the attitude adopted by the Roumanian government three months ago when attempts were made to settle our question by means of an internal law.

Quite different measures are necessary to guarantee our emancipation with all possible certainty. For example: In September, 1918, the Roumanian Minister of Education got a law passed according to which certain advantages, as, for instance, remission of school fees, etc., were only to be granted to pupils who, in the opinion of their teachers, cherished feelings of national solidarity. This enactment caused deep unrest among the Jewish population of Roumania because nothing is easier than to cast doubts upon the feelings of national solidarity of any particular person. If in future, for example, admission to the public schools, nominations to official posts, rights of settlement in villages—the latter has always been forbidden to Jews—etc., were made conditional upon regulations of this sort, it is clear that the benefits of naturalization would be rendered worthless. This sort of thing cannot be prevented unless guarantees are given.

We take the liberty of [illegible] case within a scheme and [illegible] following text for certain [illegible] would eventually be incorp[illegible] treaty which will be conclude[illegible] mania.

A Scheme for the Settlement of the Jewish Question in Roumania.

Article —. By the carrying out of Article 44 of the Treaty of Berlin all inhabitants of the ancient kingdom of Roumania who were not subjects of any foreign state on Aug. 27, 1916 (the day of Roumania's entry into the war), will be recognized as Roumanian citizens. These inhabitants shall be placed on a perfect footing equality with the other Roumanians as regards the exercise of all civil and political rights. Herewith they will enjoy all these rights without any obligation to previously prove that they were not subjects of any other state.

This footing of equality will allow anybody to contest the right of any Jew to acquire and exercise civil and political rights by the procedure provided for by the Elections Act for such contestings. In such cases the person who contests must bring sure proof that the individual whose claims are contested has been a subject of some foreign state.

Article —. No regulation is valid in Roumania, which in the form of a law or an administrative enactment or by any other means shall directly or indirectly decrease or nullify in practice the complete equality which has been declared in the previous article to be the right of every Jew who has not been a foreign subject.

Article —. The text of the two above articles shall be adopted into the Roumanian Constitution and shall remain an integral factor of the same.

Article —. The Roumanian government shall undertake to bring the text of the above articles to the knowledge of all Roumanian officials and to give them the orders necessary to insure that all naturalized Jews shall be immediately and forthwith entered upon the electoral lists, be admitted to the public schools, enjoy the right of settlement in villages and of nomination to public offices, etc.—in short, that their power of exercising all civil rights shall become an immediate fact.

Article —. The above regulations shall come into force upon the day when the Roumanian delegates sign the treaty.

Only the settlement which we have proposed can definitely secure us equal rights. It is unthinkable that those Roumanian statesmen who honorably and sincerely desire a just settlement should prefer a process of naturalization on the basis of documentary evidence and the decisions of tribunals. This latter method would mean the postponement of our naturalization for an indefinite time, the introduction of causes of strife and agitation and in all cases the exclusion from naturalization of tens of thousands of Jews. On the other hand, the scheme we have proposed will accomplish immediately the naturalization of all who are entitled to it. Our scheme will also take into consideration the nationalist opinions held in Roumania today by permitting the contesting of rights.

Guarantees for the Inhabitants of the Annexed Territory.

In this Memorandum we have only dealt with the Jewish question of the ancient kingdom of Roumania. The annexation of Bessarabia, the Bukowina, Transylvania, etc., raises a new question—that of the inhabitants of these districts and the 500,000 or 600,000 Jews resident among them. According to the tenets of international law this new question has really no right to exist, but for obvious reasons it would be better to obtain guarantees that the inhabitants of these districts should not be molested in their political rights in future. If such guarantees are not obtained the Jews will be the first to suffer. They will be required to produce all kinds of documentary evidence that they enjoyed citizen rights in the countries which have ceded certain territories to Roumania, and various interpretations will be placed upon the text of agreements. In this way Article 44 of the Treaty of Berlin has been interpreted in a sense quite different to that intended by the European Great Powers.

We know, for instance, that there are Roumanian politicians who even today demand that citizen rights shall only be granted to those inhabitants of the ceded territories who were born in the annexed provinces. This would mean the exclusion of many inhabitants who were indeed citizens of states which have ceded certain portions of territory to Roumania but who were not born in such territory, although they may have resided there for a more or less long period of time. It is very necessary to obtain guarantees against such tendencies.

IRRESPONSIBLE SPOKESMEN

It follows from the regrettable disorganization of Jewry and the multitude of bodies which undertake to speak in the name of the whole people that whosoever chooses assumes authority and that whether from the speaker's platform or in the press schemes are launched and counsel is proffered and opinions are advanced which are to say the least irrelevant, but often fraught with danger. Now among other peoples there are also the irrepressible speakers and writers who believe that they must be heard and who exercise no restraint in what they say; but then little attention is paid them because their opinions are taken to be of a private character for which those constituted as the authoritative spokesmen assume no responsibility. Speech is free; talk is a safety valve, whether it be heard on a street corner or in a hall and be it that of the representatives of the nation. A resolution voted upon in a parliament may and may not become law; but the things said by speakers in debate remain private utterances. But even with a people which lacks duly chosen spokesmen charged with making known its will there are the prudent who take themselves in hand, who exercise control over their public utterances, who know how far to let themselves go, who are schooled in the art of diplomacy, and then again the imprudent who are impulsive, devoid of judgment, who reckon not the mischief which an unguarded utterance may work. Yet the world is apt to seize just upon the irresponsible talk as representative of the collective mind of the people. We who stand within know better; sometimes it would seem as if self-styled leaders indulge in a mere jest. But can we permit our fortunes none too secure and frequently hazardous to be trifled with? Certainly Mr. Zangwill cannot have been serious with his suggestion that the Arab population of Palestine be induced to migrate so as to leave room for an unmixed and homogeneous constituency of the new state that is to be. But the dangerous proposition has escaped his facile pen, and though he was immediately rebuked by men qualified by better judgment, the mischief is done and it is of far-reaching proportions. Especially mischievous the whole proposition, is as it never occurred to any other Jew the world over. We are convinced that Mr. Zangwill was merely anxious to reduce the Palestinian business to the absurd by showing how it lacks that which in the estimation of the President of the Ito is fundamental to the well-being of a Jewish settlement. But then a man of his caliber ought to have foregone this bit of specious reasoning. No, we may not be placed as high as Zangwill, but this we know, that for a long time to come states old and new will contain mixed populations and that no statesman in his senses would think of suggesting, even for the sake of the peace of the world, such a wild scheme as the uprooting of minorities, and certainly not of majorities, from their homes occupied for centuries. We know not what the plans of responsible Zionists are, but we do know the terms of the British Declaration. It provides clearly for safeguarding the rights of the Arabs and of others who are not Jews in Palestine, and it is equally clear upon the status of Jews outside Palestine. States cannot shut themselves off after the manner of the ancient Lacedaemonians. Everywhere there will be not only the transient alien, but substantial groups which, though differing from the majority in race and religion, look upon the land in which they and their fathers have dwelt as their home, to which they are attached with every fibre of their heart and in the development of which, physical and moral, they proudly co-operate. All they ask is to be left free to cultivate their own traditions with which the state need not and will not meddle. Such, we take it, is the universal opinion of sane Jews, both with regard to themselves in the dispersion and to others in Palestine, when things will get that far. And the world will accept as Jewish opinion only that which is seriously spoken by Jews conscious of their responsibility.

DETERMINATION BY LANGUAGE.

In the last year of the war, when men's minds revolted from its ugly aspect and the conditions which led to it and began casting about for formulas which would express the nature of the newer order of things that was to evolve out of the carnage, the expression "self-determination" was hit upon. It is a clear enough term. Its immediate opposite is "determination by others." It was meant for the great and the small. But the great have always determined themselves and had surplus energy to determine a few others beside. Right now, in the Paris meetings, the great powers seem to have pretty much everything their way. You need not exactly exercise force; you may cajole an inferior into accepting terms not quite satisfactory. Ultimately, of course, it is the big stick that determines. Nor can it in all reason be otherwise. Unmitigated self-determination would result in the clash of so many selves that the new complications would far exceed the old ones. Nor is it always the great that are selfish. The great can afford to be generous. Not so the little ones. They are apt to reach out for anything and everything there is to be had. In all candor, the great European powers who have stood the brunt of the fierce struggle are concerned primarily with their own interests, with their own safety. Their aim is to establish a concerted supremacy not to be challenged with impunity. The belligerents of yesterday must be made innocuous. Dismemberment is the remedy. Naturally new states and new nationalities will arise. And here is the interesting point. As the test of nationality there arises not so much race, as language. Language is the visible, tangible touchstone of nationality. Naturally so. Race is something physical; language is spiritual. In the language of a people there is deposited the sum of its culture, its folk songs and its polished literature. It makes for cohesion. The schools are its nurseries. Often religion goes with language and nationality. The two partake of a common element of sacredness. And though the religion be held in common with other nations, with millions of people belonging to diverse races, yet for each group, especially when heretofore it has been a minority surrounded and suppressed by a majority with another speech, religion is violated if forced to be taught in a language foreign to the race. Witness the French Canadians and the Poles. And let the further point be emphasized. The great powers long ago, years before the war, realized the potency of language. They sought to make capital thereof. Now the cat is out of the bag. We understand now why the Alliance Israelite Universelle worked with might and main to make French the language of instruction in the schools it built up in Asia and North Africa and the Bâlkans and where not. And the Hilfsverein did similarly exert itself for the German tongue. The policy, we are free to say, was dictated by the Foreign Office. In making a claim upon Syria, and a larger Syria it means, France is pointing not to French as the language of the schools of that country. In other words, the ground was prepared long ago. The flag was to follow the language. The crown prince of the Hejaz is making a similar plea for Arabic, and perhaps with more justification. Now we understand why the Jews in Palestine fought for their own language, the Hebrew. It was a wise and far-sighted political move. And be it said to the honor of the American Jew that he lent his support to Hebrew in Palestine. For just as the American nation has no axes to grind, no political spheres to conquer, just as our President stands out disinterestedly for the right and for that alone, so American Jewry is fortunately free from all dictation and is eager to protect the Jewish individuality everywhere in accordance with the particular conditions of each country in which Jews dwell. In this country we know only of one language which cements all the citizens and makes of the many one. There is no room here for separateness except on religious lines. We cherish the Hebrew as our sacred language of prayer. Beyond that we are a part of the English speaking community. We have no scruples about employing the English tongue as the language of instruction in our religious schools. We tolerate the Yiddish and know that it will die out; we cannot concede to Yiddish any sacred, Jewish character. Of course, in other countries the conditions may be and are different. Above all, we recognize the expediency of Hebrew in Palestine, where Jews from all the corners of the dispersion congregate and a common vehicle of understanding is requisite. There Jewish culture cannot but express itself in Hebrew. And because Hebrew there has become a living tongue, the Jews of Palestine rightly lay claim to autonomy, to self-determination, which is, as will now be readily granted, nothing more and nothing less than determination by language. But from this proposition follows as a necessary corollary that if there must be a Hebrew speaking community in Palestine so there cannot be but an English speaking Jewish community in all lands where English language and culture predominate. Which wholesome lesson it is timely to convey.

HIGH PRAISE FOR JEWISH SOLDIERS

Speaking at the dinner of the sales agents of the American Chicle Company at the Waldorf last week, Captain William D. Harrigan, of the 307th Infantry, gave the very highest praise to the fighting qualities of the New York boys who composed the 77th Division. He stated that in his experience of 185 days of constant fighting he had never seen an enlisted man of the American Army fail to advance when ordered or fall down on a job that was assigned to him.

"I wish also to say a special word for the American Jew as a fighter," said Captain Harrigan, who was in command of the force which rescued Lieutenant Colonel Whittesey's famous "lost battalion." "Whatever opinion any one may have had, I can testify to the splendid record made by the Jewish members of the 77th Division, and they were 40 per cent of that division. They were put to as hard a test as could be met with in modern warfare when we made our 35-mile advance through the Argonne Forest, an obstacle which had proved a stumbling block in every previous war.

"We had forty-two races and creeds in our division, and from all of them we gained something, as well as from the varied types given us by this city."

CZECHO-SLOVAKS AND THE JEWS.

According to a telegram from Prague to the Jewish Correspondence Bureau at The Hague, President Masaryk, addressing the Board of the Jewish National Council, said he recognized the Jews as a nation and would grant them the national rights of minorities. Professor Masaryk promised to support the Jewish demands for a proportional number of seats at the Czecho-Slovak National Assembly.

TRIBUTE TO THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

By Simon Wolf.

Theodore Roosevelt, twenty-sixth President of the United States, has passed from a life of action into the realm of memory and example. He was a manly man; he had the two o'clock in the morning courage; had he been the leader of the "Lost Battalion" his answer to the boches for surrender would have been as Col. Whittlesey's was: "Go to hell." He was a leader of men, a born fighter, who never struck below the belt; he was fearless and in the open, versatile beyond compare; he had the rare gift of magnetism and attached his friends with bands of steel. As a hunter he went for big game; as a naturalist he astonished John Burroughs; as an explorer and ranchman he slept peacefully under the stars, ready to uphold and defend against the wily Indian or beasts of prey; as an author he was pre-eminently choice in his diction, forceful in his narrative, instructive always; as an orator he held his hearers spellbound by the earnestness and eloquence of his periods; as a soldier he was the type of the American coupled with the enthusiasm of the Crusader As governor of the Empire state, as President of the United States for nearly eight years, he translated ideals into action, and gave the nation not only brilliant messages, but effective executive work that has given the spur and incentive to his successors.

He inspired the new navy and sent to distant lands our flag as a symbol of hope and cheer. He ordered Dewey to fight, and which drove from this continent the last vestige of Spain's power. He originated the Potomac driveway; he reconstructed the White House; he was a loyal friend of the Capital. But chief and above all he was an intense, virile, energetic American.

He, more than any other, sounded the danger signal of unpreparedness. And when war came he gave his four sons to the service, one sleeping under the sod of France, and himself ready to go overseas, even as a private. Devotion to country, service and duty were the keynotes of his character. One country, one flag, one language, were the clarion notes of his citizenship. To me he ever responded with that spirit of liberality that should dominate in private and public relations. The Jew, as the Christian, he honored, not for his creed, but for the qualities of head and heart that constituted him an American. The Kishinef petition incident rang as a trumpet call and challenged a great power to do justice. His appointment of Oscar S. Straus as a member of his cabinet was in recognition of the superb qualifications of that eminent citizen. Not since Jefferson have we had such a mosaic, his scholarship has never been equalled, except by the present inmate of the White House. Books rare and trifling were his delight, his memory was wonderful, and in more ways than one he can safely be compared to Napoleon.

His private life was ideal, he personified the traditional American home. He sleeps near the grounds that have become famous; his spirit, like John Brown's soul, is marching on, the example of patriotism in peace and in war will be conjured as an inspiration for ages to come. A true knight, whose visor was up, whose lance never at rest, his battle cry, "America for Americans."

He was absolutely free from racial or religious prejudice. The range of his thoughts was not local, but universal.

He was the live wire of American life, whose electric current pulsated from ocean to ocean.

Venezuela and Panama bear witness to his indomitable will power and far-seeing statesmanship.

To me his untimely death is a loss not only of a great American, but of a sincere personal friend.

WHERE JEWS AND POLES CO-OPERATE.

At Kempen (Prussia), the Jews, Poles, and Germans have formed militia companies which co-operate for the purpose of maintaining order. The Jewish force consists of fifty ex-soldiers.

EXPULSION OF GALICIAN JEWS FROM HUNGARY.

The Hungarian Government has issued a decree ordering the expulsion of all aliens from the country. The Government has classified the Galician Jews among the aliens. The action of the Hungarian Government has placed large numbers of Galician Jews in a desperate position, especially in view of the pogrom movement which swept their native provinces. The Budapest Zionist Organization and the Vienna Jewish National Council made urgent representations to the Government against the expulsion order.

"AND THE WHEEL WAS BROKEN AT THE WELL"

Otto Irving Wise Died Jan. 23, 1919, Aged Forty-nine

By I. J. Aschheim, Secretary District No. 4, I. O. B. B.

Otto Irving Wise

As in the universal press comments on the death of Theodore Roosevelt there was one word that ran as a refrain through them all, and that word "Americanism", so in the comments of our deceased Brother Wise there must be one word, without which the keynote to his life would be missing, and that is "Personality".

When Otto Irving Wise, past president of District No. 4, and member of the general committee, succumbed at the early age of forty-nine to the dread influenza, there was shattered a rare statue in the Lord's bric-a-brac collection, generally referred to as "frail humanity".

Otto, as he will linger in our recollection, was a splendid specimen of man; of superb physique, suave in manners, brilliant in conversation, quick in repartee, powerful in oratory and even faultless in attire. He was the typical Fifth Avenue Clubman, transplanted and very much at home in the lighter atmosphere of the West.

Coming to this city, as if from the clouds, unheralded and without friends, he raised himself to the height of a people's tribune and no popular assemblage was any longer complete without his stentorian voice appealing to the people's emotions as well as to their honest good sense. His very appearance fascinated the audience and extorted admiration and approval.

While the war was raging there was no man in all the land fired by a more intense patriotism than was Otto, and no demand was made upon him in the interest of war work that was not complied with at once. As a speaker in the Liberty Loan Campaign he was unquestionably without a peer.

If circumstances had demanded it, Otto could easily be a cosmopolitan, a citizen of the world, though necessarily of very strong American leanings. He resolutely refused to show bias or prejudice in his intercourse with individuals, but measured everybody, irrespective of creed or antecedents, by the yardstick of manhood and character, noting down his fullness as well as his shortcomings.

And yet—he was a Jew by every fibre in his body. For collective Jewry and for Judiasm in the concrete, he had a burning love; whether it meant membership in several synagogues of opposite tendencies, or affiliation with a club composed of the self-styled elite, while at the same time fraternizing with the lowliest Cheveras, was all the same to him. As long as it bore the Jewish stamp it had a claim on him, and that claim had to be satisfied, in order to gratify himself. He would conduct a Seder service in the house of a plutocrat, and next day address the Anshe Sefard on Golden Gate Ave., with the same alacrity and the same enthusiasm. Racially he was no apologist and religiously he was no anaemic.

He possessed a family keepsake, which was priceless to him, and which hung in a conspicuous place in his luxurious office among his law books. It was a group of three photographs, and he fondly called it three generations of Rabbis. There was his grandfather, his father, the late Rabbi Aaron Wise, and his brother Stephen. The picture has an historic value, as it shows Judaism in its modern development. We here have stiff-necked orthodoxy, compromising conservatism and fearless radicalism, all within a frame of nine inches by six. From the old Hungarian Rabbi with his skull cap and long white beard down to our own Stephen, is a stride of a hundred years. In scientific terms we might say that Judaism is here shown in its process of vulcanization, as it takes place in this free and untrammeled country. It is in three stages. Rigidity, Elasticity and Evaporation.

Otto, I verily believe, had a little of all three in his composition, because he was the universal Jew.

On arriving in this city, about twenty years ago, he at once "sought his brethren," and it took but a short time to find them. He placed his name on the subscription lists of the various benevolent societies, gave freely and unstintingly of his then limited income, as well as of his time, and eventually became a director in all of them. He affiliated with Unity Lodge No. 273, I. O. B. B. and, of course, took a leading part in its discussions. In due time he entered the Grand Lodge, proved his steel and was appointed Grand Orator, which meant a stepping stone to the Chair. His counsel and advice was always paternal and sound. Had the Grand Lodge paid heed to his admonition at the session of 1909, in the city of Oakland, its funds would today not have been converted into brick and mortar, and the history of the District would have had a different face. He was the only man who displayed sober judgment at that critical period. Elected President of the District at the Session of 1911, he presided over the memorable session of 1912 in the city of Los Angeles and assisted in the ceremony of laying the cornerstone to the Jewish Orphan's Home of that city. He later made a special trip to Los Angeles for the purpose of arousing the lethargy of the Jewish community, and to make them come to a proper support of the institution. His success was so marvelous that the managers of the Home presented him with a silver plaque, which he likewise displayed in his office with a great deal of pardonable pride.

Coming back to the Los Angeles session, it is well to state that many of those who atended have still a fond recollection of the feast of wit and good-natured humor which he provided for the representatives. Amateur orators were led on by a silk cord, but long-winded spell-binders were given the quietus by the Chair in such a captivating and courteous manner that they really considered it a compliment to be squelched. They were bowed to their seats.

His official visits throughout the jurisdiction were in the nature of a triumphal march, as the writer can testify from personal observation, having had the privilege of accompanying him. Large assemblages rallied to hear him everywhere, and they had never occasion to regret their zeal.

When the question was mooted whether the Convention of 1915 shall be held in San Francisco or New York, and the Executive Committee held that, to choose San Francisco, the Constitution would have to be amended, inasmuch as the Convention of 1910 had decided to hold its next session in New York, Otto Wise at once took the matter up and succeeded in gaining a victory for this city. He framed a memorial addressed to the Executive Committee and to District Grand Lodge No. 1, copies of which were sent to each District and to leading members of the Convention, wherein he set forth the claims of San Francisco and the reason why the Convention of 1915 should be held within its precincts. The selection of San Francisco by Congress for the Panama-Pacific Exposition, fixed for 1915, was a lever which he worked to excellent purpose. The document was so convincing that not only did the Executive Committee agree to submit the necessary amendment to a vote of the subordinate Lodges, but District No. 1 very generously waived its claim at once.

I have reason to believe that the delegates who attended the Convention of 1915 never regretted the change. The preparation for their reception and entertainment, as well as the provisions made for the entertainment of their families, were all supervised by our deceased friend. They were on a plane of refinement entirely reflective of his good taste and his own mode of living.

At the Convention he delivered no set talks, but will the delegates ever forget the inimitable humor of the man, his engaging personality and charming style, when occasionally he did take the platform merely to make an announcement? A mere commonplace piece of information, delivered by Otto Wise, was considered almost an oratorical event, and he was hailed with delight.

In this connection, I deem it a matter of justice to his memory to publicly declare that, in announcing his candidacy for the permanent chairmanship of the Convention, the delegation of District No. 4 acted entirely of tis own volition and on its own responsibility. It was a free offering of love and affection, and also a debt of gratitude which in our judgment we owed him for his loyalty to the District.

Personally I was guided by what I saw at the Richmond Convention in 1890, when the late Senator Wm. Lovenstein of that city was elected permanent Chairman, and again at the Convention of 1905, held in the city of New Orleans, when Brother Godcheaux of that District was chosen to preside. Having those precedents in mind, I saw no impropriety in the ambition of District No. 4 to have one of its delegates the Chairman of the Convention. At the time the delegates departed there was not one among them who, after coming face to face with Otto, did not regret the disappointment he was subjected [illegible]

The passing of Otto Irving [illegible] the zenith of his professional [illegible] the fullness of his intellectual [illegible] and the richness of his citi[illegible] been sincerely and deeply [illegible] all over the state of California. The courts of the United States, state and municipality held brief services and adjourned to his memory. The Temple Eman-El devoted a Sabbath morning service to the honoring of his memory, and a member of the State Supreme Court paid him a high tribute in the presence of an overflowing edifice. District Grand Lodge No. 4 will set aside an hour to testify its appreciation of the devotion he showed, during a busy life, to the purposes and ideals of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith, but nothing, to my mind, is so sublime and so clear an evidence of how deeply he was imbedded in the hearts of the people of San Francisco, and how idolized he was by them, as the keen personal loss which everybody felt and openly expressed on hearing of the sad event. "The wheel was broken at the well."

ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE.

Apology From Kansas City Star.

The following letter was received from the Kansas City Star in reply to our protest because of a most offensive article appearing in that paper, in which the story was told that a Jewish shopkeeper tried to swindle a negro soldier out of a suit of clothes.

The Kansas City Star.
Feb. 6, 1919.

Mr. L. Edw. Lashman,
Secretary Anti-Defamation League,
1228 Tribune Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

Dear Sir: We have noted the contents of your letter of Feb. 5 regarding the use of the word Jew in The Star in connection with a criminal item recently published.

There has been in force for years in the editorial department of The Star a rule forbidding the mentioning of a man's religion in connection with any item of a criminal or other unfavorable nature. In the instance in question the story was written by a new man and passed by an editor who knew better, but who could only explain his lapse as forgetfulness.
